The Consuls cast lots for their Provinces, and it fell unto Carvilius to go into Tuscanie, as the souldiours withed and desired; who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnium. As for Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more resistance, before Seninum. Many a time he was fought withall in battaile arranged: oft skirmished with, in his march: yea and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies sallied out against him from the towne, in such sort, as he could not tell what to make of: for neither was it to be called properly a sege alone, nor yet altogether a battaile fight; considering that the enemies were more protected and covered themselves, by the strength of their walls; than the walls were defended by force of armes, and men of warre: howbeit in the end, what with fighting, and what with skirmishing, he lodged them within the citie, so as they durst come abroad no more; but kept themselves close, & were besieged indeede: and after long siege, as wel with forcible assaults, as by trenches, battils, and rampiers, he was maister of the towne: and therefore after he was possessed of it, upon anger and choler that they had so long stood out and put him to so much trouble, there was the more blood shed; and seven thousand dyed by the sword, whereas under three thousand were taken prisoners. The spoyle and pillage, which was exceeding great, considering that the Samnites had layd up all their goods in some few cities, was given to the souldiours. And now lay the snow thick all over upon the ground: neither could men endure abroad in the field without house and harbour: and thereupon the Consull retired his armie out of Samnium. Against his coming to Rome, it was decreed by the generall voyce of all men, that he should triumph: and so he triumphed, whiles he was in his Magistracie, with great magnificence, and sumptuous pomp, as those dayes would afford. For as well his footemen as horsemen marched and passed by in a shew, adorned with their gifts and prizes of honor. Many a civike, vallate, and murale garland was scene worne that day. Much looking and wondering there was at the spoyle also of the Samnites armour and apparell: for with their goodly beautes and glorious hew, were they comparable to those that his father had wooen before him, which were commonly scene, and well known in the publicke places of the citie, adorned and beautified therewith. Moreover there were led before him in this triumph & pompeous entrance of his into the citie, certain captives & prisoners of noble blood descended, men of great worth sometime, and name, as well for their owne deedes, as their fathers acts. Great store of Brasse bullion in lingots, and not coined, was caried in shew, amounting to the weight of 2000533 pound: which masse of brasse or copper, was rayled of the ranfome of prisoners. But the silver which was gotten in the sackage of the townes, came to 1330 pound weight and above. All the brasse and silver was layd up in the common treasure of the citie, and nothing at all of the whole bootie given to the souldiours: and the discontentment and hartburning that grew thereby, was so much the greater in the common people, by reason they were charged besides with an exaction and contribution for souldiours pay; whereas if the Consull had not upon a vainglorious humour brought into the citie-chamber, such summes which he had gained from the enemy, there might a good portion thereof have bene bestowed freely among the souldiours, and of the surpluse their due wages paid and dispatched. Moreover, whiles he was Consull, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which his father being Dictator, had vowed: for, that himselfe vowed it in the very time of the battaile, I finde not in any auncient writer; and certainly in so short a space, he could not possibly have built and finished it. He trimmed it besides, and garnished it with the spoiles of the enemies, whereof there was such store and abundance, that not only the foresayd Temple and the market-place were therewith set out and bravely decked, but they were distributed

* For saving of a citizens life in battaile, made of gresse.

* For mourning first, over the rampier of the enemies campe, fastened like shales in a rampier.

* For scaling over the walls first, of an enemies citie: and formed to the manner of the comin of battiments of a wall.

* Two millions five hundred thirty three As for in value, and of english sterl. 25006 li. 13. sh. four d. within a farthing.

* 3990 pound sterling after five shillings, an ounce.

A distributed abroad to their allies also and Coloners, neere inhabitants, for the decoration and beautifying of their churches and publicke places. After the triumph ended, hee brought his armie to winter in the territorie of the Vestines, because those quarters were distressed and annoyed by the Samnites.

In this meane while, Carvilius the Consull, having at his first coming given the assault unto Troilium, a citie in Tuscanie, granted license to 470 of the richest citizens, to depart from thence, and by composition, to pay a great sum of monie unto him. The rest of the multitude fell into his hands, after hee had wooen the towne by fine force. This done, he forced five castles, situate in places of great strength: where were slaine of enemies 2400, and not all out 2000 taken prisoners. He granted to the Falisci (who sued for peace) truce for one year, and yet to make present payment of a 1000000 As, and to discharge the souldiours wages for that yeare. After these exploits achieved, he departed to his triumph: which as it was lesse, honourable and glorious than that of his companion in government, in regard of the service performed against the Samnites: so, if wee consider withall, the Tuscanie warre, it was equall and comparable unto it every way. Of brasse money he brought into the common chest 300090 pound: of the surpluse of the pillage and other spoiles, hee caused the chappell of Fors fortuna to bee built, neer unto the temple of the same goddesse, dedicated by king Servius Tullius: To the souldiours that served on foot, he gave of his bootie * 102 As for a peece, and twice as much to every Centurion and horseman. Which reward they accepted more thankfully at his hands, by reason of the nigardise and miserie of his Colleague before him. And so gracious was this Consull, that he protected and saved L. Volumnius, one of his lieutenants, against the people: who being arrested and called to his answer by M. Cincius, a Tribune of the Commons; fled for his last helpe, to his Lieutenantship (as they say) and avoided thereby the daunger of their judgement: for that during his absence in that charge; his accusation might well bee set on foot and followed; but brought to a small end and definitive sentence, it could not bee.

After this yeare expired, the newe Tribunes of the Commons entered their office: and for that there was supposed some error in their creation, the fift day after were other chosen in their stead. The same yeare there was a Lustrum or solemne survey of the citie, held by P. Cornelius Arvina, and C. Martius Rutilius Censors. In which were numbered and assessed 262322 pols of Roman citizens. These were in order the six and twentieth Censors from the beginning: and this was reckoned the nineteenth Lustrum after the first institution. In this yeare, and never before, the spectators of the Romane Games and Plaies, in regard of their happie successe in warres, stood adorned with wreaths and garlands of floures upon their heads: and then came up the fashion at Rome; borrowed from the manner and custome of Greeke, to honour those with branches of the date tree, who wan the prizes, and were victors in those solemne Games.

The same yeare the Ædiles curule, who exhibited the said pastimes and exercises of activitie, paved the causeway high way with flint or peble stone, from the temple of Mars unto Bovillae: and the fines of certaine Publicanes or farmers of the citie, that were graffers and condemned, paid the charges. Then Papirius held the great Assemblie for Election of new Consuls, and created Q. Fabius Cunctator the sonne of Maximius, and D. Junius Brutus Scaeva, Consuls. Papirius himselfe was chosen Pretor. This yeare, so joyous and fortunate in many respects, could hardly countervayle & recompence with all other comforts, one only calamitie, namely a pestilence and mortallie, which consumed & devoured both town and countrie. In such manner, as for the strangenes & extremite thereof it was held for a prodigious & portentous sign beyond all course of nature, and reach of reason. Whereupon, the bookes of Sibylla were perused, to know out of them, what issue and remedie the gods would vouchsafe to shew of this maladic and miserie. Wherein they found, that the Image of Æsculapius must be sent for, from as far as Æpidaurus to Rome.

But for that yeare, by reason, that the Consuls were busied in the warres, nothing was done, but only one day bestowed wholly in supplications and devout Ceremonies, to the honour of the said god Æsculapius.

THE TEN BOOKES NEXT FOLLOWING OF T. LIVIUS, (VSUALLY CALLED THE SECOND DECADE) ARE lost: the arguments whereof remaine yet extant in the Abridgements or Breviaries of L. Florus, which in steed of the Historie it selfe, are set downe in this place.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the eleventh Booke.

Vhen Fabius Cunctator the Consul, had fought an infortunate battaile against the Samnites, and the Senate were about to discharge and remove him from his armie; Fabius Maximus his father, besought them for his sake, not to offer him that disgrace and dishonour. For rather than that should come to passe, he promised to serve in person under his sonne in quality of his Lieutenant. Which moved the Senat and prevailed more than any thing els. And hee was his words maister. For hee went to the field, and by his meanes and good advice, the Consul his sonne was so well assisted, that he defeated the Samnites, triumphed over them, led captive before his triumphant chariot C. Pontius Lord General of the Samnites, and afterwards strucke off his head. Whiles the cittie of Rome was piteously visited and afflicted with the plague, there were certain Embassadors addrest and sent to Epidaurus, for so translate the image of Æsculapius from thence to Rome. And in steed thereof they brought away a great snake or serpent, which of it selfe embarked in their ship, and wherein they were verily persuaded, that the puissance and divine power of the said god was resident. And when they had conducted it with them by sea as farre as to Rome, it went forth of the owne accord, and swam to the Island within Tyberis, where it seiled: and in that very place where it tooke land, they erected a temple to Æsculapius. L. Porcius Cato, a Consular man, who had been Consul having the charge of an armie, was condemned, and had a round fine set upon his head for that he employed his souldiours about some worke in one of his fermes. The league was now the fourth time renewed with the Samnites, at their earnest suit and request. Curius Dentatus the Consul, after he had defeated and slaine the Samnites, vanquished the Sabines, who were revolted and rebelled, and received them under his obeisance, triumphed twice during the time of one Consulship. Three Colonies were erected, and peopled, to wit, Castrum, Sena, and Adria. The three Triumvirs to sit upon capitall crimes, were then first created. A sisting was holden, and a solemne Lustrum, wherein by iust account were numbered 273000 citizens of Romans. The Commons, because they were deeply engaged in debt, in regard of greivous and long seditions and dissensions, retired in the end to Ianiculum, from whence they were reclaimed and brought againe into the cittie, by the meanes of Q. Hortensius the Dictator, who died in the very time of his Magistracie. This booke containeth moreover the exploits against the Volscians, and also the Lucanes, against whom it was thought good and ordained, to send aid and succours to the Tyrrhenians.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the twelfth Booke.

The Roman Embassadors being murdered by the Senois in Gaule, and warre thereupon denounced and proclaimed against them, Lucius Cæcilius the Pretour, furnished with his whole armie to bee defeated by them, and put to the sword. When the Romans fleet was spoiled and ransacked by the Tarentines, and their Admirall besides slaine, the Senate dispatched their Embassadors unto them to make complaint of these wrongs and outrages: but they were

A were evill intreated and sent away with great abuse. Whereupon, defiance was likewise given unto them, and warre proclaimed. The Samnites revolted. Against whom together with the Lucanes, Brutians, and Tuscans, sundrie battailes were fortunately fought by divers Roman captaines. Pyrrhus the King of the Epirotes, or the Albanos, passed over into Italy, for to aid the Tarentines. When a Legion of the Campanians was sent under the conduct of Decius Iubellius to Rhegium, there to lie in garison, they treacherously slew the naturall inhabitants, and seized the cittie of Rhegium to their owne behoofe.

Alerius Levinus the Consul, lost a field against Pyrrhus: by occasion principally that his souldiours were terrified and amazed at the uncomth sight of the Elephants. After that battaile, when Pyrrhus viewed and beheld the dead bodies of the Romanes lying slaine on the ground, he observed & marked, that all their faces were turned toward the enemy affrants. From thence he went forward spoiling and wasting all the way to Rome. C. Fabricius was sent unto him for to treat about the redemption and ranome of the prisoners: and was solicited by the King (but in vaine) to abandon the service of his owne countrie. The foresaid prisoners were enlarged and sent home without paying any ranome at all. Cyneas was sent as Embassador from the King unto the Senat; who required, that the K. his master, for to end and compound all quarrells, might be received into the cittie and amitie of the people of Rome: but when it was thought meet to debate and consult of this important matter, in a more frequent assemblee of the Senators, Appius Claudius who many a day had not intermedled with the affaires of State and Counsell, presented himself in the court among the Senators: where his opinion carried the matter cleare away, and Pyrrhus his demaund was flatly denied. P. Domitius the first Censor of Commoners, held a Lustrum or survey of the cittie, in which were found 278222 Roman citizens by the pol. A second field was fought against Pyrrhus, but with doubtfull event and issue. With the Carthaginians, the alliance was renewed now the fourth time. When a certaine fugitive traitour that ran from Pyrrhus, offered to C. Fabricius the Consul, for to poison the K. he was sent backe againe, and the treason was discovered to the king. Over & besides, this booke containeth the prosperous affaires in warre against the Tuscans, Lucanians, Brutians, and Samnites.

Pyrhus passed the seas into Sicilie. When among other prodigies and fearefull tokens, the image of Iupiter in the Capitoll, was overt browne and smitten downe with lightning, the head thereof was recovered & found again by the soothsaiers. Curius Dentatus, as he was taking musters, sold in part-sale the goods of one, that would not answere to his name when he was called. He defeated Pyrrhus, after his return againe out of Sicily into Italy, & forced him to void & depart once for all. Fabricius a Censor, casted and displaced out of his Senators rowme, P. Cornelius Rufinus, one that had been Consul, for that he had in silver plate, to the waight of ten pounds. There was a Lustrum holden by the Censors, and therein were found 271224 citizens. A societie and alliance was contracted with Ptolomee K. of Egypt. Sexilia a professed vestall Nun was convicted of uncleannesse and fornication, & buried quick. Two new Colonies were erected, to wit, Posidonia and Cosa. A fleet of Carthaginians, arrived, to aid the Mamertines: by occasion whereof, the league was broken. This booke compriset also, the happie exploits against the Lucanians, Samnites, and Brutians: together with the death of king Pyrrhus.

The Breviary of L. Florus, to the fifteenth Booke.

The Tarentines being vanquished, had both peate granted, & liberty also restored unto them. The souldiours of the Campanie legion aforesaid, which had possessed themselves of Rhegium, were besieged: and after they had absolutely yielded, were every one made shorter by the head. Certain lustie youths of Rome, who had misused & beaten the embassadors of the Apollonians, sent sent unto the Senat, were delivered unto their hands to be used according to their discretion. The Picentes were overcome in battaile, and obtained peace. Two Colonels were sent, the one to Ariminum within the marches of Picenum, (i.e. Ancona) the other to Beneuentum, in Samnium. Now and never before began the Romans to use silver coin for their monie. The Umbrians and Salernines were vanquished, and their submission of obedience received. The number of the Quæstor was augmented [to be eight].

The Breviary of L. Florus, to the sixteenth Booke.

* The inhabitants of Messana

* Eurypylus saith 392000.

HE first rising of the Carthaginians, with the beginning of their citie, are in this booke related: Against whom together with Hiero King of the Syracusians, the Senat of Rome ordained to send aid unto the * Mamertines: and after much arguing and debate about this point, whiles some perswaded, & others againe dissuaded; the gentlemen of Rome, who served on horsebacke, then first crossed the sea, and bare themselves bravely in many battailes & to good purpose, against Hiero: who at length craved peace, and had it granted. The Censors held a Lustrum and numbered the people: and enrolled * 372224 citizens of Rome into the subsidie booke. D. Iunius Brutus was the first that ever represented combats of swordsmen at the sharpe to the utterance; in the honour of his father late deceased. One Colonie was planted at Æsernia. This booke comprehendeth besides, the good successe of the affaires against the Carthaginians and the Vulsinians.

Neus Cornelius the Consul, being surprised & environed with a fleet of Carthaginians, and under colour of a parle, trained forth and called unto them; was villainously taken prisoner and kept still with them. Cn. Duillius the Consull, fought with happy successe against this their foresaid fleet: and was the first Romane captaine that rode in triumph, for a navall viclorie at sea. In regard whereof, this honour for ever after was done unto him. That when he sopped forth in any place of the citie, as he returned home to his owne house, the waites should sound; the handbells all the way, and a man go before him with a burning torch. L. Cornelius the Consull won a field in Sardinia against the Ilanders, together with the Corsians, & Hanno the General of the Carthaginians. Atilius Calatinus the Consull, having unadvisedly engaged his armie within a place of great disadvantage, whereas the Carthaginians lay round about in ambush, retired and escaped by the valour and industrious meanes of M. Calpurnius, a Colonell: who with a regiment of 300 foot venturously sallied out, and turned all the forces of the enemies upon himselfe. One Anniball a Carthaginian Commander, upon the defeature of the Armada whereof he was Admirall, was by his owne soldiers trussed up, and crucified. Atilius Regulus the Consull, having in battaile at sea vanquished the Carthaginians, sailed over into Affricke

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the eighteenth Booke.

Tullius Regulus the Consul, slew [in Affricke] a serpent of a mightie and wonderfull bignesse, but with the exceeding losse of his soldiers. And after many encounters and battailes with the Carthaginians, when the Senat by reason of his so happy conduct & management of the war, sent no other to succeed him, he dispatched his letters unto them and complained thereof: and among other pregnant reasons that he alledged for to have a successor to come unto him, this was one: That the little inheritance and living which he had suffered wast, by the default or lewdnesse of his bailiffes of his bandrie. Meane whiles, as if fortune had bene disposed and fought meanes to shew a notable example in the person of this one man Regulus, as well of adversitie as prosperitie, he was overthrowen in plaine field, & taken prisoner by Xanthippus, a renowned captaine of the Lacedæmonians, whom the Carthaginians had waged & sent for to aid the. After this, the navall shipwracke of the Romane Navie, eclipsed, obscured, and disfigured all the other noble exploits that the Romane Chieftaines had for happily achieved before, as well by land as sea. T. Coruncanius was the first high Priest

A or Archprebiter created out of the bodie of the Commons. M. Sempronius Sophus & M. Valerius Maximus the Censors, when they made a review of the Senat, castrd thirtene, and tooke their embroidered purple clothes from them. They held a survey also of the whole citie, and entered into their subsidie booke 317247 Romane citizens. Regulus being sent from the Carthaginians to the Senat of Rome, to treat a peaceable accord, and if he could not obtaine so much, to deale about the exchange of prisoners one for another, bound himselfe by an oath to returne againe to Carthage, if hested not for the exchange afore said. And being come to Rome, himselfe dissuaded both the one and the other: howbeit, to accomplish and performe his promise by oath given, he made returne accordingly; and by the Carthaginians was despiteously put to cruell torture, and so died.

Aius Cecilius Metellus, in consideration of his fortunate conduct of the warres against the Carthaginians, rode in a most stately & magnificent triumph: wherein were shewed and led captives 13 chiefe Captaines of the enemies, and 120 Elephants. Claudius Pulcher the Consull, who maugre the adverse presages of the Auspices, would needs hazard a battaile, commaunded the sacred Pullets to be daused and drenched over the head in the water, to see if they would drinke, since they refused to eat their meate, and received an overthrow at sea in a conflict with the Carthaginians. For which, he was called home by the Senat, and commaunded to nominate a Dictator: whereupon he declared C. Glauca, a base companion, and a person of the meanest degree and qualittie: who being constrained to resigne his Magistracie, yet notwithstanding afterwards beheld the games and plaies in his mantle of estate. Atilius Calatinus was the first Romane Dictatour, that led an armie out of Italie. An exchange was made of Romane captives for Carthaginians. Two Colonies were transported, namely to Fregelle, and to Brundisum, in the territories of the Solentines. Another Lustrum was taken by the Censors: wherein were reckoned of Rom. citizens 251222. Claudia, the sister of that P. Claudius, who in contempt and despite of the Auspices, fought a battaile to great losse, fortunèd upon a time as shee came from the great Flaies, to be crowned in the thrise and prease of people; whereupon shee cryed out with a loud voyce, Would God my brother were alive againe, and had the charge of another Armado: for which words, she had a good fine set on her head, and paid it. Two Pretors were now created, the first that ever were at Rome. Cecilius Metellus the high priest, kept perforce within the citie, A. Posthumius the Consull, because he was besides the Flamin unto Mars; and would not suffer him to be Non-resident, and absent himselfe from his charge. After sundry battailes and conflicts that many Romane Captaines had against the Carthaginians, C. Lucatius the Consull obtiained the honour of the finall victorie, when he had defeated their Fleete; and so made a full end of the first Punick warre. The Carthaginians therefore sued for peace, and had it granted. At what time as the Temple of Vesta was on a light fire, Cecilius the high priest, recovered and saved out of the flame the holie reliques. Two tribes were added to the rest, Velina and Quirina. The Falisci rebelled, and within sixe daies were subdued, and brought under subiection.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the twentieth Booke.

Colonie was planted at Spoleum. An armie was led against the Ligurians [i.e. Genovaites], which was the first time that they were warred upon. The Sardinians and the Corsians, who revolted & tooke armes, were subdued. Tuccia a Vestal virgin & a Votarie was condemned and executed for her incest or whoredome. Warre was proclaimed against the Illyrians, for that they killed one of the ambassadors which were sent unto them, and being defeated, confessed themselves subiects to the Romans. The number of the Pretors was increased from two to foure. The Gauls inhabiting beyond the Alps (toward France) who came downe and entered into Italy, were overthrowen and put to the sword. In which warre, the Romanes had by report of the Latines and other confederates and allies, to the number of 300000 fighting men, that served under them. The Romain forces passed then first, over the river Padus [i.e. Po], where the french Insubrians [i.e. Lombards] after certaine disputes, were glad to be ruled by reason, and rendred themselves. Mar. Claudius Marcellus the Consull, having slaine Viridumarus the Generall of the Lombards with his own hand, went away with the

the honor of the third rich and royall spoyle gotten from the enemye. The Istrians were subdued: so were the Illyrians also, after they had revolted and put themselves in armes, and were so tame, that they came under obedience. The Censors held a Lustrum, and took account of the number of the Romane citizens, and found in all 270000. The Libertines (or slaves enfranchised) were reduced into foure tribes by themselves; to wit, Esquilina, Palatina, Suburana, and Collina: whereas before time, they had bene dispersed indifferently, and mingled among the rest. C. Flaminius the Censor, paved the high way called Flaminia, and built the great Circus, or Theater named Flaminius Circus. And thereunto were established within those territories, that were conquered from the Gauls, to wit, Placentia, and Cremona.

* Placentia.

THE XXI. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and twentieth Booke.

At this booke are rehearsed the acts which passed in Italie, as touching the second Punicke warre, and how Anniball, the chiefe commander of the Carthaginians, contrary to the accord of alliance passed over the river Iberus: by whom, Saguntum a citie belonging to the allies of the people of Rome, was in the eight month of the siege forced by assault. For to complaine of those wrongs and injuries, Ambassadors were sent to the Carthaginians. And for that they would not make satisfaction and amendes therefore, warre was proclaimed against them. Anniball having passed over the mountaines Pyrenes, and discomfited the Volscians, who made head against him, and would have empeached his passage, mounted the Alpes, and after hee had passed through them with great difficultie and paines, and repulsed also the French mountaineers in sundrie skirmishes and battailes, he descended into Italie: and nere the river Ticius, discomfited and disavaied the Romanes in a battaile of Cavallerie. In which conflict, when P. Cornelius Scipio was wounded, his sonne (the same who afterwards was surnamed Africanus) rescued him, and saved his life. Anniball after he had defeated the Romane armie a second time, nere the river Trebia, passed over the Apennine: where his souldiours were mightily afflicted and distressed, by reason of soule weather and violence of storme and tempest. Cn. Cornelius Scipio sped well in his warres against the Carthaginians within Spaine, and tooke prisoner Mago, the Generall commander of the enemyes.

Ha same may I well say, in the Preface and entrance of this one part of my worke, which most writers of histories have promised and made profession of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write the most famous and memorable warre that ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Anniball fought with the people and State of Rome. For neither any other cities or nations are knowne to have warred together, more wealthie and puissant than they; nor at any time ever, were they themselves so great, so strong in forces, and so mightie in meanes, as now they were. Moreover, they came not newly now, to wage war, without knowledge of the prowesse and marshall skill, one of another: for in all they had made thereof sufficient already, in the first punicke warre. Besides, so variable was the fortune of the field, so doubtfully were their battailes fought, that neither losse and danger were they, who in the end won the better, and atchieved the victorie. And to conclude, the man observe the whole course and proceeding of these their warres, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: whiles the Romans tooke foule scorn and disdain, that they, who before was to be vanquished, should unprovoked, begin warre with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians again were as mal-content, and thoroughly offended.

offended, as taking themselves (notwithstanding they were overcome) to be abused too much at their hands, by their proud, insolent, and covetous rule over them. Over and besides all this, the report goeth, that Anniball being but nine yeares old, or therabouts, came fawning and flattering as wanton children doe, to his father Amilcar, that hee would take him with him into Spaine; at what time, as after the Affricane war ended, his father was offering sacrifice, readie to passe over thither with an armie: where he was brought to the altar side, and induced to lay his hand thereupon, and to touch the sacrifice, and so to sweare, that so soone as ever he were able, he would be a professed and mortall enemy to the people of Rome. Vexed (no doubt) at the heart, was Amilcar himselfe, a man of high spirit and great courage, for the losse of the islands Sicilie and Sardinia: for not onely Sicilie was overthrowen (as he thought) as despairing too soone of the state therof, and doubting how it should be defended: but also Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practise of the Romanes surprised out of the Carthaginians hands, whiles they were troubled with the commotion & rebellion of Affricke; and a Tribute besides imposed upon them. He being disquieted, I say, and troubled with these greeds and discontentments, so bare himselfe for five yeares space in the Affricke warre, which ensued immediately upon the peace concluded with the Romanes; and likewise after, in Spaine, for nine yeares together, enlarging ever still the dominion of Carthage; that all the world might see, he intended and designed a greater warre than that he had in hand; and if God had spared him longer life, it should have bene well scene that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilcar, would have made that warre upon Italie, which afterward they waged by the conduct of Anniball. But the death of Amilcar happening in so good season [for the Romanes] and the childhood and tender nonage of Anniball together, were the cause that this war was put off and deferred. In the meane time, between the father and the sonne, Asdruball bare all the rule for the space almost of eight yeares. This Asdruball had ben Amilcar his minion, growne highly into his grace and favour, at the first (as men say) for the very prime and flower of his youth; but afterwards, in regard of the singular towardnesse of a brave and haughtie mind, which soone appeared in him, and for his forwardnesse to action, hee was preferred to be his sonne in law, and married his daughter. Now, for as much as he was Amilcar his sonne in law, he was advanced to the soveraigne conduct of the warre, with no good liking at all and consent of the Nobilitie and Peeres, but by the meanes and favour onely of the Barchine faction, which bare a great stroke, and might do all in all, among the souldiours and the common people. Who managed all his affaires, more by pollicie and sage counsell, than by force and violence: and using the authoritie and name of the Princes and great Lords of those countries, and by intertaining friendship with the cheefe rulers, woun daily the hearts of new nations still, and by that meanes enlarged the power and siegnorie of the Carthaginians in Spain, rather than by any warre & force of armes. But for all this peace with forraigne States, he was never the more sure of his owne life at home. For a certaine barbarous fellow, for anger that his maister and Lord was by him put to death, slew him in open place: and being laid hold on by them that were attendant about Asdruball his person, he kept the same countenance still, as if he had escaped and gone cleare away: yea, and when hee was by cruell torments all mangled and torne, hee looked so cheerefully and pleasantly on the matter, as if he had seemed to smile; so far his joy of heart surpassed the paines and anguish of his bodie. With this Asdruball, for that hee had so singular a gift and wonderfull dexteritie, in solliciting and annexing unto his dominion the Nations aforesaid, the people of Rome had renewed the league, upon these two capitulations and conditions; first, that the river * Iberus should limite and determine the siegnories of them both: Item, that the Saguntines, seated in the midst between the territories of both Nations should remaine free, and enjoy their auncient liberties.

No doubt at all there was now, but when a new Commander should succeed in the rowle of Asdruball, the favour of the people would goe cleare with the prerogative voice and choise of the souldiours: who presently brought young Anniball into the Generall his pavilion, and with exceeding great acclamation and accord of all, saluted him by the name of Capitaine Generall. For this you must understand, that Asdruball by his letters missive had sent for him: being verie young, and hardly 14 yeares of age; yea, and the matter was debated first in the counsell house at Carthage, where they of the Barchine side, laboured & followed the matter earnestly, that Anniball should be trained in warfare, & grow up to succeed his father in equal proesse and greatnesse. But Hanno the cheefe man of the contrarie faction; It is but meet and reason (quoth hee) that

Asdruball

Asdruball doth demand: and yet for mine own part I thinke it not good, that his request should be granted. When they mused and marvelled much at this so doubtful speech of his, and wist not what construction to make of it. Why then, (quoth Hanno) to be plaine, That floure and beauty of youth, which Asdruball himselfe yeilded and parted withall sometimes unto Anniball his father, for to use or abuse at his pleasure; the same he thinketh by good right he may charge long and have againe, from the sonne, to make quittance. But it becometh not us, for to acquaint our young youths with the campe, that under the colour, and in steed of their militarie institution and teaching, they abandon and give their bodies to serve the lust and appetite of the Generals. What? Is this the thing we feare? That the sonne of Amilcar should tarie too long ere he see the excessive grandeur and soveraintie of his father, and the stateley shew as it were of his roialtie? Or doubtles, that we shall not soone enough serve in all dutifull allegiance his naturall sonne, unto whose sonne in law, all our armies have been left (as it were) in lawfull right of inheritance? Nay, I am of opinion, and this is my judgement, That this youth be kept in awe at home, under obedience of lawes, under civile magistrates, and learne a while to live in equall condition with the rest of the citizens, and subjects; for feare least at one time or other, this little sparke doe burne, outright and raise a mightie flame. A few, and those were, in manner all of the best sort and soundest judgement, accorded with Hanno. But as commonly it is scene, the greater number overweighed the better.

Thus Anniball was sent into Spaine, and immediately at his first comming, drew all the whole armie after him: so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old soldiours beleaved verily, that Amilcar was alive againe, & come amongst them: they thought they beheld and saw the same vigor and spirit in his countenance and visage, the same quicknesse and livenesse in his eyes, the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had so wrought and wound himselfe into their favour, that the late remembrance of his father, was the least matter of all others, that woun him grace and love among them. Never was there one and the selfe same nature, framed and fitted better, for two things that are in qualitie most contrarie; namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly discern and judge, whether he was more deere unto the Generall for the one, or to the armie for the other. For neither Asdruball would make choise of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed; nor the soldiours put more confidence in any other leader, nor go more boldly and resolutely to any enterprize, than under him. Most forward he was and hardie to all hazards and dangerous adventures: right provident and warie againe, at the verie point of perill and jeopardy. No travaile was able to wearie and tire his bodie: no paines taking, could daunt and brake his heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet & feeding, he measured both his meat and drinke by his naturall appetite, and not by pleasure and delight-some tast. For sleeping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once performed his service, and finished his exploits; if there were any spare time after, therein would he take his rest and repose: and that, should not be upon a soft bed neither, nor procured with great curiositie by still silence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good soldiours jacket and homely cassocke cast over him, even among the Sentinels and corps de gard. For his apparrell, it was not more costly nor braver than his fellowes and companions; many in his armour and hories he loved ever to be goodly be-seene above all other. Amongst footmen and horsemen both, he would alwaies be a great way formost. And to conclude, in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin the battaile, he was by his good will ever the first, and when the fight was done, the last man seen to retire out of the field. Of these so noble qualities, and manly vertues, he had not so many, but there were as great vices and imperfections in him againe, to counterpoise the same. Cruellie most savage and inhumane, falsehood and trecherie more than * Punicke: no truth, no honestie, no feare of God, no regard of oth, no conscience, nor religion.

Disposed thus as he was, and inclined by nature, to vertues and vices, he served full three yeares under Generall Asdruball. During which time, he omitted & forgot no one thing, that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himselfe another day to be a captain and chiefe Commander in the warres. From the verie first day that he was chosen and declared Lord General; as if at the same instant, Italie had ben the province assigned unto him, as if, I say, he had received commission to warre with the Romanes, he thought good to make no delais, for feare least haply whiles he lingred and slackt the time, some mischance might prevent his designs and cut him short, like as it had overtaken his father first, and Asdruball afterwards: but presently determined to make war upon the Saguntines, by assailing whom, the Romanes no doubt were touched, and would take armes and enter into the quarrell. But first he led his armie into the marches of the Olcades (a nation beyond Iberus, rather siding & taking part with the Carthaginians, than under their jurisdiction) that he might not seeme to have shott at the Saguntines and intended ought against them directly: but that by order and course of his affaires, after he had subdued the countries bordering upon them, he had been drawne (as it were) for vicinitie and neighbourhead sake to that warre, and to joine them also with the rest unto the Empire. And first he wan by force, and sacked Carthia, a rich citie, the seat towne and chiefe place of all that nation. Whereupon, other meaner and smaller cities also, for feare came under his obedience, and yielded to pay tribute. His armie then after these victories, and enriched with spoile and pillage, was brought backe to new Carthage, there for to winter. Where he made sure unto him the hearts and affectionate love, as well of his owne countymen as of the allies, partly by bestowing the pillage liberally among them, and partly by making true payment of soldiours wages for the time past. And then in the verie prime of the spring, he went forward to warre upon the Vaccei. He forced by assault Hermandica and Arbacula, two townes of the Carthij. Arbacula by the manhood and multitude of the towesmen held out a long time. But certaine fugitives that were fled from Hermandica, having rallied themselves, & joined with other exiled persons of the Olcades, a nation the summer before subdued, raised also the Carpetanes to take armes: and set upon Anniball, in his returne from the Vaccei, and not farre from the river Tagus, troubled and disordred his march, heavily charged with spoile and bootie. Anniball forbore to fight, and encamped himselfe upon the banke of the river: and so soone as the enemies were in their first sleepe, and all still & hush, passed over with his armie at the fowrd: and after he had pitched his camp so farre off from the river side, as that his enemies might have rowne enough to march away besides him, he determined to set upon them as they should passe over the river. To his horsemen he gave commandement to charge upon the regiment of footmen, so soone as they perceived them to have taken the water: and upon the banke he arranged forie Elephants afront them. There were of the Carpetanes, counting the aides and succours of the Olcades and Vaccei, 100000 strong: an armie invincible, if they had fought on even & indifferent ground. Who being both by nature fierce and courageous, and for multitude confident; presumptuous besides, upon their imagination that the enemy was retired for feare; supposed that the only stay of their victorie, was, because the river ran between: and setting up a shout and outcrie, without direction of any leader, in all disorder they ran into the river here and there, everie man what way was next him. Now from the other side of the banke, a great troupe of horsemen were entered into the river, encountered them in the mids of the chanell, and fought with great advantage. For whereas the footmen unsteadie and not able to keepe fast footing, and hardly trusting the fowrd, might easily be cast aside & overturned, even by naked horsemen, if they did but put forth and pricke forward their horses it skilled not how: the horsemen on the other side having their bodies at libertie, and able to weld their weapon, with their horses under them standing sure even in the mids of the streame and whirlepooles, might with ease either fight close hand to hand, or assaile the enemies aloofe. Many of them besides perished in the water: some by the whirling waves of the river were driven upon the enemies, and by the Elephants troded under foot, and crushed to death. The hinmost, who might with more safety recover their owne banke, after they were rallied together into one from divers places, as feare had scattered them: before they could upon so great a fright, take heart and come againe to themselves, Anniball who with a foure square battailon had entred the river, forced to flie from the banke: and when he had wasted the countrie, within few daies brought the Carpetanes also under his obedience.

And now all beyond Iberus was subject to the Carthaginians, the Saguntines onely excepted. With whom as yet he would not seeme to warre: howbeit to minister some cause and occasion thereof, quarrels were picked, and seeds of dissensions sowne between them and their neighbours, namely the Turderanes. Vnto whose aid, when he was come, that was himselfe the fower of all the variance, and had set them together by the eares; and when it appeared plainly that it was not a matter of right to be tried by law, but an occasion rather sought of fight and open war; then the Saguntines sent their embassadors to Rome, for to crave aid against that warre, which

A doubtlesse was at hand. The Consuls at that time of Rome, were P. Cornelius Scipio, and Titus Sempronius Longus; who having brought the embassadors into the Countsell house, and proposed matters unto the LL. there, concerning the weale publick, and decreed to send their embassadors into Spaine to take survey, and looke into the state of their allies: who also if they thought it meere, should give Anniball warning, not to meddle with their confederates; and molest the Saguntines; and withall, to sayle over to Carthage into Affricke; and there make relation of the complaints and greivances of the allies of the people of Rome: when I say, this embassage was decreed, but yet not sent, newes came sooner than all men looked for, that Saguntum was already besieged. Then was the matter propounded new againe before the Senat. Some were of mind to dispatch the Consuls unto the provinces of Spaine and Affricke, with commission to make warre both by sea and land. Others thought better, to bend all their forces wholie into Spaine against Anniball. There were againe of opinion, that so great and weightie an enterprife was not hand over head; and rashly to be attempted; but rather that they should attend the returne of the embassadors out of Spaine: and this advise that seemed most safe, was held for the better, and tooke place. And therefore, so much the sooner were these embassadors P. Valerius Flaccus, and Q. Bebbius Pamphilus, addressed unto Anniball before Saguntum, with direction, from thence to go forward to Carthage (in case he would not desist and give over war) and for to demand the captaine himselfe, for amends and satisfaction of breaking the league. But whiles the Romanes were amused about these consultations and decrees, Saguntum was by this time with all forcible meanes assailed. This citie of all other most wealthie and rich, stood beyond Iberus, situate almost a mile from the sea. The inhabitants are sayd to have had their beginning out of the yland Zacynthus: and some among them, were descended from Ardea, a citie of the Rutilians: but they grew within short time to this puissance & wealth of theirs, partly by the fruits & renews of their lands, and partly by the traffick and gaine of their merchandise, and commodities transported by sea, as also by the great affluence and increase of people, and lastly, by their streight rule of discipline, whereby they observed their troth and loyalty with their allies, even to their owne ruine and final destruction.

Anniball after he had invaded their confines as an enemy, and by way of hostilitie, with his armie overrun and wasted their countrie, besieged and assailed the citie three waies. There was one canton or angle of the wall shooting out into a more plaine and open valley, than any other place all about: against which he meant to raise certaine mantlets or fabricks, under which he might approach with the Ram to batter the wall. But as the place farre from the wall, was even enough and handfome for such engines of batterie to be driven upon: so after that they came to the prooff and execution indeed, the successe answered nothing to the enterprife begun. For besides that there was a mightie towre overlooked and commaunded them, the wall it selfe (as in a place doubted and suspected) was more fortified and rayfed higher there, than elsewhere: and also the chosen youth and ablest men were bestowed there, to make more forcible resistance, where there was like to be most trouble and danger. And first with shot of darts and quarels, and such like, they put the enemy back, and would not suffer the pioners and labourers in any place to entrench or rayse rampiers in safetie. In proceffe also, they shot not from the wall only and that towre, and shewed themselves there in armes for defense, but also their harts served them to sallie forth, and to breake into the gards of the enemies, yea and to enter upon their trenches and fabricks. In which skirmishes there dyed not many more Saguntines than Carthaginians. But so soone as Anniball himselfe, approaching unadvisedly under the wall fortunated to be wounded greivously in the forepart of his thigh, with a dart or light javelin, and therewith fell to the ground; they all about him fled so fast, and were so skared, that they had like to have geven over quite & abandoned their mantlets, & other fabricks afore sayd. After this, for some few dayes, whiles their Generall was under cure of his hurt, they lay at siege rather, than followed the assault. In which meane time, as they rested from skirmish, so they ceased not to invent new devises, and to prepare new fabricks. Whereupon the assault began againe more hote than before: and in many parts at once they fell to raise rolling mantlets, so many & so thick, that some places would not receive them; and withall, to drive the Ram against the walls. Anniball had men good store, for it is thought he was 150000 in campe, strong. The towesmen with devising meanes to defend, and see to every place, began to have their hands full: but all would not serve. For now were the walls beaten with the rams, and many parts thereof shaken and battered: and at one place above the rest, by continuall batterie there was such a breach, as the towne lay open and naked to the enemy. After that, three turrets, and all the courtine betweene, fell downe with a mightie and horrible crash, in so much as the Carthaginians thought verily that with that rush the towne had bene woon: By which breach, as if the wall had protected both parties before, they ran forth together on each side to fight. The battaile was not like to a tumultuarie skirmish, such as are wont to be about assaults of cities, by the occasion and advantage. Of the one part, on the other; but a very set and ranged field (as it were) in an open ground betweene the breaches of the wall, and the houses of the towne, that stood a pretie way distant within-forth. Of one side they were pricked forward with hope, on the other with despaire; whiles Anniball thought verily that he was maister of the towne already, if he held on but a little longer; and the Saguntines seeing their towne bare, and voyd of walls, opposed their bodies in the breach, not one stepping back a foote, least in the space betweene he should let in the enemy. The more fiercely therefore, and the thicker and closer that they fought together on both parts, the more were wounded; and there was not a dart could light in vaine, betweene their bodies and their armour, but it did mischief. The Saguntines used a weapon called Falarica, in manner of a dart, which they let lie & launced from them, having a long shaft or steale, round and even every where, but toward the one end, where it was headed with iron, & bound about with tow, & smeared with pitch. The yron head was three foote long, that it might pierce both haireffe and bodie through. But the greatest skare that it did was this, although it stuck fast in the targuet, and entered not into the bodie, that being driven and flung, when the middle part was set on fire, by the motion thereof as it flew, it gathered much more fire, forced the souldier to forsake his armour, and exposed him disarmed and naked to the shot following. Well, the fight continued double full a long time, by reason that the Saguntines tooke better heart unto them, because they had relied beyond their hope and expectation: and the Carthaginians toke themselves vanquished, for that they had not gotten the victorie, and better hand: whereupon, the townesmen all at once set up a crie, and beat the enemies back to the very breaches, and ruines of the wall, and from thence thrust them out cleane, whiles they were thus encombred and affrighted, yea and at last discomfited them, put them to flight, and chased them as farre as their campe.

In this meane while newes came, that there were embassadours arrived from Rome: unto whom Anniball dispatched certaine messengers to meete with them at sea side, and to give them to understand, That neither they might safely with securitie of their persons come among the broiles of so many barbarous & fierce nations, nor their maister Anniball amid those dangerous and trouble some affaires, had any leysure to attend or give audience unto embassages. He knew full well, that the embassadours being not received and entertained, would straight to Carthage. Whereupon, he addrest aforehand his letters and courtiours to the chiefe of the Barchine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that side, so, as they of the other part might not gratifie, or do any thing in favour of the Romanes. By which meanes, besides that they were neither admitted by Anniball, nor audience given them, that embassage also was in vaine, & tooken effect at Carthage. Onely Hanno, notwithstanding the whole bodie of the Senate was against him, spake with great silence and assent of the hearers, by reason of his authoritie and reputation, and pleaded to the point of the breach of league, in this wise. I have, quoth he, foretold and warned you in the name and for the love of the gods, who are the witnesses and judges of covenants and confederacies, I have I say, admonished you, that ye should not send Amilcar his sonne, or any of his breed unto the campe: for that neither the ghost and spirit, nor the progenie and race of that man can rest and be quiet; nor the Romans league will ever be assured and established, so long as there remained one alive of the Barchine name and familie. But sent ye have for all my words, unto your armies, a youth boyling in ambition, inflamed with a covetous desire of being a King, and one that seeth no other way thereto, but by bruining one warre after another, to live garded with armies and legions about him. In which action of yours, ye have as it were ministered dry fwell, and put oyle to the fire: ye have, I say, fed that fire, wherewith ye now are set a burning. Your armies now besiege Saguntum, from which by covenant and verue of the league they are debarred. Within a while and shortly, will the Roman legions lye in siege before Carthage, under the conduct and guidance, no doubt, of those gods, by whose support and aid in the former warre, they were revenged for the breach of the accord and alliance. What? know ye not yet, either your enemy, or your selyes, or the fortune of both nations? This good

Captaine

A Captaine and gentle General, forsooth, of your making, would not admit and receive into his campe, Embassadours comming from our allies, and in the behalfe also of our allies: wherein he abolished the law of Nations: Howbeit, they having taken a repulse, from whence even the very Embassadours of enemies, are not wont to be repelled, are come unto you, and by verue of their league demand amends of trespassse, and restitution or satisfaction for their damages. And presuppose the State bee not touched nor culpable in this Action, they require no more, but to have the author himselfe in person, who is the offender. The more gently they deale, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more obstinate they will be, and continue with greater rigor (fear me) if they once begin. Set before your eyes the Islands Agates, & Eryx: and what for these foure and twentie yeares past, ye have endured both by land and sea. Neither was this beardlesse boy our captaine then, but his father Amilcar himselfe, even a second Mars, as these his supposts would have him. But what of that? We could not then, according to our league, hold our hands, and let Tarentum in Italie alone, like as now we are doing with Saguntum. Therefore, both God and man tooke the matter in hand, and vanquished us in the end: and when wee were at arguing and debating the case with discourse of words about this point, Whether Nation of the twaine had broken the league? the event of warre, as an indifferent and equall judge, awarded victorie where the right was. And Carthage it is, against which, Anniball even now hath reared mantelets, towers, and other engines of assault: even now, battereth & shakeeth he Carthage walls with the Ram. The ruins of Saguntum (God graunt I be a false Prophet) will fall upon our heads, and the warre begun with the Saguntines, we must maintaine against the Romanes. How then? (will some man say) shall wee yeeld Anniball unto them? I know well, how small my authoritie is in this point, by reason of the old grudge and enmitie betweene me & his father deceased. Howbeit, as I reioiced, that Amilcar was dead, for that if hee had lived still, wee should ere now have warred with the Romanes: so this very youth, an impe of his, I hate & detest as the very furie and firebrand of this war: whom I would have, by my good wil, not only to be rendred unto them, for to purge & expiate the breach of league; but if no man would challenge him for to be punished, I would award, that he should be caried and transported as far as there is sea or land, & to be sent away thither, from whence we might not once hear of him againe, & where he might never trouble the quiet & peaceable state of this citie any more. Over and besides, my opinion & resolution is, that some Embassadours besent presently to Rome, to satisfie the Senat: and others also, with a message to Anniball, that he withdraw his forces from Saguntum: & with commission, to render up Anniball himselfe into the Romans hands, according to the tenor of the league: & a third Embassage likewise to the Saguntines, for to make restitution and amends for their harms & losses already sustained. When Hanno had made an end of his speech, it was altogether needlesse, that any one man there should make replie, and debate the matter with him by way of Oration, the whole Senat was so possessed already & wrought for Anniball: and with one voice they blamed Hanno, and sounded it out, That he had made a bitterer speech, and more favoring of an enemy, than Flaccus Valerius himselfe the Roman Embassadour. After this, the Roman Embassadours had this answer returned, That the warre began by the Saguntines, and not by Anniball. Also, that the people of Rome offered them injurie, in preferring the Saguntines before the most ancient alliance of the Carthaginians. While the Romanes thus spent time in sending Embassages, Anniball having wearied his men, what with skirmishes, and what with trenching and raising mounds and fabrickes, he gave them rest some few daies, and bestowed certaine good guards to ward and keepe the mantelets and other engines of batterie. In the meane season he encouraged his souldiours, and set their hearts on fire, partly by pricking and provoking them to anger against their enemies, and partly by tilling them on, and alluring them with hope of great rewards. But after he had once in a generall assemblie, made proclamation, That the spoile and pillage should be the souldiours share; they were all so enkindled and enflamed, that if presently he had founded the signall of battaile, it seemed, that no force in the world had been able to resist them. The Saguntines, as they had some rest from skirmish, and continued certaine daies, neither assailing nor assailed: so they gave not over labouring night and day, for to make up a newe wall and countermure, on that side of the towne which lay open by reason of breaches. But after this, grew the assault more hote and furious than before: neither wist they well (the shouts and alarmes were so divers & dissonant on every side) whether to come first, or where was most need of helpe and succour. Anniball himselfe was present in person to encourage and exhort his souldiours diours where as the rouling tower was driven, which was so high, that it overlooked all the mures and countrefabrickes of the citie, and being once approached neere the walls, furnished as it was in every loft and storie, with ordinance of quarell shot, brakes, and other artilerie, beat the defendants from off the walls, so as none durst abide upon them. Then Anniball taking the time, supposing that he had now a good oportunitie presented unto him, sent about 5000 Affricans that were pionsers with picke axes, mattocks and such like tooles, to undermine the wal, yea, and to dig into it from the very foundation. And that was no hard matter to do, for that the cement or mortar was not hardened and bound with lime, but tempered with earth and clay, after the old manner of building: and therefore the wall came tumbling downe, before it was broken and brought in to: and through the wide breaches, whole troopes of armed fouldiours entered the towne; and withall, they seized one high place above the rest, whereon they planted their artilerie and ordinance of slings and brakes, and cast a wall about it, that they might have within the very citie a fort and bastillon of their owne, like a castle to overlooke all. The Saguntines likewise raised another mure with in forth along that side where the towne as yet was not taken. So that on both sides they made fortifications, and also fought with all their might and main. But the Saguntines defending the inner parts, by little and little brought the towne daily into a smaller compass. And by that meanes, as also by reason of the long siege, as for want of all things grew more and more, so the expectation of forraigne aide and succour was everie day lesse than other: the Romans their onely hope, being so farre off, and their enemies so neere on every hand. Howbeit, the suddaine rode and journey of Anniball against the Oretanes and Carpetanes, refreshed for a while their troubled and afflicted spirits. These two nations being risen upon a discontentment of a straight muster and rigorous levie of fouldiours, had staied and detained those Muster-maisters, that had in commission to take up all sufficient and able men for the warres, and so, made some shew & feare of rebellion: but being prevented in the beginning by the speedie coming of Anniball, were soone quiet, and laid downe their armes. But the assault of Saguntum continued nevertheless. For Maharball, Himilco his sonne, whom Anniball had left behind as Lieutenant, so bestirred himselfe, that neither the towne men nor the enemies found the miserie absence of the Generall. This Maharball had made some fortunate skirmishes, and with three rammes shaken a good part of the wall, so as hee shewed to Anniball at his returne; all lying along and every place full of fresh ruines. Whereupon the armie was presently brought against the verie castle of the citie, where began a cruell and bloudie conflict, with the slaughter of many on both sides, and one part of the said fortress was forced and woen.

Afterwards there was some treatie of peace and agreement, by meanes of two persons, Alcon a Saguntine, and Alorcus a Spaniard, and some small hope there was of it. Alcon supposing hee could somewhat prevail by way of request and entreating, without knowledge of the Saguntines, departed away by night to Anniball. But after that hee saw, that with all his weeping he could doe no good, but that heave and intollerable articles and capitulations of peace were exhibited, as from a wrathfull conquerour; of an Orator, proved to be a very traitour, and remained still in the campe with the enemies, saying, that he was sure to die, who ever should move the Saguntines to peace, under those conditions. For demanded it was of the Saguntines, Imprimis, to make restitution to the Turdetanes of all harmes and losses. Item, to deliver up all their gold and silver. Item, to quit the towne, and depart but with one sure of apparell a peece; and there to dwell, where the Carthaginians would appoint. When Alcon avouched plainly, that the Saguntines would never accept of peace with these conditions, Alorcus replied againe and said, That seeing all things els now failed them, their hearts also must needs come downe and faile likewise; and therewith promised to deliver unto them the tenour of the said peace, and to bee a mediatour and dealer in the compassing thereof. At that time he served Anniball as a private fouldiour: howbeit, a publicke friend he was, and an host and guest of old to the Saguntines. Who having in sight of all men yielded up his offensive armes, to the warders of the enemies, and passed the rampiers, was brought (for so himselfe desired) before the Governour and Provost of Saguntum. Thether came running presently, a number of all sorts of people: but after the rest of the multitude were commanded to vould, Alorcus was called into their Counsell house, and having audience given, made this or the like speech unto them. If Alcon your countymen and fellow cittizen, as he came from you to Anniball for to treat about peace, had likewise brought backe againe unto you from Anniball the conditions and articles of peace, I needed not to have

The Oration of Alorcus a Span-

nate of Saguntum.

A taken this journey; who am come unto you neither as an Orator from Anniball, ne yet as a fugitive. But seeing he hath remained with the enemy, either through your default or his own, I know not whither: if he pretended & fained causelesse feare, himselfe is to blame; but if they stand in daunger that report a truth vnto you, then are ye in great fault. I therefore, to the end ye should not be ignorant, but that there are conditions offered to you of life, of safetie, & of peace, in regard of old amitie and acquaintance, in regard (I say) of mutuall intertainement long time between us, am now come unto you. And that ye may beleeve, that whatsoever you shal hear delivered from me, I speak it for your good, and for the favour of no man else; this one thing, if no more, may assure you, that neither so long as ye were able to make resistance by your own strength, nor all the while that ye hoped for aide from the Romanes, I never made word or mention of peace unto you. But seeing now, that ye have not any hope at all from the Romanes, and that your owne forces and citie wals, are able no longer to defend you: I present unto you a peace, more necessarie; I confesse, than equall and reasonable. Whereof you may have some hope, in these terms; namely, if as Anniball offereth and presenteth it like a conquerour, so you will heare of it; & accept thereof as conquered: if I say, ye will not make reckning of that which you forgoe as a losse and damage (seeing by extremitie all is the victors) but that which is left, as gaine and advantage, yea and freely given unto you. Your towne, whereof a great part is ruinated by him, and which he hath taken in manner all, that he mindeth to put you by: your lands and possessions he leaveth unto you, purposing to set you out a plot of ground, whereupon you may build yourselves a new citie. Your gold and silver all, as well common treasure as private monies and plate, he commaundeth to be brought unto him: the bodies of your wives and children he is content to spare and save undefiled: upon this condition that you will depart without armour, and with a double suit of apparell a peece, and no more. These are the impositions that your enemy (a conquerour) commaundeth: Which albeit they be hard and grievous, yet your fortune and state is such, as you must allow thereof and be content. For mine owne part, I am not out of hope, but when you have put all into his hands, he will deale better by you, & remit somewhat of these conditions. But I thinke ye were better to abide all this, rather than your bodies to be murdered, your wives and children to be ravished, haled and forced before your faces, as the law and manner of warre requireth.

To the hearing of this Oration the people had flocked about, and by little and little entered mingled their own assemblie with the Senators: and all of a suddain the chiefe of them withdrew themselves and departed, before answer was given: and brought all their silver and gold, as well publicke as private, into the market place: and when they had cast it into a great fire made hastily for that purpose, most of them threw themselves into it headlong after. Whereupon there being a feare and trouble alreadie throughout the whole citie: behold, another outcrie besides and noise was heard from the castle. For a certaine tower that had beene a long time battered and shaken, fell downe; and at the breach thereof, a band of Carthaginians made entrie, and gave signe to their General that the citie was abandoned of the ordinarie watchmen and corps de gard of the enemies, and altogether lay open and naked. Anniball supposing it was no wisdom to neglect and slacke so good an oportunitie, with all his forces at once assailed the citie, and wan it in the turning of an hand: and presently gave order that all above fourteen years of age should be put to the sword. A cruell commaundement, no doubt, but yet needfull, as afterwards is well seene in the end and upshot of all. For who would have spared and taken pittie of those, that either shut themselves with their wives and children into their houses, and burnt them over their owne heads, or in their armour, gave not over fight before they died? Thus was the towne woen with exceeding store of pillage within it. And albeit much was spoiled for the nonce by the owners, & that in the massacre and execution they had no respect of age in the furie of their anger; and for all that, the prisoners fell to the soldiours share; yet certaine it is, that of the goods sold in port-sale, there arose a good round peece of mony: and much rich household stuffe and costlie apparell was sent to Carthage.

F Some there be that write, how Saguntum was woen the eight Month after the siege began: and that from thence Anniball departed to winter in new Carthage: as also, that the fifth month after he departed from Carthage, he arrived in Italie. Which being so; it cannot be, that P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius should be the Consuls, unto whom both in beginning of the siege, the Saguntine Embassadors were sent; and who also in their year of government fought with Anniball.

the one neere the river * Ticinus, and both together a good while after, at * Trebia. And we must say, that either all these things were achieved in shorter time a good deale, or else that Saguntum in the beginning of that yeare, wherein P. Cornelius and Sempronius were Consuls, began not to be besieged; but finally was forced and woon. For the battaile at Trebia could not be so long after, as to fall in the yeare wherein Cn. Scruvilius and C. Flaminius were Consuls. For that Flaminius entred his Consulship at Ariminum, and was created by T. Sempronius, Consull, who after the battaile of Trebia came to Rome to elect Consuls and after the Election was ended, returned againe to his armie, into the wintering harbours.

About the same time, as well the Embassadours which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but warre: as also tidings came, of the destruction of Saguntum. And so greatly grieved and sorrowed the Senators, and pitied withall their allies, this unworthily massacred, so ashamed in themselves they were, that they had not sent aid in time, so deeply offended and incensed with indignation against the Carthaginians; yea and so mightily feared the losse of the verie maine chance at home, as if the enemy had beene already at the gates of the citie: that in verie deed, having their minds possessed at one time, with so many troubles, they rather trembled and quaked for feare, than felted themselves to consultation and counsell. For they considered and saw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountred with them: nor the state of Rome was at any time so restie, so feeble, and so undisposed to warre. Moreover, it was commonly said, that the * Sardi * Corfi, * Histi, and * Illyrici had rather challenged the Romanes, and made bravadoes of warre, than exercised and toiled them in any hard conflicts: as for the Gauls they were but tumults, rumors, & al' arms which they made, and no warres indeed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten soldiors, injured and hardened for this 23 yeares in most difficult service of warre, amongst the Spanish nations, and went away ever with victory: first trained and practised under Amilcar, then under Asdruball, and now lastly under the conduct of Anniball, a right hardie and valiant captain. Considering moreover, that now he commeth fresh from the ruine of Saguntum, a most rich citie, and passeth straight waies over Iberus: drawing after him a traine of so many nations of the Spaniards, exercised already by him in the warres: and will no doubt raise the Gauls, a people at all times readie to take armes: so as now they were to wage warre in Italie, with no more but all the world besides, yea and under the walles of Rome, for the defense of the citie.

Now had the Provinces beene nominated & appointed before to the Consuls: but then were they commaunded by casting lots, to part them between them. To Cornelius fell Spaine: To Sempronius Affricke and Sicilie. Likewise decreed it was, that for that yeare, there should be levied six Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great a navie as might be, should be rigged and set out. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman footmen, and of horsemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horse: 220 gallies, with five counte of oares on a side, and twentie foists, were set a floate. After this, a bill was preferred unto the people, that it might please them to determine and graunt, that warre should be proclaimed against, the people of Carthage. And in regard of that warre, there was also a solemne supplication holden through the citie: wherein the people adored and praied the gods to prosper and bring to an happie end, this warre which the people of Rome had determined. And betwixt the Consuls thus were the forces divided: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, consisting of foure thousand foot, and three hundred horse a peece; also of allies sixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred horse, besides 160 gallies, & twelve barks or foists. With this power for land and sea service, was Sempronius sent into Sicilie, from thence to passe over into Affricke, in case the other Consull were able to impeach the Carthaginians for comming into Italie. Cornelius had the charge of a smaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretor, was sent in person into France with a sufficient armie: but in the number of ships: especially, was Cornelius skanted, 60 gallies of five banks of ores he had, and no more, (for it was supposed that the enemy would neither come by sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Romane Legions with the full proportion of horsemen, and 14000 footmen of allies, with 1200 men of armes. That Province of France (in those parts where the Carthaginian warre was expected) had that yeare two Legions of Romane footmen, 14000 allies, besides 1000 horse from them, and 600 of the Romanes. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before warre began, it might appeare

A peare they dealt by order of law, and with justice; and that all due complements might be performed, they sent certaine grave & ancient personages in Embassie into Affricke, to wit, Q. Fabius, M. Livius, E. Amylius, C. Licinius, and Q. Bebius. First, to demand and know of the Carthaginians, Whither Anniball by their public warrant and authoritie, besieged & assailed Saguntum: then, if they avowed the act, and stood to it (as they were like to do) confessing that it was done by the counsell of the State; to give defiance, and proclaime open warre against them. The Romanes being arrived at Carthage, had audience given in their Senate house, where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, then a principall Senator among the Carthaginians stood up and sayd thus:

Your former Embassage, my maistets of Rome, was even as vaine as this, when ye required Anniball to be yeelded unto you; as if he had besieged Saguntum of his owne head: And as for this, that you come with now, howsoever in words it seeme more mild and smooth, in very deepe and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Anniball only charged and demanded to justice; but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and also forced to make restitution and satisfaction out of hand; as if we had avowed and confessed the action. For mine owne part, of this mind am I, that the case ought thus to be laid, and the question brought to this issue, not whether Saguntum was besieged by a private person; or public counsell; but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our citizen and subject have done this by our advise, or of himselfe, pertaineth to us alone, as also to censure and punish him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point onely, Whether it might stand with the league to do it, or no. And therefore since it pleaseth you, that we should dispute and distinguish, betwene the action of a Generall, warranted by the public state, and an enterprize proceeding from his owne motive; ye shall understand, that there was indeede a league betwene you and us, contracted by Lucilius the Consull, wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies of both parties: as concerning the Saguntines (who as then were none of your confederates) there was not one word at all therein: but in that league (ye will say) that was contracted with Asdruball, the Saguntines are expressly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to pleade, but even that which I have learned of you. For yece your selves denied, that ye were bound to stand to that accord which C. Lucilius your Consull first made with us, because it passed neither by consent of the nobles, nor graunt of the people. Whereupon, there was another league anew drawne out, and by public agreement enacted. If you then, be not tied to observe your leagues, unless they be auctorised by the nobles; or ratified by the people; no more can the league of Asdruball oblige us, which he concluded without our privitie and knowledge. Forbeare therefore to speake either of Saguntum, or Iberus; and what your mind hath so long conceived, let it hatch now at length, and bring it forth. Then Q. Fabius the Romane Embassador, having made a hollow lap within the plait and fold of his side gowne, Here quoth he, within this lapper, we present and offer warre and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, they all cried out at once with as great stomack and boldnesse: Mary even which you will your selfe. Whereat he let his robe loose againe, Why then, there is warre quoth he, take it amongst you; Let come say they all againe, and welcome be it; and as willingly as we accept thereof, so shall we follow and manage it as thoroughly.

This direct demand, and round denouncing, of warre, seemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much dispute and argument about the right of the cause, and of the covenants; a vaine matter before, but now especially, after the winning and destruction of Saguntum. For if the question were to be decided by words and reasoning, that league of Asdruball which was exchanged for the former of Lucilius, was not the same, nor the tenor thereof to be compared: seeing that in the accord of Lucilius, this branch and proviso was expressly added, [That it should stand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof:] but in this of Asdruball, there was no such condition at all: and besides, the covenant for so many yeares space during his life, was so established and confirmed, and no word to the contrarie; that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yet, put case they should have stood upon the former alliance; the Saguntines were therein well enough comprised and provided for, in that the allies of either part were excepted and comprehended. For neither was this clause added [They who at that time were allies] nor yet were they excepted against, against, who afterwards should become, or be admitted allies. And seeing that it was lawfull to entertaine new confederates, who is it that would judge it reasonable, either that no man should be received unto amitie for any good desert whatsoever; or being once received into protection, should not be defended accordingly: Provided alwayes, that no allies of the Carthaginians should either be solicited to rebellion, or received againe, if of themselves they once revolted.

The Romane Embassadors, as they were commanded at Rome; passed the seas from Carthage into Spaine, for to visit all the cities, and to see whether they could either draw them to their societie, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And first they came to the Baigullans, where being courteously entertained (for weary they were of the Carthaginians government) they stirred up many other nations beyond Iberus, to have a desire to change for a new world. From thence they came to the Volscians; whose notable answer reported throughout all Spaine, turned away all other States from banding with the Romanes: for thus in a solemn assembly a sage & auncient father among them framed his answer. With what face can ye (Romanes) require us to preferre your friendship and amitie before the Carthaginians? seeing that the Saguntines who did the same, have bene more cruelly by you their allies betrayed, than by their enemies the Carthaginians destroyed? By my advise go and seeke you confederates there, where the wofull calamitie and miserie of Saguntum is not knowne. The lamentable ruines of which citie, as it is a dolefull example, so it shall be a notable warning to all nations of Spaine, that no man ever after repose trust in the protection and societie of the Romanes. Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volscians immediatly, and in no time the Councell of Spaine, had they afterwards any better entertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vaine gone through all Spaine, they tooke their way into Gaule: where they saw a strange sight, and a fearefull fashion: for all in armour (such was the guise and manner of the countrey) they came to their publick assemblies: & there, these embassadors after they had set out in goodly words the greameffe and glorie of the people of Rome, and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and thereupon made request, that they would not give the Carthaginians leave (who minded to make warre upon Italie) for to passe through their cities and townes: hereat they set up such a laughter, with a certaine grumbling and murmuring, that scarcely could the youth be filled and quieted by the magistrats and elders; so foolishly, so foolishly, and shamelesse, seemed this demaund, in their conceit: that they should once imagine that the Gaules were such asses, as they would be content (rather than to let the warre passe into Italie) to avert and turne it upon themselves, and to suffer, yea and offer their owne territories to be spoiled and harried, for the safetie (forsooth) of other mens lands, who were but meere aliens and strangers unto them. The noyse and garboile being at length hushed and appeased, this answer was returned to the Embassadors: That neither the Romanes had deserved so well, nor the Carthaginians so ill, at their hands, that they should take armes either for Romanes, or against Carthaginians. But contrariwise, they were advertised, that some of their nation, were by the people of Rome driven out of the marches and confines of Italie, put to pay tribute, yea, and endured other outrages and indignities. The like demaunds and answeres passed too and fro in other Councells and assemblies of Gaule: neither could they meete with any friendly entertainment, or have peaceable words given them, before they came to *Massilia: where, after diligent inquirie, and faithfull search made by their allies, they had true advertisements, that Anniball aforehand had wrought the harts of the Gaules to his owne purpose, and was possessed of them: but they understood withall, that they were not like to continue long in good termes of kindeesse and favor even to him, (so fierce and savage, so untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unlesse their Princes and rulers be ever and anon well feed and plied with gold, whereof that nation of all other is most greedie & covetous. The Romane Embassadors, having thus gone their circuite over all the States of Spaine and Gaule; returned to Rome; not long after that the Coss. had taken their journey into their provinces: where they found the whole citie possessed with the expectation of warre: so rife and currant was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already passed over the river Iberus.

Anniball after the winning of Saguntum, had retired himselfe to winter in new Carthage: and there having intelligence what had bene done and decreed as well at Rome, as at Carthage [in Affricke] and that he was reputed not onely the Capitaine generall and conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this warre; so soone as he had devided and sold the rest of the booke

A and pillage that remained thought good now to make no longer delays, but assembled the soldiers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner: My trustie friends and loiall confederats, I am perswaded, that ye, your selves do see as well as I, now that all the States of Spaine are in peace and quietnesse, that either ye are to make an end of souldierie, & call our forces to be called and discharged from service: or else that ye must remove the warre into other lands: For so shall these Nations prosper and flourish, and not onely enjoy the blessings of peace, but also reape the fruits of warre; if we will seek to gain riches, and to acquite glorie and honor from others: Since therefore we are to warre shortly far from home, and doubtless, when you shall see againe your houses, and whatsoever there is deere unto you: if any of you bee desirous to visite home; his wife and children, kinsfolke, and friends; I give him licence and free passport. But I commaund you withall, to shew your selves here againe before mee, in the beginning of the next spring; that with the helpe of God, we may in hand with that warre, whereby wee shall purchase both wealth and wealth. There was not one in that manner but well accepted of this libertie so frankly offered by himselfe, and were desirous to have a sight of house & land, both for that every one a readie longed for their friends and kindred, and for a while in farther time to come, a greater misse, and cause of more longing after them. This rest all winter time; betwene their travails past, and those they were soon after to endure, refreshed as well their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new paines whatsoever. So in the very prime of the spring, according to the Edict aforesaid, they all assembled together againe. Anniball having taken a muster and survey of the aides that were sent unto him from all those Nations, went to Gades; and there to Hercules he paid his old vowes, and bound himselfe to new, if the rest of his enterprises should speed well and have good successe. After this deviding and casting care indifferently, as well for offensive as defensive warre, doubting least while hee went by land through Spaine and Frant into Italie; Affricke should lie open and naked to the Romanes from Sicilie side; purposed to fortifie and make that part sure with strong garisons. In lieu whereof, hee sent forth fresh supplie out of Affricke, specially of Archers and javelottiers; and those lightly armed: to the end, that the Affricans might serve in Spaine, and the Spaniards in Affricke, like (both the one and the other) to proove the better souldiours, farre from their owne countreies, and being bound as it were, with mutuall and reciprocall pledges. So hee sent into Affricke 13850 footmen, armed with light targets; and 870 slingers of the islands *Balears: 1200 horsemen also out of sundrie Nations. Which forces he disposed, partly for the defense of Carthage, & partly to be devided through Affricke; for the guard thereof hee sent withall, certaine Commissioners into all their cities to take up souldiours, and enrolled 2000 of their chosen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garison, and to serve for hostages. And supposing that Spaine was not to be neglected; and the rather, because hee was not ignorant how the Romane Embassadors had visited the same round, to see how they could sollicite and worke the Princes and rulers to their mind, he committed the charge of that Province to his brother Asdrubal, a valiant and hardie man; and furnished him with good forces, especially out of Affricke, so wit, 1850 Affricans footmen, 300 Ligurians, 500 Balears Islanders. To this power of footmen, three hundred horse of the *Libyphenicians, a Nation mixt of Carthaginians & Affricanes. Of *Numidians and Moors; that coast upon the Ocean, 1900: with a small cornet of 200 horsemen of Ilergetes out of Spaine. And became hee should want no manner of land helpe, fourteene Elephants besides. Moreover, there was a fleet allowed him for the defence of the sea coasts. For by what forces and service the Romanes had before gotten victorie, thereby it was likely, that they would still maintaine and continue their warre: 50 gallies therefore of five banks of oares; hee had at sea, two, six, and five of three. But of the five oared gallies aforesaid, he had no more but two and thirtie, fitted and well appointed with rowers and mariners, and so were the five of three bankes.

From Gades, the armie of Anniball returned to winter in Carthage: and from thence he passed by the citie *Eto villa, and marched forward with his forces to Iberis & the sea coasts. Where it is reported, that in his sleepe hee dreamed, and saw a vision; namely, a young man of divine shape and semblance, saying, That he was sent from Jupiter to guide him in his voiage into Italie, and willed him therefore to follow him; and in no wise to turne his eyes from him one way or other. Also, that at the first hee being scared and affrighted, durst not look either about or behind; but followed him still: afterwards (as men by nature are curious) when hee cast and discoursed in his

his mind, what it might be, that hee was forbidden so to see behind him, hee could not hold and rule his eyes, but must needs looke backe: and then hee beheld behind him, a serpent of huge greatnesse comming amaine, and all the way as it went, to beare downe trees, groves, and thickets: and after all that, he perceived a great storme and tempest ensuing, with mightie thunder-claps. Now when hee was desirous to know what this so great confusion and straunge sight might signifie, he heard a voice, saying: That it betokened the ruines and wasting of Italie: willing him therefore, to goe still forward with his voyage, and search no further into the secrets of the gods, but leave them to the hidden destinies. Anniball right joyous at this vision, passed over Iberus with his whole power, divided into three parts, having sent certaine before him with gifts and rewards, into all parts whereas he should march with his armie, to gaine the hearts of the Gauls; and withall, to seeke out & discover the passages of the Alpes. So he crossed the river Iberus with 90000 foot, & 12000 horse, strong. After this, he subdued the Illegeres, the Bargusians, Aulelans, and Aquiran, which lyeth under the hills Pyrenei. The government of all these Nations, hee set over to Hanno, that hee might have at his commaund the streights which joined Fraunce and Spaine together. Vnto whome hee allowed 10000 footemen, and 1000 horse, for to defend and keepe in obedience those countries. After that his armie was on foote, and began to march through the Forrest Pyreneus, and that there ran amongst the barbarous people a more certain bruit, That they were to make warre with the Romans; three thousand footmen of the Carpetanes returned backe: and for certaine it was knowne, that they departed not, for feare so much of the warre, as the tedious journey and unpassable waies of the Alpes. Anniball, considering that either to recall them, or to keepe them by violence, was a dangerous matter; for fear least thereby hee should provoke the fierce stomackes of the rest; sent home againe above 7000 of such, as he perceived to be wearie, and to have no mind to the service; and made semblance with all, that the Carpetanes were by his leave discharged. And doubting least long stay & ease there, might tempt his souldiours, and give occasion of mutinies, with the rest of his forces hee passed Pyreneus, and pitched his campe before the towne Illiberis. The Gauls, albeit they were advertised, that it was Italie, at which Anniball shott yet because the bruit was blased, That the Spaniards beyond Iberus, were by force subdued, and strong garisons placed in their cities: certaine Nations of them, for feare of servitude and bondage, rose up in armes, and assembled together at Ruscino. Which being related to Anniball, hee fearing more that they would stay him in his journey, than endanger him in fight; sent certaine Oratours or Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to signifie unto them, That himselfe in person would gladly parle with them, and that it should bee in their choise whether they would come neerer to Illiberis, or himselfe goe forward to Ruscino: where, beeing neere together, they might more easily meete and conferre. For as hee was willing to receive them into his campe, and would bee glad to see them there: so hee would not thinke much of his paines, to repaire unto them himselfe; as one that was thither come, as a friend and guest, unto Fraunce, and not as an enemy; and would not by his good will draw a sword (if the Gauls would let him alone) before hee were entered within Italie. And thus much verily passed by messengers and courtiers betweene. But so soone as the Lords of Fraunce, who presently remooved their campe to Illiberis, were come willingly enough to Anniball, as being bribed and corrupted with money and presents, they gave his armie good leave to passe through their confines along the towne Ruscino.

In Italie this while, the embassadors of Marceilles had brought no other word to Rome, but that Anniball was only gone over Iberus; but, by that time, the Boij had stirred up the Insubrians to mutinie, and were revolted themselves, even as if hee had passed the Alpes already: which they did not so much upon old rancour and mallice to the People of Rome, as for that, they tooke it ill and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls countie, to be planted about Padus, Placentia and Cremona. Whereupon they arose suddenly, tooke armes, and entred by force into those parts, and made so foule worke and fearful havoc, that not onely the countrey people and villagers, but also the three Romane Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Caius Lucatius, Ant. Servilius, and Titus Annius, who were come to set out the lands and territorie to the said Colonies, not trusting the wals of Placentia, fled to Mutina. That Lucatius was one of them, it is not doubted: but some records have Q. Atilius and C. Herennius, in stead of A. Servilius and T. Annius: and others againe, nominate P. Cornelius Asina, and

A and C. Papirius Mafso. It is uncertaine also, whether they were the Embassadors sent to the Boij, to reason or expostulate the matter, that had abuse offered them, and were evil intreated; or that the Triumvirs above said, were set upon and assailed, as they were measuring out the lands. But whiles they were thus besieged at Mutina, and those Boijans lying at siege (a nation unskilfull altogether in the fear of assaulting townes, and likewise of all other most cowardly, to attempt any martial exploits) whiles they lay idly about the wals, & never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of a treatie for peace. Whereupon the Romane embassadors or Commissioners, being by the chiefs of the Gauls called out to parle, were not onely against law of nations, but with breach also of their faithfull promise, & word which they had given that time, apprehended: and the Gauls said plainly, they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These news touching the embassadors being reported, Mutina with the garison in danger, L. Manlius the Pretor, in great anger and indignation, brought his armie in more hast than good order before Mutina. There were in those daies great woods about the high way, and most part of the countie wilds and waits, not inhabited: where he having engaged himselfe without his espials, was intapped within an ambush, lost many of his men, and hardly recovered the open champaigne countie. There he encamped himselfe strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to win the camp, his soldiours courages were refreshed; albeit it was well known, that they had received a throwd foile, & knew their forces to be much empaired. Then began he to march on in his journey a fresh. And so long as he led his power through the open countie, the enemies were not in sight: but when they were entred the Forrests againe, they set upon the rearward of them: where, besides the great fright and damage of all the rest, 800 Romane soldiours were left dead in the place; and the enemies went away with six ensignes. But afterwards, the Gauls ceased to molest and trouble, and the Romans gave over to feare, so soone as they were passed, and escaped the rough, comberous, and unpassable Forrests. And the Romans being now able in the open and champion countie to march with safetie, made hast to get to Tanctus a village neere unto the Po. There within a fort which they made for the time, with the helpe and provision of victuals by the river, and the aid also of certaine Gauls called Braxians, they defended themselves against the enemies, whose number daily encreased. After this sudden tumult was reported at Rome, and that the L.L. of the Senate were advertised, that besides the war with the Carthaginians, the Gauls were up in armes: they gave order, that C. Atilius the Pretor should goe (with one Romane Legion, and foure thousand allies, who were enrolled by the Consuls in a new levie) to aid Manlius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for feare) came to Tanctus. Also P. Cornelius having newly levied one Legion in lieu of that which was sent with the Pretor, departed from the citie of Rome, and passing with 60 Gauls along the costes of Tuscane, Liguria, and so forward of the Salyes, shortly arrived at Massilia, and encamped neere the next mouth of Rhodanus, (for the river is devided into many branches, and so dischargeth it selfe into the sea) being not fully of beleefe that Anniball as yet had passed over the mountaines Pyrenei. But when he understood, that he was redie even then to passe Rhodanus also; & doubting in what place to encounter and meet him, his people as yet not well recovered, after their being sea-sick: he sent before, 300 elect men of armes, guided by the Massilians, and certaine Gauls that came to aid; for to discover all, and to take a full view of the enemies safely without danger.

Anniball having appeased the rest of the countie, either for feare or by means of mony, was now come into the countie of the Volcanes, a puissant people and a valiant. These inhabitants a long while the banks of Rhodanus: and mistrusting that they were not able to defend their lands against the Carthaginians, on that side of the river which lay to them: because they might have the whole river to serve them for a good defence & rampier, transported over the Rhone all in manner that ever they had, and kept the banke on the other side. The rest of the inhabitants neere to the river, and even those also in whose territories Anniball had set foot already, both he himselfe with gifts allured to get together from all parts shipping, and to frame new vessels: and they of themselves likewise, were as willing to have his armie transported, and their own countie eased and delivered (they cared not how loone) of so great a multitude of troublesome guests. Whereupon there was gotten together an huge number of lighters, barges, and boats especially which were made in hast without great workmanship, in which the people inhabiting theby use to transport wares & commodities from one to another. Other new wharries also, the

Gauls began first to make of the hollowed trunks of trees: and after them, the soldiers for that they had both store of timber and saw the workmanship but slight & easie, made in half certain bottomes, such as they were, like troughs without forme or fashion, regarding no handiwork at all, so they would but float on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over them selves and that which they had.

Now when they had prepared and made all readie for their passage, the enemies on the other side right against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and horse putting them to much trouble and feare. Anniball therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanno the sonne of Bomilcar, at the first watch of the night, to go up the streame along the river side, one daies journey, with part of the forces, and those most of them Spaniards, and wherefoever he first could espie a convenient place, to crosse the river, & to land as secretly as he could: and then to fetch about with his men, that when need were, he might charge upon the backe of the enemy. Hereunto were appointed certaine Gauls for guides: who from thence conducted them some 25 miles above, to a little yland compassed about with the river, which here spread out in breadth, by reason that it divided it selfe, and thereby the channell was not so deepe: where they shewed him a place of passage. There, in all hast they cut downe and hewed timber, and made botes, to set over horse and man and other burthen. The Spaniards made no more adoe, but fastning their apparrell to bouges of lether like bladders, full of wind, and laying their bucklers thereupon, sat aloft and passed over nimbly. The rest of the armie also, with joining planks and troughes together, was set over. Where having encamped neere the river, as being wearie with their night journey, and toilsome worke, they rested one day to refresh themselves, whiles there captaine studied and was occupied, to execute his commission and his intended service in good and convenient time. The morrow after, they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by smoke that they were passed over and not farre off. Which when Anniball perceived, for that he would not loose the vantage of that time, he gave signall to his men also to get over the water. Now had the footmen alreadie their botes prepared and fitted. And the course & ranks of barges (which to receive and breake the force of the currant from above, transported the horsemen, besides the horses that swam after) made for the small botes that passed beneath, a gentle and calme water. For a number of horses swam after the ships, haled by the bridles, which were tied to the pouples, besides those, which being saddled and bridled, and fitted to serve the men of armes so soone as ever they were landed, were bestowed in barges & ferry botes. The Gauls stood upon the banke with distant hooping, hollaing, yelling and singing after their manner, who shaking their targuets over their heads, brandishing and flourishing their swords in their right hands, shewed themselves redie to receive them, albeit so great a number and world of barges and botes full in their eie over against them, together with an hideous roaring of the water, might have skared them: besides sundrie noises of mariners and soldiers, who laboured & strived to break the power and force of the water, and who being on the other side of the banke encouraged their fellows that were passing over. And thus frightened enough as they were, with the tumult and noise presented before their faces: behold there arose a more fearfull and terrible outcrie behind their backs, upon the forcing and winning of their campe by Hanno. And himselfe in person came soone after: so that they were put in feare on both sides. For not onely out of the ships there was a great multitude gotten to land, but also a power at their backs unlooked for, came forward and charged them. The Gauls after they had made some resistance, and saw they were easely put backe; brake through, where they espied the way to lie most open, and so in great feare they fled divers waies into their townes and villages. Anniball then, having conveyed over the rest of his forces by leaseure, cared no more now for any French stirres and tumults, and so encamped himselfe. But for the transporting of the Elephants, I suppose there were sundrie devises: and certainly, how ever it was, the thing is diversly recorded. Some say, that when the Elephants were gathered together upon the banke, the most courageous and fiercest of them all, was chauffed, angered, and raised of purpose, by his master or keeper: and when he was pursued of the beast, and to save himselfe fled from him, and tooke the river, thereupon the Elephant followed after him as hee swamme, and so drew after him the whole drove of the rest: and as any one of them (feearing the depth) failed to wade, the very force of the river carried him to the other side. But it is more credibly and certainly reported, that they were conveyed over in certaine barges: which as it was a safer way,

A safer way and surer course before it was practised, so when it was done, and past, it was more easily credited. They caused therefore one vessell or barge, 200 foote long, and 50 foote broad, to reach from the strong side and the shore into the river: which because it should not be caried downe with the course and streame of the water, they fastned to the banke above with many strong ropes, and like as it had ben a bridge, they covered it over with earth, that the beasts might boldly go thieron as upon the firme ground. Now there was another barge full as broad, but of length only 100 foote fitted & appointed to passe the river, and was tied & coupled thereto: and when as the Elephants (driven after the females going before) upon the steadie barge, as it had bene upon a causey, were gone over into the lesser which was fastned unto it; then presently it was loosed from the bonds wherewith it was slightly tyed, and so haled and drawne by certaine galley boats, directed with oares through to the other banke. Thus when the first were landed, they went forward still, until they were all set over: and verily, so long as they were driven on still, as it were upon a long bridge, they nothing feared: the formost only were afrayed when the barge was loosened, and they parted from their fellows, and so were caried away into the wide and deepe river, where thronging and struggling together, and iostling one another, they made some trouble, whiles they that were outmost gave back from the water as much as they could, untill such time as very feare (when they saw all about them nothing but water) caused them to be quiet. Some of them also like raging beasts as they were, and unruly, fell out into the river, but by reason of their heaviness, they stood sure, and casting their governors, they fought the founds foot by foot, by little and little, and got safe to land.

C While the Elephants were thus transporting over, Anniball in the meane time had sent 500 Numidian light horsemen to the Romanes camp, as espials to discover the ground, where they were to learne what forces they had, and listen after their signes and purposes. This wing and troupe was encountered by three hundred Roman horsemen, sent as is aforesayd, from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruell skirmish than for so small a number, for besides many hurt, there were slaine on both sides in a manner alike: but in the end, the feare and flight of the Numidians gave the victorie to the Romanes, being now alreadie much travailed and wearied: on whose part (being the winners) were slaine 160, not all Romans, but some Gauls: and on the losers side who were overcome, there dyed above 200. This beginning and prognostication as it were of the warre, as it portended, and presaged an happie end and successe of the whole, unto the Romans: so it shewed plainly, that the victorie would hang long in equall balance, not without much effusion of blood, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each one to his owne Captaine. As for Scipio, he could not resolve to take any course himselfe, but according as he saw the plots and enterprises of the enemy, so to frame his own. And Anniball again being uncertain whether to go forward with his journey begun, into Italie, or to give battel unto the first armie of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all present conflict, by occasion of the coming of the Embassadors of the Boij, and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Matalus, who promising to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and companions in his perils, thought it good, and gave advise to invade and set upon Italie first of all before any other warre, whiles his forces were entier in hart, no where put to the hazard, and to give them as it were the first hanfell. The common multitude of the Carthaginians (for that the former warre was not cleane forgotten, and out of remembrance) feared verily their enemies, but more their infinite journey, & the Alps especially, the name wherof so men not experienced, was very fearefull and terrible. Whereupon, Anniball being now resolved, to march onward in his journey, and to passe into Italie, assembled his people to an audience, and by sundrie meanes, as well by way of rebuke, as also by encouragement, windeth and assaileth the minds of his souldiers. I mervell (quoth he) what sodaine fright or new feare hath possessed your hearts; that ever before now have bene undaunted; who have served so many years, and alwaies won the victorie; who departed not out of Spaine, before that all those nations and lands, which lye enclosed betwene two divers seas, were brought in subjection to the Carthaginians; who taking indignation and great disdain; that the people of Rome should require all those to be yeelded unto justice (as offenders and malefactors) that had besieged Saguntum, have thereupon passed the river Iberus, with this intent even to destroy and extirp the Roman name, & to set free the whole world out of their servitude & bondage: no man thought it long then of his travaile from East to West, from the setting of the sunne, to the rising of the same: now when as ye see the greater part (by farre) of our journey done and past the Forrest and 21 mountaine of Pyreneus, amid most fierce and cruell nations, surmounted; that great river Rho-22 danus, passed over, maugre the hearts of so many thousand Gaules that would have impeached 23 your passage, yea & the force of his maine streame overcome, now I say, when you are within the 24 sight of the Alps, to the other side whereof lieth Italie close; ye faint as it were, and stand still, ti-25 red at the very gates of the enemies. Why? what other thing take ye the Alps to be, but high 26 hills? And imagine they be higher than the cliffes of Pyrenei, what? there is no land (I am sure) 27 that reach up to heaven, and no place for men unsuperable. But for the Alps, they are inhabited, 28 and they are tilled, they breede and feede living creatures and cattail: and are they accessible 29 in deede, & passable for some few, & unpassable for whole armies? These verie embassadors whom 30 you see here, flew not over the Alps with wings; neither were their aunccestors time out of mind 31 borne and bred there, but came from other parts as strangers, and inhabited Italie before; yea, 32 and oftentimes haue gone over the same Alps in huge multitudes, together with their wives and 33 children, in manner of travellers & pilgrimes that seeke new countries to inhabite: what should 34 there be unpassable then or impossible for the armed souldiour, carying about him nothing but 35 instruments of warre? For the winning of Saguntum, what perils were adventured, what travails 36 were endured and swallowed, for eight moneths space? I should any thing then seeme to hard and 37 difficult as to stay them in their enterprise once begun, who aime at no lesse than to conquer 38 Rome, the head cite of the world? And have the Gaules indeede forced and wonn that in times 39 past, which the Carthaginians despaire now to come unto? Therefore, either ye must confesse 40 your selves inferior in stomach and valor to that nation, which so oft (these dayes passed) by you 41 have ben vanquished; or else make reckoning with assured hope, that the goodly faire fields that 42 lye betwene Tyberis and the walls of Rome, are the end of your journey.

When in these termes he had exhorted and encouraged his souldiours, he commanded them to take their repast and repose, to cherish and refresh their bodies, and to prepare themselves for the march. The morrow after he departed crosse from the banks of Rhodanus, and entred the inland parts of France: not for that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but because he thought the further he went from the sea side, in so much lesse danger he should be of meeting the Romans, with whom he was not minded to fight, before he was arrived into Italie. After that he had travailed foure dayes journey, he came to an lland, where the two rivers * Arar and Rhodanus, issuing out of sundrie parts of the Alps, and taking a direct course; after they have run through a good part of the countrey, fall at length together and meete in one, and the ground lying betwene is called by the name of the lland. Neere there, inhabite the * Allobroges, a nation even in those dayes nothing inferior, neither in wealth and puissance, or in fame and reputation to any people or state of the Gaules whatsoever. But at that very time there was some discord & variance among them; by occasion of two brethren, who were at strife for the crowne and kingdome: the elder (whose name was Brancus, and had before enjoyed the Seignorie) was deposed and thrust out by his yonger brother; and a lustie crew of the youth, who as they had lesse right on their side, so they were the mightier. The deciding of this variance, was referred and put over unto Anniball, in as good and fit a time for his purpose, as he could have wished: and he forsooth was made the umpire and judge, to determine whether of them should be king, who restored the elder to the kingdome; like as it would have bene adjudged by the award of the Senators and Nobles of the countie. For which benefitt and good turne, he was served with victuall, and store of all things abundantly, yea and with rayment and apparell, which he was driven to provide aforehand; for the name that went of the Alps, which for their coldnesse were in great discredit.

Having thus appeased the debate of the Allobroges, and minding now to go forward to the Alps; he would not go the direct straight way, but turned on the left hand to the * Tiberis, and from thence passing by the frontiers of the * Vogondians, he marched into the * Tricorians, and never was he stayed or impeached in his journey, before that he came to the river * Druentia, which defending also out of the Alps, is of all other rivers in France most hard to be passed over; for although it carie with it a mightie force of water, yet with it bearend vessels, because it kept and restrained with no banks; but running at once by many divers channels, maketh new foulds, and casteth up new helvies and whirlepits; for which cause also a footman hath much ado to wade therethrough, and knoweth not the foulds; besides, it rolleth downe round

A stones and pibbles, whereby there is no sure nor safe footing for him that would wade through.
 And it chanced at that time, that it swelled and was risen high by fall of raine, and by land-floods; and caused them to have very much to doe, that passed over it: and over and besides all other difficulties, they were of themselves troubled and disquieted through their owne fearefulnesse and fundrie cries which they made. Publius Cornelius the Consul, about three daies after that Anniball dislodged from the banke of Rhodanus, was arrived with his armie (arraunged in a fouresquare battaile) as farre as the place where the enemy was lately encamped, purposing without any stay to give him battaile. But seeing the hold abandoned, and that hee was not like to overtake him, being so farre gone forwards; hee returned to his ships at sea, supposing by that meanes, with lesse daunger and difficultie, to encounter Anniball as hee descended from the Alps. But least that Spaine (which was the province allotted unto him) should be left disurnished of Romane succours, he sent his brother Cn. Scipio with the greatest part of his forces against Asdruball: not so much to defend their old allies, and procure new, as to drive Asdruball out of Spaine. Himselfe with a verie small companie returned to * Genua, with intent to guard Italie, with that armie which was about the Po.

Anniball being departed from Druentia, marched for the most part through the champion countries, and came in peace and quietly, to the foot of the Alps, for any trouble from the peasants that there inhabited. And albeit he had some knowledge of the Alps before by report, (which useth to make things that are uncertain, much more than indeed and truth they are) yet seeing now neere at hand the height of those thils, and the snowes, entermingled along with the C skie; the rude and mishapen houses set upon rockes; the cattell, sheepe, oxen, and horses, singed with cold; the people with long shagd haire, and without any trimming, both living and livelisse creatures, even parched stiff and starke with frost; and all things else more strange and ilfavoured, than can be spoken: then began his souldiours to feare a frost. So soone as they advanced forward, and began to march up the first cliffes, there appeared over their heads the mountaine people, who had seized the hills: who if they had kept the secret and hidden vallies, and suddain-ly all at once charged upon them, they would have made a foule slaughter of them, & put them to flight. Then Anniball commaundeth the ensignes to stand still, and sent certaine Gaules afore, as espials, by whom he understood, that there was no passage that way: whereupon, he pitched his campe amongst those craggie and steepe rough places, upon as large a plaine and valley as hee D could find. Then by the same Gaules (who much differed not in tongue and manners from the other, and had entermingled themselves in talke with the mountainers) he understood, that they kept the passage, but in the day time, and slept away in the night, every one to his owne harbour.
 So at the break of day he mounted those steepe hills, as if he would openly in the day time march through the streights. Thus having spent the day in making semblance and shew of one thing, and intending another, hee encamped himselfe strongly in the place where hee had rested and staid: and so soone as hee perceived, that the mountaine people were departed from the steepe hills, and kept not so straight watch and ward; after that hee had made shewe of fires, more than for the number of those that remained behind; and left with the Cavallerie all the bag and bag-E gage, with the greatest part of the footmen: himselfe in person took unto him the nimblest, most active, and valiant souldiours lightly appointed, and with all speed passed through the streights afore said, and encamped on the very hills which the enemies before held and beset. Then in the morning betime his campe dislodged: and the armie behind, began to march and set forward.
 By which time the mountainers, at the ordinarie signall given, came forth out of their castles and fortes, and met at the usuall place of their accustomed guards: but then all at once they might see some of the enemies over their heads, to have gained their own forresse, & others also marching in the way. Both which objects at one time presented to their eye, made them blanke and to stand still in a muse a good while. But afterwards, when they saw Anniball his armie, distressed in the streights, and in great trouble and disorder among themselves in the march, by reason especially the horses were so affrighted, supposing, that the least fear and terror (besides) that they F could procure, would be enough for their enemies overthrow and confusion, they crossed the rockes overthwart, and (as they were accustomed and used to them) ran to and fro, up and down through the blind and unhaunted byways. But then verily, the Carthaginians were much encombred, as well by their enemies, as also by the disadvantage of the place, & more ado there was among them (whiles every one staved avie who should first escape the daunger) than with the enimie. There was nothing that disordered and troubled the armie in the march, so much as their owne horses, which (by reason of the dissonant and divers cries, that the echoes betweene the woods and vallies redoubled) were affrighted: and also if any of them chanced to bee stricken, gauled, or wounded; they kept such winfing, and flinging about them, that they overthrew and made great havocke of men, and of all sorts of carriage. Besides, the preasse was so great, and the streights of both sides so steepe and craggie, that many a man was throwne down headlong a mightie heighth: yea, and some of them armed: and the sumpter horses and beastes for carriage, especially, tumbled downe amaine with their load, as if a house or castle had come downe with a mischeefe. Which, although it were terrible to behold, yet Anniball for a while stood still, and kept his owne men together, for feare of encreasing this disorder and affright. But after that hee saw his armie disbanded and marching in disarray, and that it was to no purpose to lead his armie safe through the streights, if hee lost the carriages: for feare hereof, hee ran downe from the higher ground, and albeit, with the violence of his charge, hee discomfited the enimie, yet he encreased the trouble and feare of his owne people. But that was soone appeard in a verie moment, after the waies and passages were once cleared, by reason of the mountaineers that were fled: so that within a while the whole hoast passed through, not onely at ease and leisure, but also in a manner without anie noise at all. This done, hee seized upon a castle, which was the cheefe strength of that countrey, with other villages lying about it: and for three daies space hee victualled and maintained his whole armie, with the cattell of his prisoners. And for that hee was now neither molested with the mountaineers, who were at the first discomfited, nor greatly encombred with the difficulties of the waies, in those three daies hee rid a good deale of ground, and journeyed a great way into the countrey; untill at the length hee came to another coast well peopled (for such mountaine and hillie quarters;) where hee had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in his owne professed cunning: first, by a subtile practise, and after by a secret ambush. Certaine auncient men, thenlers and governours of the castles, repaired unto Anniball as Oratours, saying, That they having bene taught and made wise, by the profitable example of other mens harmes, made choise, rather to trie the amitie, than proove the force of the Carthaginians; and therefore were willing to doe his commaundement, and bee at his devotion: requesting him to take at their hands victuals and guides for their journey, yea, and hostages also for better assurance of promises to bee performed. Anniball neither overhastily and rashly beleeving them, nor yet churlishly distrustful and refusing their offer, least being rejected and cast off, they might become open and professed enemies; gave them good language, and a courteous answer, received the hostages whom they gave, accepted victuals, which they had brought with them to maintaine his armie by the way, and followed their guides, but so as his armie was not disarraied in their march, as if hee had bene amongst his friends, and in a peaceable countrey. First went in the vauit-guard the Elephants, and the horsemen; himselfe marched after with the flower and strength of his footemen, looking all about him with an heedfull eye. So soone as hee was entered a narrow passage, which of the one side lay under a steepe hill that commanded them aloft, the barbarous people rose out of their ambush from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far off and neere at hand; yea and rolled downe mightie huge stones upon them as they marched. But the greatest number came behind upon their backs: against whom he turned and made head with the power of his footemen, and without all peradventure (if the taile both of his armie, had not bene strong and well fortified) they must needs have received in that lane and streights, an exceeding great overthrow. And even then, as it was, they came to an extremite of danger, and in manner fel into a present mischeefe. For whiles Anniball made long stay, & doubted whether he should engage the regiment of footmen within the streights, for that he had not left any succors in the reregard to back the footmen, like as himselfe was a defence to the horsemen; the mountaineers came overthwart, and flanked them; and breaking through the files of the battaile, beset the way, and crossed upon him. So that Anniball took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages & horsemen. The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran betwene them more coldly than before, hee joined his forces together, and passed the streight, not without great dammage and losse; but with more hurt of the sumpter horses than of men. After this, the mountaineers (fewer in number, and in robbing wise rather than in warlike sort) ran in heapes, one while upon the vaward, other while upon

N n j the

A upon the rereward, as any one of them could: either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by staying another while behind, winne and catch any occasion & opportunity. The elephants, as they were driven with great leasure, because through these narrow streights, they were readie ever & anon to run on their noses: so what way soever they went, they kept the army safe & sure from the enemies; who being not used unto them, durst not once come neer. The ninth day hee waded many times out of the way, either through the deceitfulness of their guides; or for that when they durst not trust them, they adventured rashly themselves upon the vallies, and guessed the way at adventure, and went by aime. Two daies abode hee encamped upon the tops thereof, and the soldiours wearied with travaile and fight rested that time: certaine also of the B sumpter horses (which had slipped aside from the rocks) by following the tracks of the armie as it marched, came to the campe: VVhen they were thus overtoiled and wearied with these tedious travailes, the snow that fell (for now the starre Vergilie, was set and gone downe out of that horizon) increased their feare exceedingly. Now when as at the breake of day the ensignes were set forward, and the armie marched slowly, through the thicke and deepe snow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, slouthfulness and desperation: Anniball advanced before the standards, and commaunded his soldiours to stay upon a certaine high hill, (from whence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them Italie, and the goodly champion fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpin mountains: saying, That even then they mounted the wals, not only of Italy, but also C of the citie of Rome; as for all besides (saith hee) will be plaine and easie to be travelled: and after one or two battailes at the most, ye shall have at your command, the verie castle and head citie of all Italy. Then began the armie to march forward: and as yet the enemies verely themselves adventured nothing at all, but some petty robberies by stealth, as opportunity & occasion served. Howbeit they had much more difficult travaile down the hill, than in the climbing & getting up; for that, most of the adventures to the Alpes from Italy side, as they be shorter, so they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was steepe, narrow, and slipperie, so as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and stumbled never so little, could they possibly (they staggered so) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well horse as man. After this they came to a much narrower rocke, with crags & rags so steepe D downeright, that hardly a nimble soldiour without his armour and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being before naturally of it selfe steepe & pendant with a downe-fall, now was choked & dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful & monstrous heighth. There the horsemen stood still as if they had been come to their waies end. & when Anniball marvelled much what the matter might be that staied them so, as they marched not one word was brought him, that the Rock was unaccessible & unpassable. Whereupon, he went himself in person to view the place, & then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compasse about, yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted his armie, to passe through wilds, & such places as before had never been beaten & troden. And verely that (of all other) was E such, as it was impossible to passe through. For, where as there lay old snow untoucht & not troden on; and over it other snow newly fallen, of a smal depth in this soft & tender snow, & the same not verie deep, their feet as they went, easily rooke hold: but that snow, being once with the gate of so many people & beastes upon it, fretted and thawed, they were faine to go upon the bare yce underneath, and in the slabberie snow-broth, as it relented and melted about their heeles. There they had soule adoe and much struggling, for that they could not tread sure upon the slipperie yce: and againe, going as they did (downe hill) their feet sooner failed them: and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands or knees; if they chanced to fall again, when those their props and staies deceived them; there were no twigs nor rootes about, whereon a man might take hold; and rest or stay himselfe, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the F poore garrons and beastes could doe, was to tumble and wallow only upon the slipperie and glasse yce, and the molten slabbie snow. Otherwhiles also, they perished, as they went in the deepe snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender: for when they were once slidden and fallen, with flinging out their heeles, and bearing with their hooves more forcibly for to take hold, they brake the yce through; so as most of them, as if they had been caught fast and fettered, stucke still in the deepe, hard hard frozen, & congealed yce. At last, when as both man & beast were wearied and overtoiled, and all to no purpose, they encamped upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado clenched the place aforehand for that purpose: such a deale of snow there was to be digged, faied, and thrown out. This done, the souldiours were brought to breake that rocke, through which was their onely waie: and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled & overthrew many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mightie heape and pile of wood: the wind served fuly for the time to kindle a fire, & then they set all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereon strong vineger for to calcine & dissolve it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with pickaxes, and made the descent gentle and easie, by means of moderate windings and turnings: so as not onely the hories and other beasts, but even the Elephants also might be able to go downe. Four daies he spent about the levelling of this rock: & the beasts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grasse, and looke what fog and forage there was, the snow overhilled it. The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sunne, and rivers withall, neere unto the woods, yea and places more meet and becoming for men to inhabite. There were the labouring beasts put out to grasse & pasture, and the souldiours that were wearied with making the waies, had three daies allowed to rest in. From thence they went downe into the plaine countrie, where they found both the place more easie and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants more tractable.

In this manner, and by this means principally, entred the Carthaginians into Italy, five moneths after they departed from new Carthage (as some write): & within fifteene daies overcame and passed the Alpes. What power Anniball had, when he was arrived in Italy, the historians doe not agree. They that speake with the most, write that hee was 100000 foot, and 20000 horse strong: they that make the least of it, say they were 20000 foot and 6000 horse. L. Cincius Alimentus, who hath delivered under his hand, that himselfe was taken prisoner by Anniball (a writer of great authoritie) would induce me sufficiently to beleieve him, but that he setteth downe the number so confusedly, by adding to the rest, the Gaules and Ligurians. Here cordeth, that counting them, the Infanterie was 80000, & the Cavallery 10000, which was conducted into Italy (but likely it is that from all parts there came more thither than so, and so some authors doe report) and that he heard from Anniball his owne mouth, that after he had passed Rhodanus, he had lost 36000 men, and a great number of horses and other beasts of burden, when he was come downe into the Taurines countrie, which was the next nation in Italy, adjoining to the Gaules. Which being a thing agreed upon amongst all, I marvel so much the more, that there is any doubt, on which side hee went over the Alpes: and that commonly it is beleived, that he passed by a place called Penninum, and that thereupon the top of the Alpes tooke the name, and was so called. Celiv saith, hee tooke his way over by the top of Cremon: both which passages surely would have brought him not into the Taurines countrie, but through the mountaine forests, unto the Gaules called Libuj. But neither is it probable, that in those daies the same passages were open into Fraunce: considering, that the waies which lead to Penninum were environned with nations halfe Germanes. And certainly, the Veragrians, who inhabite this verie top (in case a man may build ought upon this configuration) never knew that these mountaines tooke the name of any passage of the Carthaginians: that way: but of some one place consecrated in the top of the hill, which the peasants and mountaineers called Penninum.

Very happily and fuly it fell out for the enterprise of his first designements, that the Taurines the next nation he came unto, made warre upon the Insubrians. But Anniball being busied in refreshing his armie (that now had most feeling of their hatmes which they had caught before) could not arme the same to the aide and gratifying of either partie: for ease after travails, plenty upon scarcity, good keeping and delicate, after lothsome nastinesse, did by a sodaine change greatly alter and distemper their leane and pined bodies, welneere savage and wild growne. Which was the cause that P. Cornelius the Consul, being arrived and landed at Pise, after he had received of Manlius Attilius an armie of new and raw souldiours, fearefull for some shamefull disgrace and defeature lately received, made hast and highed him to the Po, for to give battaile unto the enemy, before he were well refreshed and in heart again. But by that time that the Consul was come to Placentia, Anniball had dislodged and removed his camp, and woon by assault the

A chiefe citie or towne of the Taurines, because it willingly yeelded not to accept of his amitie and protection: and surely not by feare only, but also of voluntarie good will, he had gained unto him the Gaules that inhabited about the Po, but that the sodaine comming of the Consul interrupted and surprised them, as they were casting about to spie some opportunitie of rebellion. So Anniball dislodged, and removed out of the Taurines countrie, with this opinion, that the Gaules especially, being doubtfull as yet what part to take, would follow him being present in place. Now were the armies in manner one in sight of the other, and the Generals approached nigher together: and as they were not yet well knowne one unto the other, so they had already both of them a great opinion, and reciprocal admiration one of the other. For as Anniball was much renowned, and his name right well knowne among the Romanes, even since before Samuntum was lost: so Scipio was taken of him, and replured for some singular and excellent man, in that he especially above all other, was chosen General against him. Which mutual conceit and impression they had, they augmented themselves one to the other: for that Scipio, albeit he was left behinde in France, yet he met Anniball, and was readie to make head against him, so soone as he was passed the Alpes: and Anniball againe, because having enterprised so great an adventure, as to passe the Alpes, had now brought the same to good effect. But Scipio to prevent Anniball in crossing the Po before him, removed his camp to the river Ticinus: and for to encourage his souldiours, before he brought them forth to battaile, he made an Oration unto them, and began in this manner.

My valiant souldiours and trustie friends, if I were now to leade that armie into the field, which I had with me in France, I would have forborne to make any speech at all unto you: for to what purpose needed I to exhort, either that Cavallerie, which so valiantly had vanquished the horsemen of the enemies at the river Rhodanus: or those legions, with whom I followed in chase as it were, even these very enemies, and whose falling off and refusing battaile, I take to be a confession of victorie? But now for as much as that armie, being indeed levied for the province Spaine, serveth with my brother Cn. Scipio, under my name and commission, where it pleaseth the Senate and people of Rome, they should be employed; to the end that ye might have a Consul to be your Captaine against Anniball and the Carthaginians, I have willingly offered my selfe to this warre. If being then, your new Captaine, and you my new souldiours, meete it is and convenient I should use a few words unto you. And to the end you should not be ignorant, either of the manner of this service, or qualitie of your enemy; with those men ye are to fight, whom in the former Punick warre ye overcame both by land and sea; of whome for these twentie yeares ye have received tribute; from whome ye have woon (as the due wages and reward of the warre) Sicile, and Sadinia both, and them do hold and occupie. In this battaile therefore, both you and they are to cary that mind, and so to be affected, as winners and loosers are to be: for never thinke that it is valor & hardinesse that provoketh them now to fight, but meere necessitie and compulsion enforceth them to the field. Unless ye will beleieve, that they who when they had an entire armie, and unfoiled, refused battaile, should now have greater hope, and take more courage, after they have lost two parts of their horse and foote, in the very passage of the Alpes; and of whome, there have more perished in a manner, than remaine alive. But will some man say, True it is, few they are in number, but stout in heart, and tall of hand, whose strength and puissance, no force is hardly able to abide. Images they are, nay to say more truly, the very shadowes of men, and no better, with hunger bitten, with cold starved, lost for want of keeping, spoiled with nastinesse and filthie ordure, brused, and weakened amongst hard rocks and craggie cliffs: over and besides, joints and marrow dried up and burnt, their sinews shrunk, storked, and striffe againe with cold and chilling snow, their limmes singed with bitter frost, their armor crushed, bruised & their weapons broken: their horses, no other than lame, jades and poore hidebound hildings. See what horsemen, so what footmen ye are to fight withall. Beleieve me, ye shall have the verie reliques and last remnants of enemies, and not enemies indeed. And I assure you, nothing feare I more than this, that before ye shall skirmish with this kind of enemy, it will be thought that the Alpes already readie have vanquished and defeated Anniball. But peradventure it was so meete, and reason would, that the gods themselves without mans helpe, should against that captaine and nation, which had broken league and covenants, begin the warre first, set it in good forwardnesse, and bring it to the point of an end; and then we, who next to the gods have been offended & wronged, should finish the same thus begun to our hands, and brought to so good a passe, I feare not that that any man here doth thinke, that I utter these brave and glorious words: onely for to haue you, and that my selfe thinke otherwise in hart, than I speake with tongue. I might have gone my selfe well enough into Spaine, my proper and peculiar province, (where I had bene aforetime) and with an armie of mine owne: I should have had my brother there, both a counsellor unto me in my distresses, and a companion with me in my dangers. I found Asdruball rather than Anniball mine enemy, and no doubt, the affaires and charge of the warre farre lesse than here.

 But when I layd by the coast of France, and upon the bruit and newes of this enemy was set a land, I sent my Cavallerie before, and removed camp as farre as to Rhodanus, and in a battaile of horsemen (for with that part of my forces it was my hap to encounter & fight) I discom-fired the enemy: and for that by land I could not overtake his infanterie, (so haltilie they marched away, like men that fled) I was faine to returne to the sea, & embarke againe into my ships. and with as great expedition & speed as I could make (considering so great compasse about of sea and land) at the very foote of the Alpes, I was readie to encounter and affront him. Can it be thought then, that whiles I shunned and avoided fight, I fell by chance and at unwarres upon this drad and redoubted enemy: or rather, that I followed him hard at heeles, and challenged him to draw him forth unto a battaile; thereby to have it decided who should have the victorie in the end? I would gladly make tryall, whether all of a sodaine the earth hath brought forth for these twentie yeares, Carthaginians, of another mould or new stamp: or whether they be the same that fought neere the Ilands Egates, & whom ye sent away; and let go from Eryx, valued after the rate of 18* deniers apeece, and no more: and faine would I see, whether this Anniball be the concurrent of Hercules, to undertake his journeyes and voyages, as he saith himselfe, or one left by his father, a tributarie, a vassal, and slave of the people of Rome: who, but that he is tormented in conscience for the outrage and crueltie committed upon Saguntum, would have some respect and regard, if not of his native countrie (conquered and subdued) yet of his owne house, of the peace & covenants written by his father Amilcar, & his owne hand: Amilcar (say) who at the commandement of our Confull, removed his garrison from Eryx; who summing and storming, received with sorrowfull heart the grievous and heave conditions of peace imposed upon the conquered Carthaginians; who capitulated & covenanted to abandon Sicilie, & to pay a tribute to the people of Rome: I would have you therefore (my hardie souldiours) to fight against him, not onely with the same courage as ye do with other enemies, but in a certaine heate of choler and indignation, as if ye should see your owne servants and slaves on a sodaine to rise up in armes against you. We might well if we had bene so minded, when they were enclosed and shut fast up within Eryx, have put them to the utmost extremitie of all worldly paine, and famished them: We might have passed over with our victorious Annado into Affrike; and within few dayes forced and rased Carthage, without any battaile fought. We pardoned them at their humble request, and tooke them to mercie; we let them out where they were besieged and be-leagured; and notwithstanding that they were by us subdued, we made peace, & contracted amity tie with them: and afterward, when they were molested & distressed with the Africanos, warre counted them within our protection. In recompence of these good favours and demerits, they come against us, under the leading of an humorous brainless and furious yong man, to invade and assaile our countrie. And I would it had pleased God that we had in this warre for our bo-nor only and reputation, and not for our safetie and our lives. But we are to fight now, not for the holding & possession of Sicilie & Sardinia; as in times past, but for our owne behoold, & the em-ritance of Italie: and that which more is, there is no armie behind our backs, to withstand and make head against the enemy; if we chaunce to faile of victorie: neither are there any more Alpes, which while he is getting over, we might have leisure in the meane time to assemble and prepare new forces. Here in this very place (souldiers) must withstand to it, and make resistance if we were fighting under Rome walls. Let every man thinke that he is not onely to defend ward his owne bodie; but to protect his wife and little children: and let every one regard and take care, not for his private affaires and domestical charges, but for the good of the whole. That even now the Senate and people of Rome beholdeth and seeth our hardie deeds, and how our force and valour now proceedeth and sheweth itselfe, such from henceforth will the fortune fortune be of that citie and Empire of Rome.

These words had the Confull to the Romans. But Anniball, supposing that his men were faine to be encouraged by representation of some deedes, and then uttered these words, having man

A shalld his armie in around compasse (as it were) to behold some spectacle in a Theatre: he set in the midst of them all, the prisoners mountaineers, bound (as they were) hand and foot: and cast-ting downe at their feet, the armour and weapons of the Gauls, hee demanded of them by a a truchman, or an interpreter, Which of them (upon condition to be eased of his bands, and to have armor, & an horse of service, given him for a price of victorie) would enter into combat, and fight at the utterance, for his life. And when they all answered with one voice, That they wold with no better; & not one of them but called for a sword, and required to fight; and therupon, the lots were shuffled to be cast, and not one there was but wished himselfe to be the man, whom fortune would chuse for the combat. Then every man as his lot fell, in token of cheerefulness and contentment of spirit, leapt for joy among his fellowes that rejoiced in his behalfe, fell a dauncing after their manner, and so (hastily) took armes and weapons: all the while that they were in fight, there appeared such affection and disposition of mind, as well in them that were in the same state and condition; as also in those who stood there as spectators only in the multitude to looke on; that no lesse happie and fortunate were they accounted, whose chaunce it was to die in the place, than those who had the upper hand. Vpon the fight of some couples that were thus matched in combat, hee dismissed them: and whiles hee saw them in this good mind, so well affected and resolute, then hee assembled them all together to an audience, and thus by report hee spake unto them.

My valorous souldiours, if in the consideration of your owne fortune, yee will anon but beare that mind, which even now ye shewed in beholding the example of the state of others; the journey is ours, and we have the victorie. For that was not a dumbe shew and bare pageant, but a very mirror and patterne of your owne condition: and I wote not, whether fortune hath compassed about with harder bonds and greater necessities, your owne selves, or your prisoners. On both hands, as well the right as the left, enclosed yee are, and shut up within two seas; and have not so much as one ship to embarke in, for to escape away, and save your selves. Before you neer at hand is the Po, a greater river, and more violent than Rhodanus: behind you are the Alpes to hemme you in; the Alpes, I say, which yee hardly passed when you were in heart and lustie. Here must yee either get victorie (first) or lose your lives, even where ye have first encountred your enemy: and the same fortune, which hath laid upon you necessity of fight, presenteth & profereth unto you (if you go away with victorie) such rewards, as men use not to wish for greater and more honourable at the hands of the immortal gods. If by our manhood and valour wee should but recover and win againe Sicilie and Sardinia, which were gotten from our fathers; those were rewards and prizes sufficient: but now, over and besides, what riches or treasure the Romanes in so manie triumphs, have gathered, laid up, and held in possession, all that will be ours, yea, and the owners thereof themselves withall. Go to it then a gods name, and take arms, in assured hope of gaining so rich a bootie and reward. Yee have all this while bene long ynough a courting and chasing the wild beasts in the wide and desert mountaines of Lusitania and Celtiberia, and have scene no recompence and fruit of your travailes and daungers: it is now high time for you to serve in the warres for good pay and rich rewards, and to receive great wages and prizes for your labour and painful service; you that have measured so long a voiage, passed over so many mountains and rivers, & marched through so many armed & warlike nations. Here is the place where fortune hath set down the utmost bound, & pitched the farthest point and limit of your labours; here will she give you a condign recompence and salarie, after you have served and followed the warres the full time, by order and law required. Never thinke that the victorie will be so hardly achieved, as the warre in name is counted difficult. For oftentimes an enemy of small or no reckoning and regard, hath given a bloodie battaile; yea most noble States, most renowned and glorious kings, have in the verie turning of an hand bene overthrowne. For, setting aside this goodly, gay, and glittering name onely of the Romanes, what is there wherein they are with you to be compared? To say nothing of that continual warfare of yours, for 20 yeares space, with such valiancie & happy successe: even from Hercules pillars, from the Ocean, from the utmost bounds of the earth through so many nations of Spain, and most fell and cruell Gauls, ye are come thus farre with victorie. And now shall ye fight with an armie of new and untrained souldiours, who no longer ago than this verie Summer, were beaten, put to the sword, vanquished, and besieged by the Gauls; an armie (to say a truth) not knowne at all to their own capitaine, and as little acquainted with him. And to speake of mine owne person, if not borne, yet at leastwise brought up in the very very tent and roiall pavilion of my father (a most noble warriour and renowned captain of his time) who have subdued Spaine, conquered Gaule, overcome not only the people of the Alpes, but that which is much more, the very Alpes themselves. Should I make comparison between my selfe, and this halfe-yere-Captaine, who hath abandoned and left his owne campe and armie? Vnto whome, if a man should this day, present the Carthaginians and Romanes together, without their ensignes and colours, hee could not tell, I dare well say, of whether armie hee were the leader and Consull. For I make no small account, I tell you of this (my tall fellowes) that there is not one of you all, who hath not many a time and often scene and beheld my selfe in person, performing some warlike and militarie exploit; and unto whome I (as beholder and eye-witnesse of his valour) cannot recount the time and place of his worthie deed and service. Then yee praised and commended me, then yee rewarded and honoured me with divers gifts and presents. And even I (who have been a souldior trained up and taught by you, before I was your generall) will march in battaile against them, that know not one another, and are unknowne like wife unto their captaine. Which way soever I turne and cast mine eyes, mee thinkes, I see all full of couragious stomacke, and forcible puissance. The footmen, old beaten and practised souldiours; launces, and men of armes, with bard horses, and the light horiemen likewise, chosen forth of most hardie and valiant Nations: of one side, most faithfull and resolute allies; on the other, doubtie Carthaginians, readie to fight, as well in countries defence, as also for most just and due revenge. VVee come of our selves to make warre, and wee descend into Italie with banners displayed, resolved to fight with so much more courage, as they commonly who are assailants, have greater stomacke and more hope than the defendants. Over and besides, our hearts are kindled, and our minds pricked on and provoked with sence of injuries and indignities. First and foremost they required, that I your Generall should be delivered unto them, as a condemned prisoner at the barre: then they would have had all you that were at the assault of Saguntum, yeeled up into their hands, to be put to most extreame tortures and execution. A people they are, full of all excessive crueltie, insolent and proud beyond all measure; they would have but all in their power, and at their disposition: they must prescribe limit, and set downe, with whom wee should warre; with whom we may make peace; restraining and enclosing us within the terms and bounds of hills and rivers; which, forsooth, we must not passe: and they themselves keepe not the limits, which they appoint. Passe not (say they) Iberus in any wise; meddle not at all with the Saguntines; come not neere them. Saguntum standeth upon the river Iberus, step not one foot forward, we advise you. It sufficeth not their turne, that they have taken from us our ancient provinces, Sicilie and Sardinia, unlesse they may have away Spaine too. And if I should depart from thence, and quit that realme also, they would not stay there, but will passe over straight into Affricke: nay, they have sent over this yeare alreadie two Consuls, the one into Affricke, the other into Spaine: nothing have they left for us, but that which wee can win and hold with the swords point. VVell may they be cowards, and play the idle luskies, having a place of refuge to retire unto, who in their owne countrie and ground may be received, when they take their heels and run through waies without daunger, to save themselves. As for us, it stands us upon to play the men, and to make account of no meane designs betweene victorie and death, but upon certaine despaire of all shifts besides, either to obtaine victorie; or if fortune shall faile and give us the foile, chuse rather to die fighting, than to be killed flying. If this be seded and deeply imprinted in your hearts, if this be your resolution, I will say once againe, The day is yours. A more poignant and sharper goad, than this, to provoke men to victorie, never gave the immortal gods to any whatsoever.

When by these Orations, the souldiours hearts of both sides were inflamed to fight, the Romanes made a bridge over Ticinus: and for defence of the bridge, erected a sconce and fort thereupon. But Anniball while the enemies were busie at worke, sent Maharball with a Comt of Numidians, to the number of 500 light horsemen, to overrun and wast the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withall, to make as great spare of the Gaules as he could, and to sollicite and persuade their Nobles and Lords unto rebellion. After the bridge was finished, the Romane armie passed over into the Insubrians countrey, encamped themselves upon certaine hills, five miles off from a village where Anniball also lay in campe: who seeing there was a battaile toward, sent speedily for Maharball backe againe, and the horsemen; and thinking belike, that he could never say ynough to his souldiours, & admonish them

A them sufficiently to do well & animate them to fight, he called them all againe together to an audience; where he proposed, & promised unto them openly, certain assured rewards, the hope whereof might incite them to fight: namely, Imprimis, that he would indue them with faire lands, in Italy, Affricke, or Spaine, where they would themselves, to have, & to enioie to him and to his heires for ever, as free hold in frank tenure, without service: if anyone would chuse to have money rather than land, him he would content with silver. Item, of the Allies, as many as hereafter were desirous to be enfranchised citizens of Carthage, they should have their free burgesie: and those that had a mind rather to returne home againe, he would endeavour and bring about that he should live so well, as not one of them would wish for to exchange his state with any of his neightbours and countymen whatsoever. Last of all, looke what bond-servants attended and followed their maisters, to them he promised freedome; and that in lieu of them, he would deliver againe unto their maisters, two for one, of the slaves taken captives in warre. And that they might be assured, that he would performe all these behests and promises, he held with his left hand a Lambe, and in the right a flint stone, and prayed solemnly, That if hee failed herein, Jupiter and the rest of the gods, would so kill him, as hee slew that Lambe: and presently after his prayer done, he smote the Lambe on the head, and dashed out the braines. Whereat they all every one, conceived & embraced assured hope unto themselves, that the gods said Amen and were on their side: & supposing that the only stay of enjoying their hopes, & obtaining their rewards, was, because they had not fought alreadie, with one heart and voice they called for battell.

The Romanes for their part, were nothing so cheerefull and lustie: for besides other things, they were affrighted with new prodigies and feareful sights. For it happened that a Wolfe entred their campe, and after he had worried and tome those that came in his way, escaped unhurt and untouched. Also a swarme of Bees ferled upon a tree that grew over the Generall his pavilion. Which straunge tokens being purged and cleered by an expiatorie sacrifice, Scipio with his Cavallerie & darters lightly appointed, went toward the campe of the enemy, to view neere hand their forces, & to observe how many & of what condition & qualitie they were: and there he encountred Anniball, who also was gone forth with his horsemen to descrie & discover the countie about. At the first they saw not one another, but afterwards, by reason of the thicke dust that rose upon the march of so many men and horses, they knew that enemies approached neere. On both sides the battailions made a stand, and every man buckled himselfe to the skirmish.

Scipio placed his archers and horsemen of the Gaules in the forefront: the Romanes and strength of allies, he bestowed behind for succours in the reeregard. Anniball set in this battaile, his great barbed horses with his launces & men of armes, & strengthened the wings with Numidian horsemen. The very first charge & showt was scarce done, when the archers afore said retired among the reereward in the second battaillon: by occasion whereof, the horsemen alone fought a good while in equall battaile: yea and afterwards, because the footmen that were intemengled among troubled and disordered the horses, many either fel; or else alighted from their horses, to go thither where they saw their fellows to be environed & overcharged. The medley became very doubtfull in many places until such time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, shewed themselves behind the backs of the Romanes: this feareful sight troubled them greatly, and the feare was encreased by reason of the Consul his hurt, the extreme danger whereof was put by and avoided by the rescue of his sonne (then a verie stripling as yet, and scarce had asy haire upon his face) this youth is he, who had the honour of happy ending this warre, slain afterwards (upon the noble victorie and memorable conquest over Anniball & the Carthaginians) Asdruballus. But the archers were they that fled fastest away, even those whom the Numidians set upon first. The rest that were horsemen keeping thicke and close together, recovered the Consul within their files into the mids of them: and protecting him not onely with their weapons, but also with their bodies, brought him backe safe, unto the campe, reading all the way, neither disorderly, nor like fearefull men overhastily. The honour of saving the Consul, Calpurnius attributed unto a bondslave of Liguria. But I verily would rather believe it of the sonne, which also the greater number of authors doe ascribe, but the common fame both of the said bondslave. This was the first battaile with Anniball: where he easily appeared, that the Carthaginians were better in Cavallerie, and therefore the open plaine field (such as were betwene the Po and the Alpes, were not so good for the Romanes to fight in). The night following therefore Scipio commanded his souldiours secretly without any noise to trusse up bag and baggage, and and to dislodge: and removed from Ticinus, & made hast to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unloosed one from the other, in which (as upon a bridge) he had brought over his armie, he might without any trouble & pursuit of the enemy, conduct the same backe againe. And they came to Placentia before that Anniball knew they were departed from Ticinus: howbeit, hee tooke some of them that made stay on the hether side of the banke, as they were too slow about disjoining and loosening the foresaid bridge of boates: upon which he could not passe over, by reason that when both ends were let loose, the planks and all, went downe the water with the streame. Calius writeth, that Mago with his horses, and Spanisb footmen, presently swam over the river; and that Anniball himselfe led over his armie at the upper foulds of Po: for which purpose, hee set the Elephants along on arow to breake and beare off the violence and streame of the current. A thing surely that they were hardly able to doe, who were skilfull and by long experience knew the nature of the river verie well. For it foundeth not like a truth, that horsemen with their armor and horses safe, could overcome so great a rage of the river, although we should graunt that all the Spaniards gat over upon blown bladders or leather bouges; and besides, they had needed many daies to fetch a compasse for to find the foulds of Po, over which the armie (laden with cariage) might be conveyed. But those authors cary more credit and authoritie with me, who write that scarcely in two daies they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joyned together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spanisb light-horsemen were sent that way over before.

While Anniball on this side the river, staied in giving audience to the embassages of the Gauls, he conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the meane while, Mago and the horsemen, after they had passed the river, marched one * daies journey apace toward the enemies at Placentia. And Anniball (few daies after) encamped himselfe strongly six miles from Placentia: and the morrow after in the sight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them offer of battaile. The night following, there was a petie massacre committed in the Romans camp by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garboile and tumult, than the harme indeed. For about 2000 footmen and 200 horsemen, having slaine the warders at the gates, fled away to Anniball: whom he spake courteously unto, and when he had drawne them on, in hope of great gifts and rewards, he dismissed every one into his owne citie and countrie, to sollicite and persuaide their countriemen to side with him. Scipio taking that massacre as a foretoken and overtur to the Gauls revolt in generall; and supposing, that now being once guiltie and tainted with this offence, they would in a madnesse runne all to take arms and rise. Although still hee were fore of his late wound, yet the night following at the reliefe of the 4 watch, he marched stilly, and removed his campe neere the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hils, that were more troublesome for men of armes. But he wrought not so closely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as hee did at Ticinus: For Anniball having sent out, first, the Numidian light horse, and then all his Cavallerie; without question had disordered and endamaged the rereward, but that the Numidians for greedinesse of prey and boote, diverted aside, and turned into the tents, abandoned and forsaken of the Romanes. Where, whiles they spent time in ranfaking and rifling everie corner of the campe (and when all was done, could find no pillage worth the stay) the enemy escaped their hands. And when as they had espied that the Romanes were newly gotten over Trebia, and pitching out a plot for a campe, they intercepted a few of them that lingered about the river, and slew them. Scipio notable now to abide any longer the griefe and paine of his wound, by reason of the shaking and shogging of his bodie as he travailed, and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Consull his Colleague, (whom he heard alreadie to be sent for out of Sicily) chose out a place neere the river which seemed most safe for to encampe in, and it he fortified. Anniball also lay, not farr off in campe, who as he was proud upon the late battaile of horsemen, so was he perplexed for want of victuals, which scarcitie encreased upon him everie day more and more, as he travailed through the enemies countrie, finding in no place provision aforesaid. Whereupon, he went to Clasidium, a towne wherein the Romanes had bestowed and laid up great store of graine; where, as he prepared with violence to force the towne, there appeared some hope of reason, by corrupting of P. Brundisius, the captaine of the garison there; and that with no great summe of money, for consideration onely of 400 peeces of gold given unto him, Clasidium was betrayed unto Anniball: the verie storehouse and garner of corne that the Carthaginians had, all the while they were

A were in leaguer neere Trebia: Vpon those prisoners that were taken when the garison and fort was betrayed, he exercised no crueltie, because that in the beginning of his affaires, he would win himselfe a name and opinion of clemencie.

While the warre by land continued thus at Trebia, there had bene some warlike exploits atchieved both by sea and land about Sicilie; and the Ilands that lye against Italie neere unto it, both by Sempronius the Consull, and also before his coming. Twentie gallies with five ranks of ores, and a thousand armed men, were sent from the Carthaginians to invade and wast the coasts of Italie. Nine of them arrived at * Liparae: eight fell with the Iland of * Vulcane, and three were driven by tempest into the streights of Sicilie. Against them, being deservied within kenning, there were twelve ships set out from * Messana, by Hiero King of the Saracossians, who

B hapned at that time to be in Messana, attending the Romane Consull his coming; and without any resistance made, he boured those three ships, & brought them away into the haven of Messana. By those that were taken prisoners, it was knowne, that besides the 20. ships aforesaid, sent against Italy, (of which Fleet they were) 35 gallies of 5 course of ores, made saile for Sicilie, to sollicit and persuaide the old allies there to revolt. Item, that the especiall point and designe that they shot at, was to seize upon * Lilybæum: but they thought verily that by the same ghuilt of tempest wherein they were scattered, that other fleet also was cast upon the Iland Ægates. And according to this intelligence, the king from Messana writeth to Atmyllus the Romane Pretor or governor of Sicilie, advising him to keepe a strong garison in Lilybæum: whereupon the Lieutenants & Colonels about the Pretor, were sent from him with all speede to all the cities about, to

C give order, that their people might be in readinesse, to keepe good ward, & above all, to hold Lilybæum sure. And for preparation of war, there went forth a proclamation, that the sailers & mariners should bring into the ships ten dayes provision of victuals & meate readie dressed, to the end that upon the signall given at an houres warning, without all delay, they should a shipboard: Also that all those that dwelt along the coast, should from their Sentinels, watch-towers, and beacons, espie when the enemies fleet approached. Now (albeit the Carthaginians of purpose stayed the course of their ships, that they might come iust before day to Lilybæum) they were discovered, both for that the Moone shone all night, and also because they came under sayle which they had hauled up. So soone therefore as the signall was given out of the Sentinels and watch-towers, & alarme cryed in the towne, the mariners were soone embarked, the souldiers also

D were bestowed, some to man & guard the walls, and guard the gates, others to serve in the ships. But the Carthaginians perceiving, they were to deale with them that were provided for them, (as being advertised of their coming) forbore to enter the haven untill day, and imployed the time in striking sayles, in untackling their ships, and in preparing them for a battaile. When it was broad day light, they retired into the deepe, to have sea roome enough to fight, and that the enemies ships might have free egress out of the haven. The Romanes for their part refused not battaile, comforting themselves with the remembrance of the valiant exploits performed in that very place, and trusting also upon the number and valor of their souldiours. They were not so soone launched into the open sea, but the Romanes were desirous to grapple, and to come close to hand-fight: but contrarywise, the Carthaginians held off aloofe, willing to proceede by cunning and pollicie, more than by strength and fine force; and to make triall rather of the nimblenesse & agilitie of their ships, than either of the prowesse of men, or goodnesse of armour: for as their fleet was sufficiently furnished and to the full, with a multitude of mariners, so was it ill provided of souldiours: and wheresoever they grappled together, and came to hand-fight, they had not an egall number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once perceived, the Romanes gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reason of their number; the other side againe were discouraged and out of heart, for their default of souldiours. In so much as seven Carthaginian gallies were soone invested round and boured, the rest fled. Of souldiours and mariners together, 1700 were in them taken; amongst whom, there were three great Gentlemen of Carthage. The Romane fleet still entier and whole, save one vessel onely that was boused and pierced (yet able to be brought back) returned into the haven.

E F Presently after this battaile, and before that they of Messana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempronius the Consull arrived at Messana: and as he entred within the sound, king Hiero met him, with a fleet well furnished, and richly decked, and comming forth of his royall ship into the Admirall of the Consuls, he welcomed him, and reioyced for the safe returne of his men and ships, ships, and prayed God, that his voiage into Sicilie might proove happie and fortunate. Then shewed he unto him the present estate, and the affaires of the land; opened the designements of the Carthaginians; and promised withall, that with as good a mind and found hart, as in the former warre against the Carthaginians, when he was a yong man, he had aided the people of Rome; so now in his old age he would assist them: and for proove hereof, he would of his owne free cost furnish both the Consuls legions, and also the mariners with come, and rayment. Among other matters, he enformed him how Lilybæum, & other cities on the sea coast were in great danger, by reason of some among them that desired a change & alteration. Whereupon, the Consull thought good to make no delay, but to set saile with all speede to Lilybæum, whome the king and his royall fleet accompanied: and as they were sayling, tidings came of the foresaid battaile before Lilybæum, and how the enemies ships were either scattered & put to flight, or boarded and taken.

The Consull having bid king Hiero adieu, with his fleet set sayle from Lilybæum, leaving behinde him the Pretor to defend the coast of Sicilie, and crossed the sea himselfe to the land * Melita, which was held by the Carthaginians. At whose comming, Amilcar the sonne of Gisgo, Captaine of the garrison there, rendered himselfe, and 2000 souldiours with in a very few, together with the towne & the land. From whence, within few dayes he returned to Lilybæum: where, the prisoners (excepting certain noble persons of high parentage) were by the Consull and the Pretor both, sold openly in port sale. When the Consull thought Sicilie on that coast sure enough, he set sayle from thence toward the Ilands of Pulcane, for that the bruit went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay at roade: but there were no enemies to be found about those Ilands: for it chanced they were alreadye passed over to waite along the river and coast of Italie; and having forayed the territorie of * Vibo, they put the citie also in great feare. As the Consull returned back againe to Sicilie, tidings came that the enimie had made rodes into the countrie of Vibona: and he received letters also from the Senate, concerning the comming of Anniball into Italie, and therefore that he should with all speede possible aid and succour his Colleague. The Consull being at once troubled with many cares, presently embarked his armie, and by the Adriatique sea, sent them away to * Ariminum. To Sext. Pompeius his Lieutenant, he gave the charge of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territorie of Vibo, and the sea coast of Italie. With M. Aemilius the Pretor, he left a fleet augmented to the number of fiftie sayle: which done, and all things set in order in Sicilie, himselfe with ten ships coasted along Italie, and arrived at * Ariminum, from whence he put himselfe in his journey, and marched with one armie to the river * Trebia, where he joynd with his fellow Consull. Now were both Consuls, and the whole puissance and force of the Romanes opposed against Anniball, so as it appeared plainly, that either with that powre the empire of Rome might be defended, or else all their hope was gone. Howbeit, one of the Consuls being weakened and discouraged with the defeature of his horsemen in one battaile, and dismayed besides with the hurt that he had received in his bodie, desired to have the fight deferred: but the other comming fresh and lustie, and thereby more hardie, would abide no delay.

It fell out so at that time, that the Gaules inhabited all the countrey betweene the two rivers Trebia, and Po: who whiles these two most puissant nations were at strife and warred; held off as newters, and favoured neither side, making full account of the good will and grace of that part which should have the better. The Romanes because they would now make no stirre, and have no more yrons in the fire, tooke the matter well enough: but Anniball was very much thereat offended, geving out estoones, that he was sent for by the Gaules for their deliverance and libertie. Vpon this indignation and displeasure, and for that also he would feede his men with booties, he commaunded 2000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen, most of them Numidians, and some Gaules among, to overrun & spoile all the countrey forward, even to the banks of Po. The Gaules standing in need of helpe, and having untill that time kept themselves in doubtful tearmes, were forced to turne from those that offered them wrong, and to incline and cleave unto the Romanes that should revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they sent Embassadours to the Consuls, requesting the Romanes helpe for their land, which by reason of the exceeding fidelitie, and too much loialtie of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the cause, nor yet the time to deale in such affaires: he had the nation besides in suspicion and jealousie, as well for many trecherous parts, as also (in case he would

A or could forget all other leaud pranches of theirs) for the late disloialtie and falshood of the Boians. Sempronius contrariwise thought it the surest bond to keepe their allies in faith and allegiance; to defend those that came first to band and side with him. But notwithstanding his Colleague cast doubts and held off, yet he sent his own Cavallerie, and a thousand well nere of footmen darters amongst them, to guard the countrie of Gaulle beyond Trebia: who comming suddainly upon the enemies, and charging them at unawares, as they came scattered asunder, and out of order, yea, and most of them laden with spoile, mightily affrighted them, and made a foule slaughter, and pursued them in flight, as farre as to their standing campe, and corps de guard. From whence (nevertheless) they were beaten backe by the multitude that issued forth: but by new succours from their owne companies, they renewed the medley againe. The fight afterward was doubtfull and variable: and although they made a saving bargain on both parts, yet the common voice gave the honour of victorie (such as it was) to the Romanes rather than the enemies. But no man made a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the full, than the Consull himselfe. He joyed, he made his boast; that he had gotten the better, with the helpe of the same forces, which under the conduct of the other Consull, came by the worse. And now (saith he) the souldiours are comforted and refreshed well ynough; and none there is but my brother Consull that would have the battaile deferred: who no doubt is more hen-hearted than bodily hurt; & for the remembrance and smart of a little green wound, quaketh to hear of the field, and of all things cannot away with edge-tooles. But we must not thus sit still here, and waxe aged for the pleasure of one crasse and fleskly person. For what reason is it, that we should drive off longer, and spend more time in vaine? What other Consull expect we to make up the third, or what armie besides should we looke for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italie, and welner within the view and sight of the citie of Rome: and it is neither Sicilie nor Sardinia taken from them by conquest, nor Spaine on this side Iberus, which they shoot at, to win againe: but that the Romanes should be thrust out of their native soile and countrey wherein they were borne, that is their drift and designement. Oh how deeply (quoth hee) would our fathers sigh, how hartly would they grone, they who were wont to manage warre about the walls of Carthage, if they should see us their off-spring and children, two Consuls with Consular and roiall armies in the midst of Italie, frighted thus and panting for feare within our campe? And that Anniball hath subdued and brought under his subjection all the countrey betweene the Alpes and Apenninum? These and such like speeches uttered he to his Colleague, as he sat by his beds side, where he lay sicke: thus spake he, as in an open audience, in the Consuls pavilion and all that quarter, to the souldiours. The time also of the Election of Magistrates at Rome, being so nere at hand, set him forward; for feare, least the war should be deferred unto the new Cons. and the opportunitie withall, of winning all the honor to himselfe whiles his Colleague continued sicke, pricked him on. Whereupon, for all the contradiction of Cornelius, which he nothing weighed and regarded, commaundement hee gave to his souldiours to be ready, to give battaile anone unto the enimie, Anniball as one that knew and saw well ynough what was best and safest for his enimie, could hardly imagine or conceive any hope to himselfe, that the Consuls would enterprise any thing rashly, or without advisement: but when he understood by hear-say, that which afterwards by good proove and experience he found true, namely, that the one of them by nature was hote, halfe, proud, and furious; and supposing, that he was the prowder and more furious for the late good hand hee had of his forragers; made no doubt and distrust of the happie successe and issue of a battaile, whensoever it should come. Marry, carefull hee was, that no good time and opportunitie presented unto him, should be overslipped: but to trie the hazard and fortune of the field, whiles the enemies souldiours were raw and untrained; and the better and wiser man of the two Generals, was unmeet for service, by reason of his wound as yet uncured; and the courages of the Gaules lustie and forward: for well he wist, that a mightie number of them would the more unwillingly follow, the further they were drawne from their owne home. Anniball, I say, hoping that by these and such like occasions, a battaile would be soone offered; desirous also himselfe to bid battaile, if the enimie staid long; and being advertised besides by the Gaules, his espials (whom he employed to hearken out and learne what he desired to know, and thought them more sure, because they served in both camps) that the Romanes were ready for the field; then began he (crasse Carthaginian as he was) to seek out a convenient place for an ambush. Now there was in the mid way betweene a river running within the borders, having very high banks of either side, and therefore lying close horfmen raunged about, and made excursions into every quarter; and those who troubled and impeached them, more than they the Celtiberians and Portugals. Whereby all convoy of victuals from everie part was stopped, but onely that which came by the Po, in keeles and such like vessels. Neere to Placentia there was a merchants towne, both fortified strongly, and all well furnished with a good garnison: upon hope of force that castle or towne, Anniball went with his horse and foot, lightly armed; and supposing that to carry the matter covertly, would avayle much to the effecting of his purposed enterprise. He came upon them in the night; howbeit he was not so close and secret, but he was descried by the watch: who sodainly set up such an al arme, that it was heard as farre as Placentia. Whereby the Consull somewhat before day was there with his Cavallerie, having commaunded the Infanterie to march on after, raunged in square battaillon. In the meane while, the horfmen skirmished, wherein Anniball was hurt, and departed out of the medley, by which meanes the enemies were frightened, and the castle and hold manfully defended. After few daies that he had taken his ease, before he was well cured of his wound, he went forward to assault Vicunvio. That was a towne also of merchants (or mar townes) and had bene fortified by the Romanes in the Gaules warre. Whereupon, the people bording thereabout on everie side, used thither to make repaire, & much frequented the same; and even then for feare of rodes & excursions many of the peasants & rural people retired themselves thither for refuge. This multitude (such as they were) upon the report of the valiant holding and defence of the fort by Placentia, were encouraged, and took armes, and went forth to encounter Anniball. And in the mid-way they chaunced to affront him and skirmish, in no battaile ray, but as they marched disorderly: whereas therfore they were on the one side, none but a rude and confused fort; and on the other side, both a captain that might trust his soldiors, and soldiors also that might reckon upon their captain, there were to the number of 35000, discomfited & put to flight, even by a few of their enemies. The morrow after, they yielded themselves, and received a garnison within the wals; and so soone as upon commandement to give up their armour, they had obeyed & so done, presently a signal was given to the conquerors to sack and spoile the towne, as if it had been forced by assault: where there was not forgotten and omitted any calamitie whatsoever, that might afford in such a case, memorable matter and sufficient argument for writers to record. So pitifull examples were practised upon the poore seely wretches, of all loosenesse and lust, cruetie, and inhumaine pride and outrage. And these were the expeditions and emprises of Anniball atchieved for this winter time.

After this, the soldiors tooke repose, but no longer than the intollerable cold lasted: For immediately upon the verie first and doubtfull tokens of spring, he departed from his winning hold, and led his armie into Tuscanie, purposing to adioine unto him (either by force or love) that nation also, as well as the Gauls and Ligurians. But as he passed over Apenninus, there arose so terrible a storme & tempest, & surprised him, that it surmounted well neere the foule trouble and encombrance endured in the Alpes. For the wind and raine together did beat & drive upon their verie faces. At the first, for that either they were to lay away their armour, or else in striving and labouring to march on against the weather, & by the while puffes of wind turned round about, and readie to bee borne downe, they stood still: but when as now the violence and furie of the storme, stopped their breaths, and suffered them not to take their wind at will; they were faine to turne their backs, and sit them downe on the ground for a time. Then see, the skie thundred amaine, and made an horrible noise, & amid those terrible crackes redoubled, it lightened thicke. Whereupon, they lost their hearing and seeing; and for feare, all of them became astounded. At length it poured downe, and thereby the wind & storme increased more forceable upon them. Whereupon they were driven to this necessitie, even to pitch their camp in that verie place where they were so suddainly caught and overtaken by tempest. But that was to them the beginning of a new toile and travaile: for neither could they spread and display ought, nor pitch any thing surely: neither would that which was pight downe, continue and abide the wind, which rent, tare, and broke everie thing, and hurried it cleane away. And within a while, the water that fell, and by reason of the wind was raised aloft, being congealed once upon the cold tops of the hills, turned into a kind of haile and snow together, & came upon them with such a force, that leaving all things els, the men were forced to lie along, groveling upon their faces, rather stifled and smothered; than covered with their billings. Hereupon ensued a frost so violent and outrageous, that of that miserable and pitifull heape of men and beasts, that lay there along, there was not one

A for a good while could raise and lift up himselfe when hee would, by reason, that for stake cold their sinewes were benumbed, that they could hardly bend and bow their joints. Afterwards, at length, when with bestiring and chaunging their limmes, they gat some heat, and came againe to themselves, and that here and there in some places they began to make fires, every one that had no meanes so to doe, ran and fled to the succour and helpe of others. Thus for two daies they remained there pined up as if they had bene besieged. Many a man and beast, and seven Elephants also of them that remained after the battaile at Trebia, were starved and perished.

By occasion hereof, Anniball departed from Apenninus, back againe toward Placentia: and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he fate him downe and encamped. The morrow after, he led against the enemy 12000 foot, and 5000 horse. Sempronius the Consull also, being now returned from Rome, refused not battaile: and the same day, the enemies were distant but three miles asunder. The morrow after they fought on each side most fiercely and courageously, and with variable event and fortune. At the first onler, the Romanes had the better hand, so farre forth, as that not onely in fight they overcame their enemies, but also after they had discomfited them, and put them backe, they chased them into their campe, and anone assailed the same. Anniball having ordained some few to defend the rampier and the gates, retired the rest thicke and close together into the mids of the campe, and commaunded them to give earre, and bee attentive to the signal, when he would have them issue forth. Now was it the ninth hower of the day, when the Roman Consull having toiled and wearied his souldiours to no purpose, and seeing no hope to win the campe, sounded the retreat. Which so soone as Anniball heard, and saw the fight withall to stake and waxe cold, and the enemy retired backe from the canipe, presently sallied forth himselfe with the whole strength of his Infanterie, for hee had sent out his horfmen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not bene lightly a more fierce and cruell battaile stricken, and more memorable, for the small mischefe of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted the medley, which was hotely begun with exceeding stomacke and courage. Whereupon, the confronting and charging one of another, was more eager, than the slaughter bloudie betweene them; and as the fight in manner was egall, so they parted with losse alike. For of each side there died above sixe hundred footmen, and halfe as many horfemen. But the losse on the Romans side was greater than in proportion of the number, because certaine of the degree and calling of knights, and five Colonels, and three Captaines of the Allies, were slaine.

After this journey, Anniball went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Luca: To welcome Anniball at his first coming into Liguria, there were delivered unto him two Roman Questors or Treasurers, Cn. Fabius, and L. Lucretius, who were intercepted by the Ligurians, and taken in a traine of ambush, with two Colonels, and five others besides, whose fathers by calling were as good as Senators fellowes: and this was done, because he should assure himselfe the better, that the peace and amitie contracted with them, would be faithfully kept and observed.

Whiles these things thus passed in Italie, Cn. Scipio who was sent into Spaine with a flecte & armie for sea & land; having set saile from the mouth of Rhodanus, & compassed the mountaines E Pyrenei, arrived at a place called Emporia: where he disbarked and landed his forces, and reduced unto the Roman empire all the country, beginning at the Lacetanes, and so from thence all the sea coast as farre as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing the ancient leagues, and partly by devising meanes to contract new. Whereupon, there rose a great name of him for his clemeencie; whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the sea side, but also amongst the inlanders and mounteiners, even to the nations that were more fierce and savage: with whom he not onely made peace, but also wrought them so, that they tooke armes in his quarell, and there were levied from among them, certaine strong cohorts and bands for to aid and succour him. Hanno, whom Anniball had left for defense of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore before all was gone, and the country alienated, he thought good to meete with this mischefe: and having pitched his campe in sight of the enemies, set his men in ordinance of battaile. The Roman captain likewise resolved not to deferre the fight; knowing that so, he might be forced to encounter both with Hanno and Asdruball, and rather yet he desired to deale with them one after the other single, than at once with both. But this battaile was not so much dangerous. Sixe thousand enemies were left behinde slaine, and two thousand taken prisoners, together with those those that were left for the gard of the camp. For both the camp was forced & woon; and also the General himself with certain guards was taken prisoner. Moreover Stissum, a towne neere unto the camp, was woon by assault: howbeit, the spoile & pillage of the towne were matters of small worth and value, namely, the household stuffe, and such pelfe and trumpery of barbarous people, and certaine poore base slaves. It was the camp that enriched the souldiers: by reason that not onely the armie which was now vanquished, but that also which with Anniball served in Italie, had left behind them about Pyreneus, all good things to speake of, that they set store by, because they would go lightly, and not be encombred with carriages. Before any certaine report of this overthrow came to Asdruball, he had passed over Iberus, with 8000 footemen, and 1000 horsemen, as purposing, to make head against the Romanes at their first comming: but when he heard how the field was lost, and the camp withall, he turned his journey to the sea. And not farre from * Tarragona, he found the souldiers of the Armado, and the mariners besides, wandering and straggling over the fields (for usuall it is, that happie successe should breede carelesse negligence) whereupon he sent out his horsemen every way, and with great slaughter and flight he chased them to their ships: and not adventuring to make any longer stay thereabout, for feare to be surprisid by Scipio, he retyred back to the other side of Iberus. Scipio also upon the first report of these new enemies, having rallied his forces together in great hast, after he had slightly chastised a few captaines, and left behinde him a small garrison at Tarracon, returned with his flecte to Emporiae. He had no sooner departed from thence, but Asdruball was there in his place; and having induced and incited the State of the Illegetes (who had given hostages to Scipio) for to revolt and rebell, even with their owne youth wasted the territories of all thole that continued faithfull confederates to the Romanes. Afterwards, when Scipio was roused once out of the place where he wintered, the enemy retyred againe, and quit all the country on that side Iberus. Then Scipio having in hostile manner invaded the countries, abandoned & left by him that was the author & cause of their rebellion, and by that meanes the nation likewise of the Illegetes, after he had driven them all within Athanagia, which is their capitall towne, he layd siege unto it round about, and within few dayes brought the whole seignorie of the Illegetes under his obedience: and besides a greater number of hostages than before (which they were constrained to deliver) he condemned them in a good round summe of money. From thence he went forward against the Ausetanes, neere to Iberus, being associates also to the Carthaginians: & having beleaguered their citie, he forsaide & intercepted the Lacetanes as they came by night to succour their neighbours, not farre from the towne, even as they were at the point to enter in. There were slaine of them 12000, and the rest being welneere all disarmed, fled every way scattering here and there over the fields home to their houses. All the help and defense that they had who were within, was only the foule and cold winter weather, evermore naught and humfull to assailants that lye forth. The siege lasted thirtie dayes, during which time, seldome fell the snow lesse than foure foote deepe, and so covered the pentises and mantlets of the Romanes, that when the enemies slung fire sundrie times thereupon, that alone saved the same, and nothing else. In the end, upon the departure of their Prince Amurstinus, who was fled to Asdruball, they yelded, upon condition to pay * twenty talents of silver, & so Scipio returned to Tarracon, there to winter.

But that yeare, at Rome and about the citie, were many strange and prodigious signes seene, or at leastwise (a thing usuall when mens minds are once touched with religion, and given to make scruple) many were reported, and soone beleevd. Among which, this was one; that a babe of condition free borne, and but halfe yeere old, cryed with a loud voice in the hearbe market Io Triumphe. Also in the beasts market, an Oxe of himselfe undriven, climbed up to the third loft or storie of an house, and from thence being frighted with the stire and noyse of the dwellers by, cast himselfe downe. Moreover, there was seene in the welkin or element, the resemblance of a navie of ships; and the temple of Lady * Spes, standing in the hearbe market, was smitten with lightning. Likewise at Lanuvium the speare of Iuno shooke and brandished of it selfe: and a Raven flew into Iunoes church, and lighted upon the very Shrine or Alter of Iuno. In the territorie of * Amitemum, in many places were seene men as it were in white garments, but only a farte off; for as folke went neerer and neerer, they appeared not, and could not be met withall. In Picenum it rained stones: and at Cere the lots were found diminished; and in Gaule, a Wolfe drew forth a watchman his sword out of his scaberd, and caryed it away. For other prodigious tokens, order

A order was given to the Decenvirs to peruse the books of Sibylla. But for the raiming of stones in Picenum, there was ordained a Novendial feast for nine dayes: and for the expiation of the other prodigies, the whole citie in manner was occupied in their devotions. And now above all other things the citie was solemnly purged, and greater beasts killed in sacrifice in the honor of those gods, for whom they were ordeined, and a present of gold weighing * 40 pound, was caried unto Iuno at Lanuvium. And the dames and matrons of Rome erected a moken image of brasie for Iuno in Aventinum & at Cere where the lots were diminished, was appointed a Lectisternie, and a proceffion or supplication to Fortune in Algidum. At Rome also, there was a Lectisternie solemnised to Juventa [the goddesse of youth] and a solemn proceffion at the church of Hercules. Moreover, expresse commaundement was given to all the people, to make proceffion and supplication at every altar and Shrine of their gods. And to god Genius, they sacrificed five greater beasts. And C. Atilius Serranus the Pretor, was commaunded to pronounce a solemn vow, in case the Commonweale continued in the same good estate, ten yeares, and decayed not. These portentuous prodigies thus expiated, and vowes made according to Sibylls booke, eased mens hearts mightly of their religious feare. Then one of the elect Consuls, to wit, Flaminius, to whome were allotted those Legions which wintered at Placentia, sent an Edict with letters to the Consull, that the armie should bee in campe at Ariminum, upon the * Ides of March. His purpose was, to enter into his Consulship in the province, remembering the old contentions and debates which hee had with the Nobles, first when hee was a Tribune of the Com, and afterwards when hee was Cof, as wel about the Consulship (of which, they would have deprived him) as also about the triumph, which they denied him. Hated hee was besides of the Senate, for the new Act or Law, which Q. Claudius (a Tribune of the Commons) had made, so prejudiciall to the Senate; and onely C. Flaminius, of all the Nobles, supported it and set it forward; namely, That no Senator, or father of a Senator, should have a ship at sea, bearing above * 300 Amphores: for that was thought sufficient to transport their commodities and fruits to Rome, rising out of their lands and livings. And as for all other gaine by trafficke, it was not becomming a Nobleman and Senator. This matter having been debated with great contention, caused the proposer of this law (Flaminius) to incur much evil will and displeasure with the Nobilitie, but it procured him the affection and love of the Commons; and in proceffe of time a second Consulship. Supposing therefore, that with iterating the Auspices, and putting him to take the presages anew by the flight of birds, and by finding other delaies, upon occasion of the Latine holy daies, and one businesse or other belonging to the Consuls charge, they would detainee and keepe him backe still in the citie; he set a countenance, as though hee would take a journey like a private person, and so departed secretly into the Province. Which thing, when it was once blazed abroad, made the Nobles who were afore maliciously bent against him, to be angrie anew; and they gave out, that it was not the Senate onely, that C. Flaminius warred against, but the immortall gods also. For hee, who before time had been made Cof, without regard of taking Auspices, and having the approbation of the birds, when he was reclaimed and called both by God and man out of the field, obeyed not: and now, having a heave conscience, surcharged with offences past, hath fled from the Capitoll and the solemn nuncupation & making of vowes, for that he would not upon the ordinarie day of entering his Magistracie, visite the Temple of Iup. Opt. Max. nor (because he was odious to the Senate, and they likewise hated of him alone) see them, and aske their advise and counsaile; nor proclaim the Latine holydayes, and celebrate to Iup. Latialis, the solemn yearly sacrifice upon the Alban hill: ne yet, after he had entred into the Capitoll by the luckie flight and token of birds, pronounce his vowes there, and depart from thence in his rich coate-armor toward the province. They sayd moreover, that he was slipst and stolne secretly away like a drudge that followeth the camp, without the ensignes and ornaments of authoritie, without Sergeants and officers, as if hee had bene banished, and so left his countrie, minding belike to enter his government more for the honor and dignitie of Ariminum than of Rome; and to put upon him his purple robe of estate, embrodred with skarlet rather in an hostellie, and common Inne, than in his owne house. They all every one opined and judged, that he should be recalled and brought back againe peremptorily, yea and be forced personally at home to performe all duties belonging to God and man, before that he went forth to the province and to the armie. About this embassage (for they thought meete to send embassadors) went Q. Terentius, and M. Antistius: but they prevailed no more than in his former former Consulship the letters inuifive had done, which were sent from the Senate. A few dayes after he entred his office, and as he was sacrificing, the calfe or yong bullock being already stuck, got away from the hands of the sacrificers, & spotted many of the standers by with bloud. But they that stood farre off, not knowing what the matter was of that sturre, fled away, and ran too and fro: which of most men was judged a foretocken and, presage of some great affright and trouble. After this, when he had received the two legions of Sempronius the Consul of the yeare before, and other two of C. Attilius the Pretor, hee began to conduct his arme into Turkane by the way of Apenninump.

THE XXII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the two and twentieth Booke.

Aniball came into Hetruria, after he had lost one of his eyes by occasion of continuall watching in the marshes, through which he marched some daies and three nights, without taking his repose and sleepe. C. Flaminius the Consul, a rash and inconsiderate man, went forth, contrary to the warrant and approbation of the Auspices, and caused the field-engines to be digged out of the ground, when otherwise they could not bee plucked up: and being mounted on horsebacke, fell with his head forward from his horse. His fortune was to bee surprised in an ambush by Aniball, which he had laid for him neere the Lake called T. Trasymenus: where he and his arme were defeated, and fell upon the edge of the sword. Sixe thousand Romans, who brake through and made an escape, notwithstanding the faithfull promise that M. abarball had made unto them, were by the falshood of Aniball put in prison. When upon the newes of this overthrow, there was great mourning and sorrow at Rome, there furnished two mothers to die for very joy, that beyond their hope and expectation, they recovered their sons, and saw them alive, whom they supposed to have been slaine in that field. In regard of the foreaid defeature, there was rained a sacred Spring, according to the booke of Sibylla. After this, when Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator sent against Aniball, would not come to a set battaile with him, for feare he should hazard in fight the souldiours lately terrified and daunted with aduise overthrowes, against an enemy lustie and proud of so many victories, and by making bread, and opposing himselfe onely against Aniball, impeached his attempts and enterprises: M. Minutius the Generall of his host, a man of a proud spirit and br-inefickie humour, with charging the Dictator, and accusing him unto the people for a feefull and cowardly person, prevailed so much, that by vertue of their power and authority, he was iointed in equal command and command with the Dictator. By means whereof, the arme and the forces were parted indifferently between them, and Minutius gave the enemy battaile in a place of great disadvantage, whereupon his Legions were distressed and in great hazard: but Fabius Maximus came in time to his rescue with his part of the arme, and saved him out of the present danger. By occasion of which good turne, he was overcome, and his stomacke came downe in so much, as he was content to ioin in the ampe with him, and saluted him by the name of Father: commanding all his own souldiours, to do the same to their fellow souldiours under Fabius Maximus. Aniball after hee had wasted and overrun Campaine, chaunced betwene the towne Casilinum, and the mountaine Calicula to be enclosed and compassed about by Fabius: but by a device of tying little bariins of drie stickes unto oxes bones, and setting them on fire, put to flight and chased away the guards of the Romans, which kept the heights of Calicula, and by that means gat through the passage of that forrest. There came Aniball, at what time as he made barocke and burned all the territorie about, forbare to touch the land of Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator, to the end, that he might bring him into suspicion of treason to the State. After this, when Emilius Paulus, and T. C. Varro were Consuls and Generals of the arme, there was a battell fought with Aniball, to their exceeding losse and utter overthrow, where unto a village called Cannae. At which field there were slaine of Romans, 45000, together with Paulus the Consul, and some fewe Senators, besides thirte other brave personages that had been Consuls.

A Consuls or Pretors, or at leastwise Ediles of State. After this defeature, when the Noble yong gentlemen of the citie (for very dispaire of the State) were in counsell to abandon Italie, P. Cornelius Scipio (a Colonel, who afterwards was surnamed Africanus) held his naked sword over their heads, as they sat in consultation, and swore a great oath, that he would repute him for a mortal enemy, that would not swear after him: and hereby effected thus much at their hands, that by vertue of an oath, they obliged themselves not to depart out of Italy and forsake their native countrie. This booke containeth besides, the feight and lamentation made within the citie, and the affaires and exploits atchieved in Spain, with more happie successe. Opimia and Terentia, two professed vestall virgins, were convicted of Incest, and condemned. By reason of the small number of souldiours and serviceable men for the warres, there were 8000 slaves put in armes. The Captives taken prisoners in the warres, when they might have bene redeemed, were not ransomed for all that. A solemne meeting there was for Varro his welcome home, with great thanksgiving, because he had not despaiied of the Commonweale.

NOW aproched the spring, when Hanniball removed out of his wintering holds, after he had assaied before to passe over the Apennine, but in vaine, by reason of the intollerable cold; where also he staid in great feare and danger of his owne person. By which time, the Gauls, who having risen up in armes on his side, for hope of spoile & pillage, seeing now in stead of harrying and carying away of booties out of other mens lands, that their owne countrie was become the place of the warre, troubled and molested as well with the one arme as the other which abode there all winter, turned their hatred and malice from the Romans backe againe upon Aniball: In such sort, as after he had bene sundrie times forelaid by the secret traines of their princes, and in danger to be mured, he escaped onely by the deceitfulness and falshood practised among their owne selves. For with what incononstancie & levitie they had conspired together, with the same they bewraied one another, and detected the conspiracie unto him. By means whereof, as also by changing one while his apparrell, another while the bonet and attire of his head, by errour also and mistaking, he avoided the perill, and saved himselfe. But so it was, that even this feare in which he stood, caused him to remove the sooner out of his wintering harbour.

About the same time Cn. Servilius entred into his Consulship at Rome, on the * 15 day of March. where, after he had propounded to the Senate concerning the affaires of the Commonweale, the hatred and malice which the LL. had conceived against C. Flaminius, was renewed afresh. For they said, that they created two Consuls, and had but one. For that lawfull government and authority which Flaminius should have had, that auspice of Magistracie which was meet and due, he ought to have caried with him from the citie, from the publike and private habitations, after he had celebrated the Latine holidays, and offered sacrifice upon the mountaine Albane, and made his solemne vowes accordingly, within the Capitoll. But since for default herein, he departed from the citie a private person, the Auspices of government could not follow and accompanie him: and being gone without them, he might not lawfully take the same anew in forren soile. Now there were sundrie straunge prodigious tokens besides, reported from many places at once, which much encreased their feare: namely, that in Sicily certaine souldiours javelins were on fire; and in Sardinia, a horsemans walking staffe, as he went the round, and visited the watch upon the wall, burned in his hand: That upon the strand and sea shore, there were seene many light fires, so as all the costes shone againe withall: That two shields sweet blood: That there were some souldiours smitten dead with lightnings: That the circle and bodie of the sunne appeared in sight lesse in compasse and eclipsed: Also, that there fell from the skie burning Prentles: And at Arpi there were seene in the Element, Palme or Date trees: and the sun fighting with the moone: Moreover, at Capena two moones arose & shewed in the day time: and that at Cere, the waters ran mingled with blood: That the verie fountaine of Hercules yeilded and cast up water bespotted with blood: That as folke reaped in Antium fields, certain bloodie ears of come light into their baskets: At Falerij the heaven seemed to cleave in sunder, and open, and to shew as it were a great chink; and out of the place where it gaped, there shone a great light: That the lots of their own selves diminished, and one fell out of the pitcher, with this inscription: Mars brandisheth and shaketh his speare. And about the same time at Rome the Statue of Mars sweet in the high way Appia, neere to the images of the wolves: and at Capua the welkin seemed to be on fire, and the forme of a moone to fall downe in a raie or shower. After this, men gave beleeve also to prodigies of farre lesse importance: namely, that some mens goates, in stead of haire bare, wooll: that a hen turned into a cocke, and a cocke proved to be a hen. These things, as folke reported, were were declared abroad, and the authors brought into the Senate: where the Consul propounded before the L. L. and required their advice, as touching matters of religion. Whereupon, there passed a decree that these strange tokens, some should be purged and expiated with greater sacrifices, other with young sucklings: and that for three daies there should be supplications at all the Shrines and Alters of the gods. As for other matters, after that the Decemvirs had looked into their bookes, such provision was to be made, as the gods in their verses should foretell to stand with their pleasure and contentment. So, by the advertisements and directions of the Decemvirs it was decreed as followeth: First and foremost, that to Jupiter there should be made of gold a thunderbolt or forme of lightning weighing * 50 pounds, and another of silver, presented unto Iuno and Minerva. Item to Iuno Regina there should be sacrifice offered in the mount Aventine, and to Iuno Hospita in Lanuvium, of greater beasts: Item that the dames of Rome, making a contribution (everie one to their abilitie) of a summe of money, should offer an Oblation unto Iuno Regina & bring it into Aventine, & there solemnise a Lectisternie: Item, that the verie Libertine or enfranchised women also, should according to their power, lay their money together and make a present for the goddesse Feronia. These things accomplished, the Decemvirs sacrificed in the market place of Ardea, & for that purpose killed greater beasts. Last of all, by direction out of the bookes of Sybill, now in the month December, they celebrated a sacrifice at Rome in the temple of Saturne: and commandment was given that a Lectisternie should be solemnized (which bed and table the Senators themselves spread and set out with all the furniture) & a publicke feast besides, in any hand: and throughout the citie both by day & night were proclaimed the solemn Saturnalia: and order directed, that the people should hold and observe that day, as holy and festival, for ever.

Whiles the Consull was busied at Rome in pacifying the gods, and levying soldiours, Anniball (who was departed from his wintering fort, because the rumor ran that Flaminius the Consull was come as farre as Arretium) albeit he saw another way more readie & commodious (though it were somewhat farther about) yet chose that which was the neerer, through the marshes, whereas the river Arnus at the same time had overflowed his banks more than usually. As for the Spaniards, Africans, and all his old beaten souldiours (the verie flower and strength of his armie) he commaunded to march foremost together with all their baggage and carriages among them, to this end, that if they were forced any where to stay, they should not faile and want necessities about them: the Gauls he appointed to follow next: and because he was desirous that those kind of people, should be in the middle ward, and the horsemen likewise to go after them hindmost in the rereguard, he charged Mago with the lighthorsemen of the Numidians, to guard the armie & keepe them close together in their march, but especially to have an eye to the Gauls, and keepe them in, for feare least they for tediousnesse of travaile, and wearinesse of long way (as they are a nation tender enough and not able to abide any hardnesse) should either flinke away, or else stand still. They of the vanguard, what way soever the guides led them and went afore, passed through thicke and thinne, waded through great rivers and deepe quicksands; and albeit they were mired and in manner overwhelmed and swayed up of bogs and muddie quavemires, yet they followed still their colours. But the Gauls, if their feet chanced to slip, could not hold themselves, and when they were downe, they were not able to arise out of the durtie sloughes & holes: neither could any of them comfort his corps with courage, nor his heart with hope of better. Some of them hardly haled their heave hammes, and drew with much ado their lazie legs and lagging limmes after them: others, whose hearts were wearied with tedious toile and travaile, when they were once downe, lay dying amongst the jades and other beasts, which also were couched along every where. But that which hurt and undid them most, was their want of sleepe, for they had watched foure daies and three nights continually without a winke. Now when as the water had so covered and overspread every place, that they could find no drie ground, to lay their wearied bodies on, they were faine to pile their packs one upon another in the waters, and to cast themselves aloft upon them. All the way as they went, they might see the garons and horses lie everie where on heapes overthrowne and dead: which served them a while, in steed of couches for want of other meanes, who sought but onely for some thing of other, that appeared above water to repose themselves upon, for to take a nap. As for Anniball himselfe, (who had already an infirmie in his eies, which came first by the distemperature of the spring season, now hot and then cold) he was mounted upon an Elephant, the onely Elephant

A that left alive: this beast bare him a good way above the water: but by reason that he had overwatched himselfe, and the moist nights besides together with the dampe and mist of the foggie fens stuffed his head and filled him full of thewmes, and because neither time nor place served for any cure and to take physicke, he lost one of his eyes quite.

Thus after many a man lost, many a horse piteously perished: when he was gotten out at length of these foule fennes & miry marshes, in the first dry ground that he came unto, he pitched his camp: and was certified by his espials & vauntcouriers, whom he had sent out before, that the Roman armie lay about the walls of Arretium. Then with great diligence and careful enquire he endeavoured, to find the intent and designs of the Consull, to know the costes and size of the countrey, to hearken what waies he travailed; to learne what forces he had; to be advertised how he was stored and provided of victuals; and to understand all other things expedient for his purpose in such a case, and necessary to be knowne. The countrey was most fertile and fruitful, as any one in all Italy, to wit, the goodly champion fields of Tuscanie, lying betwene Fesulae, & Arretium, plentiful in corne, abundant in cattails, & richly stored with all good things. The Consull was stout and proud; by reason of the former Consulship that he had borne: little account he made of the majestie of lawes, and authoritie of Senators, and as small regard and reverence he had of the gods themselves: which rashnesse, as it cost him nought, but was ingrafted in him by nature, so fortune had nourished and maintained the same with prosperous successe in his affaires at home, and warres abroad; so as it appeared evidently, that since he respected neither God nor man, and deigned not to take their counsell and advise, he would go rashly to worke, and do all in his hand over head, without discretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himselfe headlong into these his infirmities and imperfections, Anniball devised to anger him, and to move his patience. Leaving the chemie therefore on his left hand, he put himselfe into the way to Fesulae: for to wast and spoyle the countrey of Tuscanie; and shewed to the Consull a farre off, what foule worke and havock he possible could make, with fire and sword. Then Flaminius who of himselfe would not have rested and sat still, in case Anniball had bene quiet; seeing once the goods of his allies and friends, harried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his shame and dishonor, that a Carthaginian should march thus at his pleasure, through the mids of Italie, & without any empeaching & controulement, to passe on forward, even to besiege and assault the walls of Rome; when all others about him sitting in counsaile, gave advice for profit and safetie, rather than for shew and bravery; namely to pause awhile, and expect the coming of his Colleague, that they might with ioynt armies, with one heart, and with common accord of counsell, conduct and mannage the warre: and in the meane time, with the Cavallerie, with Auxiliarie or aid souldiers lightly armed, repress the enemy, and stay him from spoiling so licentiously at his pleasure, in a great chase and choler he rose up, and departed out of the counsell, and presently sounded the march, and gave the signall of battaile: and withall, Nay we were best (quoth he) to remaine and sit here still before the walls of Arretium: for this, belike, is our native countrey, and here is our place of habitation: as for Anniball, let him escape forth of our hands, and wast all Italy; let him spoyle afore him; and overrun all with fire and sword, untill he be as farre as Rome walls: and let not us, in any case once stirre from hence, before that the Senators send for C. Flaminius from Arretium, as sometimes they called Camillus from Veij. With these and such like reprochfull and taunting words, he commaunded in all hast the standards and ensignes to be plucked up, and called for his horse. He was not so soone mounted on his back, but the horse fell presently, cast the rider over and over with his head forward; and there lay Flaminius the Consull under foote. As they all that attended about him, were affrighted and troubled in mind, at this unluckie prelage and foretoken, in the very beginning of his enterprise; word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the port-ensignes was not able to pull up his ensigne, do what he could; and putting his whole strength unto it. The Consull turning to the messenger, What hast thou any letters besides (quoth he) from the Senat, to prohibit me from geving battaile? go thy wayes, & bid them dig up the ensigne, with help of spade & mattock, if their hands be so benumbed for feare, that they can not pluck it up: and with that began the armie to march. The principall leaders and captaines, besides that they agreed not, but gainesaid this course, were much dismayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious signe: but the common souldiers rejoiced and tooke great pleasure, to see this forwardnesse and animositie of their Generall: having an eye rather to the end of their hope;

than to the cause which they had to hope so. Now Annibal waited in all manner of hostility that he could devise, the territories betwene the towne Cortona, and the lake Thrasymenus, and all to what the edge of the Consuls stomacke, to chafe his hote blood, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harmes and wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And some alreadie they were to certaine places, naturally made as it were for an ambush, whereas the lake Thrasymenus lyeth hard at the foote of the hills of Cortona: for there is betwene, but a very straight and narrow passage, as if there had bene left so much space of ground, only for that purpose, and nothing else. For if a man go but a little further, the plaine lieth more open, and groweth larger, and from thence the hills begin to arise aloft. Annibal in the open ground pitched his campe, for himselfe with his Africanes onely and the Spaniards to lodge in, and make abode. The Balearians, and the other light armed souldiers, he led about behinde the mountaines: the horsemen he placed at the very gullet of the straight passage, where the little hills hand somely covered and hid them close; to the end that so soone as the Romanes were entered in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the straight, all might be enclosed within the lake and the mountaines. Flaminius being come to the lake the day before at the sunne setting, the morrow after, before it was full day light, without discovering and cleering the coasts by any skourts and espials sent out before, passed through the streights. After that his armie began to be spread and displayed more at large, as the plaine opened wider, he espied and perceived those enemies only which he had before his face: for the ambushes lay close hidden, both behind his back, and over his head. Annibal having once gotten the enemies (as he would) enclosed thus within the lake and the mountaines, and environed with his forces, gave the signall to them all for to charge: who came downe every man the neere way he could: and so much the more were the Romanes affrighted and troubled with this sodaine occurrent, by reason that the mist which arose out of the lake, was setled thicker in the plaine, than upon the hills: whereby the companies and squadrons of their enemies comming out of many vallies, were seene well enough one of another, and therefore more jointly gave the charge all at once together. The Romanes hearing the cry and shout which arose from all parts, before they could well discern and see, perceived themselves compassed all about and surprised, and were assailed both afront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themselves in battaile ray, as they ought, make their armour and weapons readie, and draw their swords. When all the rest were thus amazed, and at their wits end, the Consul alone, for all this imminent danger, shewed himselfe nothing daunted or afraid, but fer in order the ranks and files which were shuffled and blended together, according as time and place would give him leave; and marshalled his soldiers, who turned every way as they heard the sundry and divers noyses, and in the best manner he could devise, he comforted and encouraged them, willing them to stand to it, and fight like men, for that there was now no meanes else to escape. All the vowes and invocations upon the gods for their help, would not serve, but only it was fine force and meere manhood must do the deede: and they were to make way by dint of sword, through the midst of their enemies battailons: and the less men feared, the less danger commonly beideth them. Howbeit, by reason of the noyse and hubbub, neither counsell nor commaund could be heard: and so farre off were the souldiers from knowing their owne ensignes, their ranks and places, that scarcely their heart would serve them to take armes, and to buckle them, as they should, fitly for fight in such sort, as some of them were surprized and borne downe, laden rather with their harness, then covered and defended therewith. And in so great a mist and darkenesse, more use they had of eares than eyes; for at the grones of their wounded fellows, at the blowes and strokes upon the bodies and armour resounding againe, at the confused shoutes and shrieks of hardie and fearefull men one with another, they turned their faces, & cast their eyes every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the prease of those that were fighting, & there were set fast: some againe as they returned for to fight, were borne backward by companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had assayed in vaine every way to get forth, and saw well, that on both sides and flanks the mountaines and the lake, that afront and behind, the enemies battailons hemmed them in; then they knew evidently, there was no hope of life but in their right hand and force of armes. Then every man became a capitaine, and encouraged himselfe to fight manfully: so as the battaile began afresh, not in order by the Principes, Hastati, and Triarii, nor according to the accustomed manner, whereby the avantgard should fight before the maine battaile and the standers, and behind them the reregard,

The Battaille
at Thrasymenus.

A reregard, and that the souldiour should keepe his owne legion, his owne cohort, band, and company; but at a venture, even as it happened, so they went to it and buckled, pell mell: and as everie mans heart served him, so hee marshalled himselfe to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animositie was so ardent, their spirits and minds so intentive to the medley, that being as there was, a terrible earthquake at that verie instant, which overthrew and turned upside down, a great part of many cities in Italie, turned aside the courses of great rivers out of their channels, & drave their streams against the current, forced the sea into fresh rivers, yea, and overturned mountains with mightie falls, and laid them flat: yet there was not a man who fought in that battaile, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict lasted almost three houres. Sharpe it was in every place, but about the Consul most cruell: and looke in what part forever hee saw B his men distressed and in hazard, there courageously hee aided them. By reason that the flower and bravest gallants followed him, and was himselfe for his owne person goodly beset in his rich armour, he both assailed the enemy most furiously, and also defended his owne citizens as valiantly, so long, untill a certaine Insurbrian, a man of armes (Ducarius was his name) one that knew his visage well ynough, This is (quoth he to his countrymen) the Consul that defeated our armie, put to the sword our Legions, wasted our territories, and hee that destroyed and sacked our cite. Now will I offer him as a sacrifice out of hand to the ghosts and spirits of those our fellow citizens, who by his meanes have been piteously slaine: and therewith setting spurs to his horse, hee rode through the thickest troupe and prease of his enemies: and when hee had first slaine his Esquier outright (who opposed his bodie betwene, and set himselfe against him, seeing him comming so furiously) hee ran the Consul quite through the bodie with his lance. C And when he would rather than his life have disarmed and risted him, the Triarii stept with their targuets over his corpes, and so kept him off. Hereupon from hence first many began to flie; but anone, neither deepe lake nor high mountaine, could impeach and stop their fearefull flight: like blind men they ran and sought meanes to make escapes, were the lane never so narrow, were the hills never so steepe and craggie, horse and man, man and armour, fell headlong one upon another. A number of them seeing no way els to escape, entred into the Lake by the first edges and shallow brimmes thereof, waded so farre, and went up so high, that they left their heades and shoulders onely above the water. Some there were, who unadvisedly (such was their feare) sought to save themselves by swimming. Which being an endlesse peece of worke, D and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them, they were either stifled and swallowed up of the goulfes, or after that with too much hast, they had over-laboured and toiled out themselves, they did what they could to swimme backe againe, and with much ado to recover the land: and there, by the enemies horsemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in peeces. Sixe thousand or thereabout, of the vaward, who lustily brake through the mids, maugre the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, escaped safe out of the gullet: and having seized the top of a little hill, there they stood, and might heare onely the outcries of men, the rattling & rustling sound of their armor, but how the batell went or sped, neither could they know, nor yet discern for the thicknesse of the darke mist. But now, when they were come to some ods, and one side went down and had the worse, by which time the heat of the sunne had broken and dispatched the mist, and the bright day appeared; then through the clear light, the hills and dales shewed evidently the havock and overthrow that was made, and how the Romane armie was foully discomfited and defeated. For feare therefore, that the enemy (having descried and seene them a farre off) should send out against them the Cavallerie, up they went with their ensignes in all hast, and got them away with all speed possible they could. The morrow after, when over and besides all other calamities, they were in daunger of extreame famine, and that Maharball (who with all his power of horse pursued them by night, and overtook them) had given his faithfull word and promise, that if they delivered up their armour, he would suffer them to depart in their single garments, they yielded themselves. Which promise Annibal sawe performed as truly, as all Carthaginians use to doe, and false Carthaginian as F he was, he clapt them all into prison, and hung yrons upon them. This is that noble and famous battell fought at the Lake Thrasymenus, and of those few overthrowes that the Romanes had, the most memorable of all others. 15000 Romanes were there slaine in fight: 10000 were scattered: and flying through sundrie parts of Tuscane, gat to Rome. 1500 of the enemies lost their lives in the field. But many more of both sides afterwards died of their wounds. Others there be that that report much murder and carnage on both sides. For mine owne part (besides that, I love not to write vaine untruths, nor any thing without good warrant, and yet the humour of writers for the most part is too much given that way) I have followed for mine authour Fabius especially, who lived about the time of this warre. Anniball having enlarged without raunsome as many of his prisoners as were Latines, and put the Romanes in streight ward, culled out from among the heapes of his enemies that lay one upon another, the dead bodies of his own men, & commanded they should be buried: & having with great care and diligence made search also, for the dead corps of Flaminius to interre it, he could never find it.

At the first newes in Rome of this overthrow, the people ran together in exceeding fear and trouble, into the common place of Assemblies. The wives and Dames of the citie, went up and downe to and fro in the streets, and enquired of whomsoever they met, what suddaine calamitie this was, whereof the bruit went; and what was become of the armie: And when as the multitude assembled thicke (as it were) to a publicke audience, turning to the Comitium & the Senat house, and called upon the Magistrats: at length somewhat before the sun-set, Marcus Pomponius the Pretor came forth and said, A great battell hath ben fought, & we have lost the field. And albeit they heard of him no more than this of certaintie, yet they filled one anothers ears with rumors, and caried home with them these newes, to wit, that the Consull was killed, and a great part of his armie with him slaine: that there were but a few left alive, and those either fled and scattered up and downe in Tuscane, or else taken prisoners by the enemy. And looke how many casualties and misfortunes follow the overthrow of an armie, into so many cares and perplexities were the spirits & minds of all those plunged, who had any kinsfolke that served under Flaminius the Consull, all the whiles they were ignorant, what was the fortune of their friends. And no man knew for certaine, what he was to hope for, or to feare. The morrow and certaine daies following, there stood at the gates a sort of people, and those were women more than men, waiting to see their friends themselves, or those that could tell tidings of them: and ever as they met with any, they would flocke about them, and bee very inquisitive: neither could they bee plucked away from them of their acquaintance and knowledge, before they had questioned every particular circumstance, from point to point in order. There might a man have seene an alphabet of faces, in those that departed from the messengers, according as the tidings was joyfull or wofull: there might a man have seene a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houses, either rejoicing for their good hap, or comforting them for their misfortune and calamitie. The women especially, as well in joy, as also in sorrow, were in their extremities. One above the rest (as it is reported) standing at the gate, upon the suddain sight of her sonne alive and safe, fell downe dead at his very feete. Another, who had received an untrue report of her sonnes death, as shee sat mourning at home within her house in great sorrow of hart, so soon as ever shee saw him coming into the house, for exceeding joy yeilded her last breath, & died. And for certaine daies the Pretors kept the Senators together in counsel from the sun rising to the setting, consulting under whose conduct, & with what forces they might be able to withstand the puissance of these victorious Carthaginians. But before they wer thoroughly resolved of any determinat purpose & course to be taken, suddainly there arrived other newes of a second losse, namely, that 4000 horsemen under the leading of C. Centronius the Propretor, sent from C. Servilius the Consull, unto his Colleague, were inclosed by Anniball in Vmbria. For thither they had taken their way, upon the newes they heard of the battaile at Thrasymenus. The brute and rumor hereof hammered diversly in mens heads. Some, whose minds were possessed already with greefe of a greater calamitie, thought the losse of that Cavallerie but small, in comparison of the former defeature. Others esteemed that which happened, not according to the importance of the thing it selfe: but like as it falleth out in the naturall bodie of man, that if it be crasse and weake, every occasion, be it never so small and light, is more offensive unto it and sooner felt, than a greater cause and object in a sound, and strong constitution: even so, when any crosse or adversitie happeneth unto the politicke bodie of a citie or C.V. diseased (as it were) and sickly, wee are not to measure and weigh the same by the greatnesse of the accidents, but according to the feeble and decayed estate thereof; able to endure and abide no new matter, that may surcharge and greive it, whatsoever. And therefore, the citie of Rome toke her selfe to the soveraigne salve and approved remedie, which shee had long desired, and yet not applied and used of late, namely, to the nomination of a Dictator. And because the Consull himselfe was absent, by whom alone it was thought hee might be named; and

A by reason that hee was so overspread and forsaid with the Panicke forces, there might no count be well dispatched, nor letters safely sent unto him: and for that the people had not authority of themselves to create a Dictator, they therefore elected a Pro-dictator (a thing that was never seene and practised before that day) namely, Q. Fabius Maximus, and for his Generall of the Cavallerie, M. Cincinatus. These had commission from the Senate, to fortifie the wals and towers of the citie, to plant and bestow guards thereon, where they thought meet, and to cut up and breake downe the bridges upon the great rivers, shewing hereby, that first of they were not able to keepe and defend Italie, they were now to fight for house and home, and to guard the very citie.

B Anniball in this meanetime was come directly by the way of Vmbria, as farre as to Spole- tum. And after he had grievously wasted and spoiled the territories, he assaied to give assault to that citie, but then hee had the repulse with the losse of many of his men. And getting by the strength of that one Colonus (where hee stood but badly in the attempt of it) how great and difficult the enterprise might be of assailing the citie of Rome, he turned another way into the Picene countie, not only abounding in plenty of all kind of corne and graine, but also affording rich spoile and pillage: which the hungrie and needie soldiours desired and caried away as greedily, beyond all measure. And therefore certaine daies he kept a standing campe, and refreshed his soldiours, toiled as well with winter journeyes and beggie waies, as also in the late battell, which was more joious and fortunarie in the looke and parting, than fight and easie in the conflict and fighting. After he had rested and refreshed his soldiours sufficiently, who tooke C more pleasure in booties and reises, than in wars and perils, hee dislodged, and journeyed forward, wasting and spoiling first the Pretorian and Adrian territories, and then the Martian, Marmicines and Delignians: and all about Arpi and Luceria, being a region next adjoining unto Apulia. C. Servilius the other Consull, having had some light skirmishes with the Gauls, and won from them one meane towne of small importancie, after he was advertised once of the death of his Colleague, and the defeature of the armie, fearing even then what danger might befall him, hee departed from the messengers, according as the tidings was joyfull or wofull: there might a man have seene a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houses, either rejoicing for their good hap, or comforting them for their misfortune and calamitie. The women especially, as well in joy, as also in sorrow, were in their extremities. se of 33333 asses, & one third part of an Ass: besides the sacrifice of 300 oxen to Jupiter, and of white oxen and other sacrifices, unto many other faines. After these vows pronounced and made accordingly, the supplication was proclaimed and in procession there went with their wives and children, not onely the multitude of the cittie, but also of the countie, so many as had their private estate, any way depending upon the publicke. The Lectisternie likewise was prepared and trimmed, and continued for three daies: and the Decemvirs daunted for holy ceremonies had the ordering thereof. The sacred beds were openly to be seene, one for Jupiter and Iuno, another for Neptune and Minerva: a third for Mars and Venus: a fourth for Apollo and Diana: a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta: and a sixth for Mercury and Ceres. Then were the temples vowed: unto Jenus Erycina, Q. Fabius Max. the Dictator, vowed one temple. For so it was delivered from out of the bookes of destinies, that he should vow it, who had the sovereign rule in the cittie, and unto *Mens, Atilius the Pretor vowed another. Thus when Church matters touching religion were finished, the Dictator propounded concerning war and the State: namely, with what Legions & how many, the Senat thought good to withstand the victorious enemy. And a decree passed, that he should receive the armie at the hands of C. Servilius the Col. & enroll besides of the ci-zens and allies, as many horsemen and footmen, as he thought convenient: and that hee should do and order all other things at his owne discretion, for the good of the Commonweale: Fabius said, That he would adjoine unto the armie of Servilius, two Legions more: which being levied by the Generall of the horsemen, he proclaimed, that they should meet together upon a certain day at Tybur: and when he had published a proclamation, That whosoever inhabited within any townes or castles unsifted, should depart into places of safety: and that all should remove out of the villages of that countie, through which Annibal was to go (but first to set on fire their houses, and spoile their corn, that hee might find nothing there when he came) he went himselfe forward by the high way or causey Flaminius, to meete with the Consull and the armie. And when hee discovered them, marching about Oriculum, by the river Tyberis: and saw the Consull with his horsemen coming forward to him, he sent a Sergeant, to give warning to the Consull, for to come without his Lictors to the Dictator: who obeyed his commandement.
And as their meeting together represented an exceeding great shew of the Dictatorship unto citizens and allies both, who by reason of discominunce so long time, had welcomere foretold that government: behold, there came letters from the cittie importing newes, that certaine ships of burden, transporting victuals from Hostia into Spaine for the armie there, were by the navie of the Carthaginians boarded and taken about the sound or haven of Cosat: VVhereupon immediatly the Consull was commanded to go to Hostia, to take up all shipping at Rome or at Hostia, to furnish them with saylers, and man them with souldiers, and so to pursue the Armado

- A of the enemies, and to keepe the coasts of Italie. A migraie number of men was levied at Rome.
The Libertines also, who had children, and were of lawfull age to serve, swore allegiance unto him, to be his true souldiers. Out of this armie of citizens, as many as were under 35. yeares of age, were shipped: the rest were left behind to guard the cittie. The Dictator, having received the Consuls armie at the hands of Fuluius Flaccus his Lieutenant, went through the Sabines countie, and arrived at Tybur, whether he had commanded the new souldiers to repaire at a day. From thence by crosse wayes he returned into the high way, on causey Flaminius, even to Prenestes: from whence (having searched diligently by his spies, all the wayes) he led forward toward the enemy, purposing in no place to hazard the fortune of battaile, but upon necessity.
The very first day that he encamped not far from Arpi, within the sight of his enemies, there was no ho with Anniball: but without further delay, he came forth into the field in battaile array, bad him battaile, and offered fight. But seeing his enemies quiet, and no stirring in the camp, he fell to taunting and reviling them, saying, That now at length yet, the martiall honours of the Ro-manes were daunted and rained; and seeing they refused fight, they confessed plainly, and granted themselves inferior unto him in valor, prowesse, and glorie: which said, he retired into his campe. Howbeit, chafing and fretting secretly in his mind, for anger that he had to deale hereafter with a Captaine, far unlike to Flaminius and Sempromius: and that the Romanes now at last, being schooled and taught by their owne harnes, and to their great cost, had fought out and gotten a Captaine to match Anniball, straightwayes he began to feare the wisdom of the Dictator, and not his force: but having had as yet no triall of his constant resolution, he fell C to disquiet his mind, and to tempt him with often removing his own tents, and wasting the fields of his allies even under his nose: one while he seemed to march away apace out of all sight, another while he would of a sodaine stay, and lye close in some by-place and cranke, out of the way, to spy when he could take him in some plaine and even ground. But Fabius led his armie, and marched above on the higher grounds, a pretie distance off from the enemy, so as neither he would let him go cleane and abandon him, nor yet encounter with him. He kept his souldiers for the most part within the campe, save onely when necessity otherwise constrained. For purveyance of forage and fewell, they went: neither few in number, nor straggling asunder. The wards of horsemen and those that were lightly armed, standing alwayes in order of battaile, and readie prepared and furnished for sodaine impressions and tumults, yielded both securitie to his owne souldiers, and also danger to his enemies, as they raigned all abroad and foraid the D countie. In this manner never was the maine chance put to the venture all at once of fortune: and the small trials of light skuffing and skirmishes (begun in safetie and securitie, by reason of the recourse of reskue so neere) inured and hardened the souldiers, frighted with former foiles, and made them at length to distrust lesse either their owne valour, or fortune. But Anniball was not more discontented and displeased, nor more readie to crosse and thwart these so holsome policies and counsels of his, as his owne Generall of horsemen: who wanted nothing else but soveraigne command, to overturne headlong the Commonweale: a man in all his designements violent & hasty, and of tongue intemperate. And first secretly among few, but afterwards openly in the hearing of all men, he termed Fabius, in stead of a stayed & sober man, slow and dull: in stead of wary and heedfull, timorous and fearefull: attributing unto vertues, the names of vices of neere semblance: and having a singular dexteritie to debase his betters and superiours, exalted himselfe thereby: a cunning cast, of all others the worst, and yet hath mightily prevailed and sped too well in many that have used it. Anniball from Arpi passeth into Sannium, wasteth the countie of Beneventum, winneth the cittie Telesia, and still provoketh (of set purpose) the Romane captaine, if happily he could incense him by so many indignities and losses of his allies, and so draw him to fight on even hand, and so to pursue the Armado Amongst a great number of Italian confederates and allies, whom Anniball had taken prisoners at Thrasymenus and dismissed, there were three Campanian horsemen, whom Anniball even then had tolled on, and allured with gifts and faire promises to win unto him the hearts of their countrimen: These brought word unto him, that in case he would leade and bring his armie into Campania, he should soone be Lord of Capua. And albeit the thing in itselfe seemed greater than the qualitie of the persons that counselled him thereto: and therefore stood in mammering, one while in good hope and assurance, another while in feare and distrust: yet they perswaded him at last to remove out of Sannium into Campania. After he had admonished them effoones, to see that they made their word and promises good by deede; and commaunded them withall to returne unto him with some of their principall citizens and countreymen, he sent them away. Himselfe gave commaundement to his guide, to conduct him into the territorie of * Casinum: being advised by those that were skillfull and acquainted with the coasts of those parts, that if he could gaine a fotehand that pale and forest, he might exclude the Ro-manes from coming to rescue and succour their confederates. But the ambiguitie of the name, and the Carthaginian language far differing from the Latine, caused the guide to mistake Casilinum for Casinum: and so missing of his intended journey, he came downe, through the Alifane, Calatine, and Calene countries, into the plaine champaign region of Stella. Where seeing all the coasts environed round about with mountaines and rivers, he called the guide unto him, and demanded where he was: and when he answered, that he should that day lodge in Casilinum, then and not before, the error was found, and he knew that he was far out of his way, for that Casinum was distant in another countrey far off. And after he had beaten the guide with rods, and hanged him up by the head, for an example to terrifie all others, he fortified himselfe within campe, and sent out Maharball with the horsemen into the Falerne countrie, to fetch in booties. So they wasted and spoyled as farre as the waters of Sinuessæ. Much harme did these Numidians, but the flight & fright of the people was far greater. And yet notwithstanding that great feare, when all was on a light fire as it were, and nothing but warre, the Romane allies continued still firme in their faithful allegiance: & the reason was, because they were ruled under a just and moderate government, and neither refused, nor thought much to be subject unto their bet-ters, the only bond of loyall fidelitie. But so soone as he had pitched his camp by the river * Vul- turnus, and that the most goodly and pleasant countrie of all Italie was on fire, and the villages avery where burned and smoked againe; whiles Fabius led his powre over the ridge of the mountaine Massicus, the sedition was like to have broken out againe, and certain captaines of the mutinie began to be enkindled afresh. For there had ben great quietnesse, & all was still for some few dayes; because seeing the armie march faster than their usuall manner was; they supposed verily, that they made more speede and hastened, to save Campania from being spoyled and wasted. But when they were come to the formost edge and point of the mountaine Massicus, and that the enemies were within sight, burning the dwelling houses of the Coloners and inhabitants of Sinuessæ, and likewise of the Falerne countrie, and all this while not one word of battaile;

And are we come hither in deede, quoth Mininius, to behold only and to see, and feede our eyes can we for shame abide to see the caltivity of these citizens here, whome our forefathers planted in Sinuessæ as coloners there to inhabite, to the end that all this tract & coast should be safe from the invasion of the Samnites? But behold, it is not a neighbour enemy (the Samnite) that fireth us, but a foreine and alien, even the Carthaginian, who from the farthest & most remote parts of the world, (whiles we stand at a bay, trifle off still, and for lazinesse doe nothing) is come forward even hither unto us. And are we so farre degenerate (with sorrow of heart I speake it) from our pro-genitours and fathers, that along which coast they thought it dishonorable unto their empire, for the Carthaginian Armadoes and ships to fote, saile, and ride; wee should see the same now pestered full of enemies, the Numidians and Moores? Wee, who ere while taking foule some and great disdeine to see Saguntum besieged, called not only upon men, but also upon the faith of alliances and the gods to witnesse; stand still gazing upon Anniball marching against the walls of a Romane Colonie, and readie to assault it. The smoke of the villages and the fields now on fire, is readie to put out our eyes, and to choke us up: our eares resound and ring againe with the piteous cries of our allies that weepe & lament, and call oftner unto us than unto the gods for help. And we here leade our armie as if they were a flock of sheepe, over the sta-dow forests, and hills out of the way, hidden among the clouds and thick woods to keepe them from the heate of sunne. If Furius Camillus had bene of mind, by raunging and wandering over hills and forests in this manner, to win againe the citie out of the hands of the Gaules; as this our new Camillus forsooth (sought out of purpose to be our only Dictator in this our distresse & hard estate) goeth about to recover Italie from Anniball, Rome had bene French at this day; which I feare me, if we go thus coldly to worke, our auncestors have saved & reserved so often, for Anniball and the Carthaginians. But he, a brave man, and a Romane in deede, that very day when word was brought to Veij, that he was chosen Dictator by the suffrages of the people, and approbation

A tion of the Senators, although Ianiculum was high ynough, where he might have set him downe and beheld the enemy at ease, descended into the plaine & even ground, and the same day in the very mids and heart of the citie, where now Gaulebury or Busta Gallica standeth; and the morrow after, betwene Rome and Gabes, slew the Legions of the Gaules. And what should I say of that, which happened many yeares after, when at the streights of Caudium wee were put under the yoke by the Samnites our enemies? Whither I pray you, did L. Papyrius Cursor seeke out the mountaines of Samnium, or rather lie hard upon Luceria and besiege it, provoking and challenging the victorious enemy; and thereby shooke off the yoke from the Romanes necke, and laid it upon the prowd Samnites? And what other thing else of late daies but expedition, gave the victorie to Consul Laelius? Who the morrow after that he discovered the enemy, set upon his fleet heavie fraught with victuals: and overcharged as it was with her owne munition, furniture and provision, suncke, and destroyed the same. It is meeke follie to beleve and thinke, by sitting still, by bare praiers and vowes, to vanquish and subdue the enemy. Our forces must bee put into armes, and brought downe into the plaine, that man to man may cope and buckle together. By adventuring boldly, by action and execution, hath the Romane Empire growne to this height; and not by these conceits and devises, which fearefull cowards tearme the warie policies of warre. As Minutius spake these words in preaching wise, a number of Romane Colonies and horsemen came flocking about him. Yea, and these lustie and rash speeches of his, came even unto the eares of the footmen: So as, if it had lien in the voices and election of the soldiours, out of all question they seemed willing to prefer Minutius before their Generall Fabius. But Fabius again, regarding alwaies with good eye his owne men, no lesse than his enemies, carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever before of any other; albeit he was well ware, that not onely within his own campe, but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing & slow proceedings: yet drew he out the rest of the summer, and held on stiffely the same course and purpose, and never altered his former manner: untill that Anniball being cleane disappointed of long desired battaile, bethought himselfe anone, and looked about for some places of winter abode, considering, That the countrie where now he was, rather yeilded plentie for the present, than store for long continuance: as standing upon Hortyards and Vineyards, and all things planted, rather for fruits of pleasure & delight, than for necessitie & profit. Intelligence hereof being given to Fabius, by his espials, for that he knew well ynough, that Anniball was to returne through the same streights, by which hee had entered the Falerne countrey; hee holdeth and keepeth the hill Calicula, with sufficient garrisons, and likewise Casilinum, a citie divided by the river Vulturnus, & parteth the Falerne and Campane countries asunder. Himselfe bringeth backe his power through the same hills, having sent out to escout and espie 400 horsemen of confederats, under the conduct of L. M.
Hostilius Mancinus, who being one of the crue of those lustie youths, that oftentimes heard the Generall of the horsemen, giving out abroad brave words and stout speeches, at first went forward in manner of an espial, to discover and espie the enemy from a place of safetie & securitie: and when as he saw the Numidians raunging all about the villages, and slew some of them also whom he took at a vantage, streightwaies his mind was wholly possessed and set upon fight; and so for-gat the charge and direction of the Dictatour, who had commaunded him to goe forward as warily and as closely as hee possible could, and to retire himselfe againe before hee came within fight of the enemies. The Numidians charging and recharging him afront one while, and flying from him another while, drew him almost unto their very campe, when as both horse and man were outwearied. From whence Carido, who then had the conduct and command of the Ca-vallerie, set out against him lustily upon the spur, and before they came within dart-shot, put the enemies to flight, and followed them continually in chase almost five miles. Mancinus seeing neither the enemy to give over pursute, nor any hope to escape away, exhorted his men, and turned head upon them, overmatched as he was every way: where hee himselfe and his choi-sest horsemen were beset round and slaine: the other taking themselves againe to flie for life, first came to Cales, and after through by-lanes and difficult waies, to the Dictatour. That day, as hap was, Minutius had joined himselfe to Fabius, having bene afore sent to keepe with a strong guard, the Forrest or pale, which above Tarracina, groweth into a narrow gullet, and reacheth to the sea for feare least if the avenue of the way Appia, were without defence, Anniball might enter and invade the countrie of Rome. When the Dictatour and the Generall of horsemen had joined their forces together, they encamped upon the very high way, that Anniball was to passe with his armie. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrow after, the Carthaginians tooke up with their armie all the way betwene the one campe and the other. When as the Romanes were quartered even under their very trench and rampier, in a place no doubt of great advantage, yet for all that approached Anniball with his light horsemen: and to provoke his enemies, fought by starts and fits, charging upon them, and retreating back againe with great nimbleness. The Romanes kept still their standing, embattailed as they were. The fight was cold and lingering, to the mind and liking of the Dictatour, rather than of Anniball: and where there were of the Romanes part 200 flaine, there dyed 800 of the enemies. Then seemed Anniball after, to be enclosed and shut up as it were & besieged within * Castrum, seeing that Capua, Samnium, and many rich and mightie nations confederate with the Romanes, were on their backs to furnish them with store of victuals. And Anniball contrariwise was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags & rocks of Formij, amid the sands of Linternum, & the mossy standing pooles. Well wist Anniball now that he was layd unto hardly, by the same cunning sleights, that he had used himself. And therefore when as he could not escape away by Castrum, and seeing that he must needs to the mountains, & passe over the top of Callicula: for feare lest that the Romanes should set upon his armie enclosed in the vallies betwene the mountaines, he devised a stratageme, by way of a ridiculous illusion, to beguile the eyesight of his enemies, & to frustrate and deceive them of their expectation: by meanes wherof, he purposed in the beginning of the night, closely and by stealth to gaine the mountaines. The manner of this craftie devise was this. He caused to be gathered out of all the villages thereby many firebrands; then tooke he certaine bayns or small fagots of brush-wood, dry sticks, and such like trash, and tyed them fast to the homes of the oxen, wherof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drave before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the cuntry: so as he might make welcomere two thousand head. To Asdruball he gave in charge, that so soone as it grew to be darkenight, he should drive those oxen with their homes set a fire toward the mountaines, and especially if he possible could, to the very streights and gullet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be darke, but Anniball with great silence dislodged and removed his campe, and the oxen aforesaid were driven a good way before the ensignes and the armie. When they were come to the foote of the mountaines, and to the streight passages, immediately the signall or watchword was given to fire the oxes homes, and to chase them up against the hill. The beasts, what with feare to see a light fire blazing over their heads, and what with paine to feele the heate now come to the quick flesh and the rootes of their homes, fell running up and downe, as if they had bene mad. By this their gadding thus all at once every way, all the coppises and springs thereabout were set on a light fire, and seemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withall: the shaking of their heads also too and fro without stay, made the blaze greater, and gave shew and semblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and set to keepe the passages of the streights, so soone as they saw certaine fires upon the tops of the hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be entrapped and enclosed with fire on every side, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer: and whereas the flambe shone most out, thinking that to be the safest way, they sped them thither, even to the top and ridge of the mountaines. Then and there, they light upon certaine of the oxen wandring astray from their companie, and at first seeing them a farr off, but not well discerning them, they imagined that they spit fire, and breathed these blazing flames out of their mouths; and wondering at the strange sight, stood still amazed and astounded. But when as afterwards they discovered the devise, and found it out to be a subtil and deceitfull invention, proceeding from mans brain, they mistrusted withall some secret traines & ambush, and with an exceeding noyse fled away as fast as ever they could, and stumbled upon the vantage of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were affraid as well of the one side as the other, to begin any skirmish in the night season, and stayed untill day light. In the meane while, Anniball having conducted his whole armie through the streights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pafe, encamped himself in the territorie of Alifas. Fabius descryed this tumult well enough, but doubting some privie ambush, and abhorring utterly all night battailes, kept his men within the strength of their rampiers. At the breake of day there began a skirmish on the side of the hill, in which the Romanes as being far more in number, had environed on every side the light-armed souldiers of the enemies, and soone defeated them, but that a band of Spaniards, sent

A back of purpose from Anniball came to rescue them: who being better acquainted with the mountaines, and more light and nimble in running among the crags and cliffs, by reason as well of the agility of bodie, as the fashion of their light harness; easily in that kind of skirmish, avoided and shifted from their enemy, heavily armed at all peeces, and used to fight upon the plaine, and to stand firmly and keepe their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted asunder one from the other, but nothing neere on even hand: for the Spaniards in a manner all went cleere away unhurt, the Romanes lost some of their men: and so on both parts they returned to their camps. Fabius likewise removed, and having passed over the streights of the forest, encamped in an high ground, and strongly situate even over Alifas. Then Anniball making as though he would march through Samnium toward Rome, returned back, wasting and spoiling the cuntry as farr as to the Peligni. And Fabius hovered still upon the hill tops betwene the armie of his enemies and the citie of Rome; leading his host so, as neither he departed farr, nor yet encountered and affronted his enemy. Then Anniball turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retred himselfe into Apulia, untill he was come as farr as Gerion, a citie abandoned and forsorne of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen downe, decayed and ruined. The Dictatour fortified his camp in the territorie of Larinum. Now was he sent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certaine solemne sacrifices: whereupon he conferred and dealt with the Generall of the Cavallerie, not onely by way of absolute commandement, but also with advise and persuasions, yea and as one would say, by prayer and intreatie, That he would trust more upon confederate counsell, than doubtfull fortune; and be directed and guided rather by him, than follow the steps of Sempronius and Flaminius; and not thinke there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckning of this, That the enemy had ben dallied withall, and trifled out, mocked and deluded, almost all the sommer long. Why, even Physicians (quoth he) many times do more good to the sick bodie of the patient, by giving rest and repose, than by stirring and disquieting the humors therein. And no small matter is it, that we are vanquished and overcome no more, at an enemies hands so often used to victorie. And after continuall foyles and overthrowes, to have had rest, and a time of breathing. Having in this wise admonished the Generall of horse aforehand (but all in vaine) he tooke his way to Rome. In the beginning of this summer, wherein these exploits were performed, warre began also in Spain both by sea and land. Asdruball to that number of ships which he had received ready rigged and well appointed of his brother, joynd other ten. To Himilco he gave the charge of a flete of forrie saile: and so, losing from Carthage, whiles his ships kept neere to land, he conducted his armie along the river upon the strond, ready to give battaile to the enemy, howsoever he should happen to encounter him either by land or sea. Cn. Scipio after he had intelligence that the enemy was removed out of his wintering harbour, at the first had likewise the same intention and purpose, but afterwards doubting to encounter by land, upon the exceeding great report that went of new aides, he embarked his best and most choyle souldiours, and with a flete of 35 saile, set forward to meete the enemy. And the second day after that he had loosed from Taracone, he came to the rode distant ten miles from the mouth of the river Iberus. From whence, two Pinnaces of the Massiliens were sent out afore, and brought word, that the Carthaginian Armado rode in the mouth of the river, and that the tents were pitched upon the banke. And therefore to the end that he might surprize them at unawares, and unlooking for them, with all the fearefull terrour at once, that he could possibly, he weyed anchor, and set saile toward the enemy. In Spain there are many towres standing upon high grounds, which serve the inhabitants of the cuntry in good steed, both as watch-towres to discover, and also as skones to withstand thieves and rovers. From whence the enemies ships were descryed first, and a signall given to Asdruball: in such sort, as the tumult and trouble arose upon the land, and in the camp, before any was seene on the sea and amongst the ships: for as yet neither noyse of oares, nor any ordinarie stirre else of mariners, was heard; ne yet the capes and promontories betwene suffered the flete to be seene. But then, all on a suddaine, certaine horsemen sent from Asdruball one after another, commanded the souldiours (who either wandered along the strond, or sat quiet within their pavilions, looking for nothing lesse than fight that day) presently in all haste to goe aboard, and to arme, for that the Roman flete was not farr from the haven. This commandement the horsemen that were sent, gave every where. And within a while Asdruball came in person with the whole armie. All was on a hurie; and full fall of sundrie al'armes; whiles both marriners and fouldiours, made haft to be shipped, rather like men that fled from land, than went to fight. Scarce were they all embarked, when some of them loosed from the shoare, and plucked up anchors; others cut the anchor cables; for that nothing should stay them: and all that they did, was with such haste; that whiles the fouldiours were occupied in making themselves readie to fight, the marriners were hindered in their businesse: and whiles the marriners made speed, the fouldiours were kept from taking their armour, and fitting themselves therewith. By which time Scipio was not onely approached neere, but also had marshalled and ordered his shippes readie to fight. So as the Carthaginians were troubled as well with the hurlyburlie and tumult of their owne people, as with the assault & battell of their enemies. And having (to say a truth) made an assay and proffer of fight, rather than begun any indeed, they turned away their fleet, and fled. And seeing, when they were once put to flight (by reason they were parted asunder all abroad; and lay open to so many of their enemies, following them upon the poupe all at once) that they were readie and easie to bee bouged and pierced, they rowed on all hands to the shore. Some were faine to wade to land, others leapt on dry ground; one sort armed, another sort unarmed; and so escaped to their companie, embattailed along the strand. Howbeit, in the very first encounter and onset, two Carthaginian shippes were taken, and foure suncke. The Romanes, albeit they saw the enemies, maisters of the land, & might behold them stand in battaile array all along the river side upon the bankes, yet made they no stay, but chased the fearefull fleet of their enemies: and so as many shippes, as either had not cracked, splitted, and broken their stems, with dashing upon the shore, or were not run a ground, and stucke fast by their keeles in the shelves, those they drew up, and warped into the deepe, with ropes fastened to their poupes; and so of thirtie they took five & twentie. And yet the taking off these vessels was not the best and goodliest cheate of their victorie; but this passed all; that with one light skirmish they became L.L. of all the sea along those coasts. And therefore arriving with their whole navie before *Honosca, they landed their men, woon the citie by forcible assault; sacked it, and from thence went forward toward Carthage. And after they had harried and wasted all the territorie about, at the last, they fired the very houses that joined to the wals and gates of the citie. From thence the Armada laden now & charged with rich pillage, sailed as far as *Longunrica. Where they found great store of Spart [to make cables] provided and laid up there by Asdruball to serve the navie: and when they had taken thereof as much as they needed, they made a light fire of all the rest. Neither coasted the Roman fleet along the continent and maine onely, and scoured those parts which lay out into the sea, but passed also unto the Isle *Ebusus: where they assaulted hotely for two daies space, the head cite of the Island, with much ado, and small effect. And when they perceived, that they spent time in vain, and were past all hope to win it, they fell to rob and spoile the countie: and after they had rifled and burned certaine villages, and gotten a greater bootie and pillage than they had out of the maine, they retired themselves to their shippes: and thither came Embassadours from the Islands Balears unto Scipio, craving peace. From thence hee came backe with the fleet, and returned into the hether part of the province; whether resorted unto him the Embassadours of all the Nations that inhabit about Iberus, yea, and of many also, from the fardest parts of all Spaine. But of States, that absolutly came under the obedience of the people of Rome, doing fealtie and homage unto them, and giving hostages for assurance of their alleageance, there were above 120. Scipio therefore, taking himselfe strong ynough in land forces, went on as farre as to the chafe of *Castulo. And Asdruball retired himselfe into *Lusitania, neere the Ocean sea. Here upon the rest of the summer was like to be quiet: and quiet had it been, for any thing that the Carthaginians did to the contrarie. But (over and besides the naturall disposition of all Spaniards, unconstant, busie, and evermore desirous of novelties and alterations) Mardonius a Nobleman, who before time had bene the Lord and Prince of the Illegetes, seeing the Romanes retired backe from the forrest, toward the sea coast, stirred up the people of his countie, and invaded the peaceable territories of the Roman associates, for to spoile and waste the same. Against whom there were sent from Scipio three thousand Romanes, besides certaine auxillarie fouldiours also, lightly armed, who in a light skirmish discomfited his forces, (as being a power gathered in hatt, and disordered) slew many, tooke some prisoners, and disarmed the greater part of them. Nevertheless, the rumour of this al'arme caused Asdruball, as hee departed to the Ocean, to crosse the river Iberus backe againe, for the rescue and defence of his friends and allies. The Carthaginians were encamped in the territorie

A territorie of the Illegetes, and the Romanes neere the new Armada, when suddaine newes diverted the warre another way. The Princes of the Celtiberians, who had sent the Embassadours of their countie, and hostages unto the Romans, upon a messenger dispatched unto them from Scipio, arose up in armes; and entered the province of the Carthaginians with a strong and puissant armie, wan three townes by assault; and afterwards, in two batailles which they fought with Asdruball right valiantly, slew 15000 enemies, and tooke 4000 prisoners; and many militarie ensignes they bare away.

While Spaine stood in these tearms, P. Scipio came as L. Deputie into that Province, continuing still his government after his Consulship expired, and was sent from the Senat with thirtie shippes of warre, eight thousand fouldiours, and great store of victuals. This great fleet, in regard of many hulkes and shippes of burden which accompanied it, was kenned and discovered a farre off, to the great joy both of Romanes, and also of their friends and associates, and arrived within the port and haven of Tarracon. Where the fouldiours were disembarked, and Scipio joined with his brother: and from that time forward they agreed together, and with one accord managed the warre. And whiles the Carthaginians were amused with the Celtiberian warre, they made no stay, but passed over Iberus, & seeing no enemy, they marched on toward Saguntum; for that the bruit went, that the hostages of all Spaine, delivered unto the custodie of Anniball, were kept there in hold within the castle, but with a small guard about them. That was the onely pledge which staied all the cities of Spaine, whose minds were well affected and inclined to entertaine league and societie with the Romanes, but they feared least if they should revolt, it would cost the lives of their children. This bond which held Spaine in awe, one man eased them of, by means of a devise & practise more wittie and subtiler than honest and loiall. There was at Saguntum, one Acidux a Nobleman of Spaine, trustie & faithful aforesaid unto the Carthaginians; but then (as the nature is for the most part of these Barbarians) as fortune altered her countenance, so changed hee his alleageance. And supposing, that if hee should flie unto the enemies, without performing some notable treason, & delivering into their hands one thing or other of great importance, hee should bee counted no better than a vile, base, and infamous creature, hee cast about how hee might win himselfe into these new Allies, and win them by some singular good service, unto their best and greatest behoofe. And considering all the meanes that Fortune might bring within his compasse to effect, he employed himselfe especially at the length, to set free and deliver those hostages, thinking that the onely way, to win and procure unto the Romanes the amitie of all the Princes and great men of Spaine. But knowing assuredly, that without warrant from Bostar the Constable of the castle, the keepers of those hostages would doe nothing, hee set himselfe in hand and cunningly goeth to worke with Bostar himselfe. Now lay Bostar in camp without the citie by the water side, to impeach the Romanes for entering the haven. Thither came Acidux to him, withdrew him apart into a secret place, and declared unto him as a man ignorant in what state things stood. Namely, that it was feare and nothing els, that kept the Spaniards untill that day in obedience, because the Romanes were so farre off; but now the Romanes were encamped on this side Iberus, as a sure fortress and place of refuge unto them, if they minded any innovation and change of State; and therefore seeing they could not long bee kept by feare, they were to bee obliged and bound unto Anniball by some favour and good turne. When Bostar marvelled and demanded, what suddaine demerite this might bee, and of so great consequence, Marrie (quoth hee) send backe the hostages into their owne cities. An acceptable, or present that will bee, both particularly to their parents, who are of greatest calling and reputation in their owne bounties, and also generally to all the cities and Nations. Everie man (you know) is desirous to bee trusted; and for the most part, credite given frankly unto one, bindeth him surely to bee most faithfull. The ministerie and charge of conducting the hostages home to their owne houses, I will require to have mine owne selfe, that I may farther a plot and devise of my owne; with mine owne proper service and employment; and the thing which of itselfe in nature is acceptable, I will in what I can grace and commend the same, and make it more meritorious. Having thus perswaded the man, being not altogether so wille, as other Carthaginians naturally are, hee went by night secretly as farre as the Corps de guard of the enemies; and after hee had met and talked with some Spaniards that were auxillarie fouldiours in the campe, and by them was brought before Scipio, hee declared unto him his whole intent and designement, and the cause of his coming. And after they had given and received received faithfull promise mutually between them, and agreed of time and place for the deliue-ric of the hostages unto Scipio, he returned againe to Saguntum. The daie following hee spent with Bellar, in receiving commission from him, for the execution of this matter. And thus being dismissed & having his dispatch, he purposed to go in the night, to the end that he might (for sooth) avoid the watch and wards of the enemies, the Romanes: and at the houre appointed he raised those who had the guard and custodie of the children, and put himselfe on his way; and (simple man he) as if he had been altogether ignorant of that which hapned, brought them within the compass of an Ambushment, forelaied before hand by his owne wille and craftie devise: and so were they brought into the Roman camp. All other points besides, concerning the rendring of the hostages, according to the agreement and appointment with Bellar, were performed in the same order, as they should have passed, in case all had been done in the name of the Carthaginians and to their behoofe. But the Romanes wan much more thanke and gained greater favour thereby, than the Carthaginians could have attained in the semblable curesie.

 For the Carthaginians (whom in their prosperous successe the Spaniards had found by experience to be rigorous unto them and proud) might have been supposed if they had done it now, to have been mollified and made more bonair and gracious through adverse fortune and feare: but Scipio the Romaine generall, at his first coming, and unknowne before time, beganne with a notable example and testimonie of clemencie and liberalitie. And Acedux besides, reputed a wife & prudent man, seemed not without great reason to have made exchange of his Allies and Friends. Whereupon they all desired with one accord to revolt, and presently they had taken armes in deede and rebelled, but for the approach of winter which forced as well Romanes as Carthaginians to betake themselves to their winter harbours.

These were the occurrents that fell out also in Spaine, in the second summer of the Punick war: whiles in Italie the wife and warie delaies, the industrious temporizing of Fabius in the manner of his warfar, gave the Romanes some respite & intermission of their foiles & overthrowes. Which as it wrought in Anniball no small trouble of mind & perplexitie, to see that the Romanes at the last had chosen for their Generall, a man who mannaged war, by discourse & guidance of sound reason, & not by adventure of fickle fortune; so it was despised of his own citizens, as well those that were armed abroad, as gowned at home: and namely, when during the absence of the Dictator, there hapned to be a field fought through the rashnes of the Generall of the Caualtery, with more joyfull successe (to speake truly) than happy and fortunat. Two other things there were besides, that caused the Dictator to be worse thought of, and in great disgrace and obloquie. The one through the deceitfull and wylie pollicie of Anniball: who being enformed by certain fugitive traitours (that fled from Rome unto him) which were the lands and possessions of the Dictator; gave expresse commandement when he had destroyed the countrey about, & made all even with the ground, to forbear all kind of hostilitie there onely, and to touch nothing of his, either by fire or sword: to the end it might be thought, there had been some packing between him & Anniball; and that this was the hire and consideration agreed upon between them two. The other arose from an action of his own: namely, about the exchange and comfing of certain prisoners or captives: which peradventure at the first appearance, might have seemed doubtfull and suspitious, (because therein he staid not for to have the commission & approbation of the Se-nat) but in the end & up-shot it turned, no doubt, to his singular praise and commendation. In that interchange above sayd, it was capitulate between both Generals, of Romanes & Carthaginians, (like as it had been afore in the first Punick war) That whether side received more Captives than they gave again, should yeild for every one soldour * two pound and a halfe of silver.
 When it fel out therefore that the Romaine Dictator Fabius had received more prisoners by 247 than Anniball, & the payment of the silver for them due; after much debate in the Senate house, (because he had not direction therein from the L. L.) was delayed, and no order taken therefore; he sent his sonne to Rome of purpose, to make sale of his lands, which had not been endamaged by Anniball: and so to his owne cost, and out of his private purse, discharged a publick debt.
Anniball now laie in leaguer, before the walls of Gerion, a citie which he had won and set on fire, and reserved a fewe houles standing, to serve him in stead of barnes & gamers for his graine.
 From thence he sent out two third parts of his forces to purvey come: & remained himselfe in gard with one third part, redy in armes, (but lightly appointed & without any bag & baggage) in a meet and convenient place; both for defence of the camp, and also for discoverie of all the cost

A cost about, that no assault were made upon the purveyors. The Romaine armie lay then in the territories of Larinum; & the Captain generall was Anniball, Commander of the horsemen; because the Dictator (as is above sayd) was gone to the siege of Rome. But whereas there had usually encamped before, upon some high hill and strong place of advantage; now they began to drawe down into the vale and the plaine ground; and to devise craftie means and stratagems beyond the naturall reach of the Commander himselfe; namely, how they might assault either the purveyors as they straggled about in the countrey, or set upon the camp of their enemies, left with a small power and guard to defend it. Anniball was not ignorant that Bellar with the Generrall, the whole manner and conduct of their warfar was changed: and that the enemy would fight rather more rashly and haltsie, than wylie and wariy. And himselfe, who would have thought it considering the enemy was approached neerer, sent out a third part onely of his foldiers to provide come as forage, and kept the other two with him in the camp. He removed also his tents neerer to the Romanes, almost two miles off from Gerion to a little hill within the sight of the enemies; to the end they might know he was minded and ready to reskue and defend the purveyors, if haply they should be charged upon. Then espied Anniball another hill neerer, and standing even over the yeile camp of the Romanes. For the gaming whereof, (seeing that if he should have gone by any time openly, he had been no doubt prevented by the enemies, who would have seized it first, by reason it was neerer unto them) he sent certain Numidians by night, who surprised it and kept it. But the Romanes making little or no account of their small number, drew them the morrow after from thence, and further removed their owne tents: so as then, there was but a little distance between one camp and the other; and the same, in a manner, wholly taken up and replenished with Romanes: and withall, at the same time, the horsemen of the Romans with certaine footmen lightly armed, went forth at a postern gate of the camp, (which opened not upon the Carthaginians) against the foragers, whom they discovered put to flight and slew a great number of them. Neither durst Anniball yssue forth to skirmish for having so few about him; hee was hardly able to defend his camp, in case it had been assaulted.
 So he was driven now to use the pollicie and shifts of Fabius, (for part of his forces were away) & managed his war, sitting still as it were and keeping the enemy at a bay & at staves end: as if he retyred with his soldiers to the former camp, under the walls of Gerion. Some write, that there was a field pitched, and a set battaile fought with banners displayed, wherein Anniball at the first encounter was discovered and chased to his camp; but from thence, they yssued forth who were within, & so the seare turned upon the Romanes, who on a sodain were put to the worse: but by the coming of Numerius Decimus (a Samnite) with succour, the fight was reinforced and renewed. This man, not onely nobly descended; but also of great power and wealth; as well in Bovianum his native country, where he was born, as throughout all Samnium (by order & commandement from the Dictator) came with a power of 8000 foot & 200 horse, toward the camp; and being espied by Anniball on the backside, gave both parties good hope of fresh and new aid.
 But when the voice went, that Fabius at the same time was coming also from Rome, Anniball for feare of being entrapped within some Ambush, retired backe with his owne men, & the Ro-manes made pursuite after him; and with the help of Numerius the Samnite, wan in one day by force, two fortresses. So there were 6000 enemies slaine; and 3000 Romanes. And yet as equal in a manner as the losse was of both parts, the rumour ran to Rome of a brave victorie, with letters also in post from the Generall of horsemen, full of follie and vanitie. Much arguing ther was and debate about these matters, both in Senate, and before the people sundry times. And when all the citie besides was joious, and the Dictator (alone) gave no credit either to the blisse that was blased, or to the letters, saying withall, That if all were true, yet hee feared more the frowning than the smiling of fortune: then M. Metellus a Tribune of the Commons, stepped forth & sayd, That this above all was not to be suffred: that the Dictator not onely withles hee lay in camp, opposed himselfe against all goodnes, and staid all valerous service; but also being absent from thence, crossed and disgraced that which was well done and worthily achieved: and that he, of purpose, drew the year in length and prolonged the time, to the end he might continue the longer in government, and be the man alone to command all, both in the citie and abroad in the armie: for one of the Consuls was slaine in battaile, the other under a pretence & colour of pursuing the Carthaginian fleet, was sent out of the way, far enough off from Italie: as for the two Praetours, they were employed both in Sicilie and Sardinia: and yet neither of those two provinces had any need of a L. Deputie there. And M. Minutius General of the horsemen was kept prisoner as it were, & might neither see, nor do any martial exploit. And his company (quod he) that not only Sannium (where the possession was surrendered) turned the Garthagians as if it were a territory lying beyond Liburni but the Campane, Calene, and Salernitan were utterly overrun & wasted, while the Dictator abode still at Capitulum, & with the legions of the people of Rome defended his own lands & possessions only. And when the Armenie & General of the Cavalry were desirous of battle, they were not back enclosed in a manner with the compass of the camp, & their weapons taken from them, as if they had been captive enemies. And at length when the Dictator was once departed from them, they issued forth of the camp, like men, delivered from siege, & to discomfit & put to flight their enemies in consideration of all these things, (he said) in the Commons of Rome were of that courage, as Lycomedes the husband, he would have boldly put up a bill for to deprive C. Fabius of his government. But now for this time, he would propound a more difficult & reasonable law, by virtue whereof the Commander of horsemen may be made equal with the Dictator in authority & power, as if as Q. Fabius might not be sent unto the Armenie, before that he had subdued & overcome the Col. in the rowne of C. Flaminius. The Dictator forbore altogether to come into any of the assemblies of the people, as a man in action and pleading nothing popular, and who framed not himself to the humor of the common people. Neither was he in the Senate heard with patience, at what time as he either magnified and extolled the valor of the senate, for their good and reckoned up the losses and foiles received for two years space, through their rashness and unskillfulness of the Commanders: and said with all, that the General of the horsemen was to answer and give account for fighting against his dict and express commandments. Moreover (quod he) if I were in place of sovereign rule and government, and to do all according as I thought good, I would effect and bring to passe, within few daies, that men should know, that a good warrior was to make small reckning of fortune: but wisdom, wit, & counsell were to guide and direct all. And for mine own part, I deem it a greater honor & glorie, to have preserved an armie in a time of trouble and danger, from shame & ignominie, than to have slain many thousands of enemies. And he had made these and such like speeches and reasons in vaine, and directed for C. M. Atilius Regulus: for that he would not be present, to debate the question concerning the right & authority of his owne government, he departed by night before toward the armie; even the very day before that the foresaid law should be propounded. The morning came, and the commons were assembled to an audience; wherein men seemed rather secretly in their hearts to malice the Dictator, and to affect and favour the General of the horsemen, than durst come forth and beseech to persuade and set forward that which pleased them all in common. And notwithstanding the bill was exceedingly well liked of, yet there wanted one to give some credite and authority thereto. At length, one stepped forth to set it on foot, namely, C. Terentius Varro, who the yere before had beene Proetour, a man not onely of obscure degree by calling, but also of vile and base parentage descended. His father was (they say) a Butcher, who kept shop and sold meat himselfe, and trained up his sonne in the same mechanicall and servile occupation. This Varro being a young man, and well left by his father (who was growne rich, and gained greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived some hope to live more gentlemanlike: and took a great liking to the common place, and pleading at the bar: exercising himselfe in entertaining causes of base persons, against the state & name of honest citizens and of good reputation: by meanes whereof he grew to be knowne among the people, and afterwards was advanced to place of worship and honour. And having beene Treasurer of the citie, and borne both Edilitships; as well that of the chaire, as the other of the Commons: and at length gone through one Pretorship, he aspired now higher, in hope to be a Consull: & full craftily waited his time; and sought to wind himselfe within the favour of the people, by meanes of the yll opinion and hard conceits they had of the Dictator; and thus he alone went away with all the affectionate love of the Commons. All men that were either at Rome or in the armie, both good and bad, in general (excepting the Dictator himselfe) received and admitted that bill, as made to his disgrace and shame, full reproch. But he, with the very same gravitie and constancie of heart, endured this injurious course and dealing of the people raging against him, wherewith he had both his adversities flandering & charging him before the multitude; and having received in the way as he journeyed letters importing the decree of the Senate, for deviding his authoritie equally with the General of the Fabius his words in the Senate.

A the horsemen; and being assured that notwithstanding his commission were parted & communicated with another, yet his skill and sufficientie of conduct and command remained still with himselfe; with a mind invincible as well against citizens as enemies, he returned to the armie. But Minutius who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunate success, & also for the favour of the common sort now verily beyond all measure & bounds of modestie, vaunted & gloried; in that he had conquered & got the mastery over Babius as was by Annibal. That Fabius (I say) who in time of distresse and calamitie, was the only warrior & captain that could be found out to match Annibal, than the superior magistrate, was by his constancie & approbation of the people (aching never to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even & equal with the inferior to wit, the Dictator with the General of horsemen: and in that citie, wherein the Commanders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods & Axes of the Dictator. So conspicuous & evident in the eyes of the world, was his felicitie and prowess above all others. And therefore minded was he to follow his own fortune, and to take his time: in case the Dictator still continued lingering in sloth and idleness, condemned in the judgment both of God & man. Whereupon, the very first day that he & Fabius were met together, he said that they were above all things to determine & set down in what sort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it best, that each other day (or if longer time between were supposed better) they should one after the other alternately have the full and whole command of all for the time in their severall turns: that if any occasion of fighting a battail were presented, they might be able to countervail the enemy, not only in counsell but also in power and strength. Fabius liked not of this supposing that whatsoever lay in the hands and disposition of his fellowe, must needs be subject unto the arbitrement of Fortune. Saying moreover unto him, that he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule, but not wholly to depart therefrom, and shut himselfe out. And therefore he would never willingly faile, but to his power manage by counsell and discretion one part or other: neither would hee devide with him either times or daies, but the fore and the armies that Minutius might have on moiticie, & himselfe another: & since he might not preserve all by his own counsell & policie, yet he would endeavour (so far as he could) to save somewhat. And so much he prevailed, that they parted the legions between them; as the manner of the Consuls was. The first and fourth fell to Minutius, the second and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horsemen number for number, and the auxiliarie soldiers of Alia and Latines. The General of the horsemen would needs likewise, that they should be encamped a furlong asunder, as was the custom of the Consuls. Annibal conceived hereupon a twofold joy; (for he was not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him from thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his owne scouts and spies) (on the one made this reckning, both that he should deale well enough with the lawfull authority of Minutius, and handle him in his kind; and also that the proud policie of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one halfe. Now there was a little hill between the camp of Minutius and of the Garthagians (and no doubt there was; but that he, who could gain it aforhand, should have the vantage of the enemy in regard of the ground. The hill Annibal was not so desirous to get without skirmish, (and yet it had bene a matter of good importance) as willing thereby to give some occasion of fighting and skuffling with Minutius whom he himselfe very well to be alwayes forward, enough encountered him and made resistance. The plaines all betwene, seemed at first sight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambushment, because it was neither over growne with any wood, nor yet in any part roughly overgrown and covered, so much as with bricke & brambles. But in very deede the ground was naturally made for to cover and hide an ambush, and there the cause was naked and bare a valley; none would have imagined and suspected any deceitfull traies, and forelaying of waies. And yet there were in divers moones and corners thereof, some hollow rocks and caves; and some other sort of sufficient capacitee to receive to be armed men in the lurking holes there were belovied, so that of horsemen and footmen one with another, in one place, some in another, according as they might command, could vantage themselves. And he said that the sitting of any one that might charge to go forth unawaresly, or the glistering of armour, should betray the traies in the open valley. Annibal by standing out in the break of day, some furlong from the foresaid hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies another way. There at the full day, were disposed the Romans for their small number, and every man was desirous to be doing with them; and their fingers itched for to set the enemies back, and drive them from thence. The Generall himselfe Minutius, as foole-hardie and forward as he that was most, sounded the alarme, and commaunded to go to the winning of the place, braving and threatening the enemies full vainely. First, he sent forth his light armed men to skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen, set close and jointlie together in aray: and at the last, seeing the enemies seconded with new succours and supplies, he advanced forward himselfe with his legions in order of battaile. And Anniball, wheresoever he perceived his men to be distressed, made out continually fresh aides one after another, both of horse and foote, ever as the fight increased and grew hotter: so as now he had his full armie in field, and they maintained battaile on both sides with all their powre & maine forces. First, the light armed Romans, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, desirous to get up against the hill, (possessed aforehand by the enemye) were put back, and beaten down againe: in so much, as in their retire, they put the horsemen in feare that followed hard upon them, and fled for refuge to the ensignes of the Infantry. The maine battaile of the legionarie footemen, among all the rest that were affrighted, only remained without feare, undaunted; and seemed in a plaine; set, and downeright field without ambush, likely enough to have held their owne; and in no respect to have bene overmarched; so couragious they were, and had taken such hart, upon their late victorie, some few dayes before. But the enemies starting sodainly out of their Emboscadoes, so troubled, disordered; and terrified them, flanking them on both sides, and charging withal behind, that neither their heart served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to flye and escape away. Then Fabius hearing their first cry, and knowing thereby, that they were in great feare, and seeing besides a farr off their battaile disordered and in disaray, I thought even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I feared, it is fallen out: Fortune I see wel, hath overraught foole-hardinesse, & taken it tardie. The man, forsooth, that must needs be made equall with Fabius in government, seeth by this time, that Anniball is his good maister, & his better by ods, in prowesse & fortune: but we shal find out some other time to chide and to be angry. Come on now, forth with your standards & ensignes; let us wrest from our enemies hands the victorie; and wring from our citizens mouths, confession of their error and trespassse. Now when some of them were flaine, and other looked about which way to make escape and flye: Fabius with his forces shewed himselfe, as sent downe from heaven to rescue them. And before he came to launce one javelin, or began to joyne battaile and fight one stroke, he not onely stayed his fellows from running away, but also his enemies from further heate of fight. As many of the Romanes as were disbanded & scattered asunder all abroad, repaired againe speedily from all parts, and rallied themselves to the entier battaile: the rest who by whole troupes had turned their backs, made head againe upon the enemye: and one while giving ground and retrying by little and little, another while standing in a ring and round together stedfast, kept this order by turnes: so as now, both they that were discomfited, and those that were unfoiled, became reduced into one bodie of a battaile, and advanced their ensignes against the enemye. By which time Anniball sounded the retreat, and openly confessed and sayd, that as he had vanquished Minutius, so was he foyled and overcome of Fabius. Thus when the more part of the day was spent with variable fortune, and all retryed againe to their camps, Minutius called together his souldiours, and spake unto them after this manner. I have oftentimes heard it spoken (my good souldiours) that he is the best man & most sufficient, who knoweth himself what is best to do: next to him is he esteemed, that will be ruled & directed by sage reede and counsell: but he that neither hath the skil to advise another, nor the grace to be advised by another, is simply of the worst nature, & good for nothing. Since that we therefore are not so happy as to attaine unto the highest degree of wit, & perfection of nature, let us content our selves with the second place, & keepe a meane betwene: and whiles we learne to rule, let us fettle our selves and resolve to obey him that is wiser than our selves. Let us joyne in camp with Fabius; and while we have presented our selves and our ensignes before his pavilion and tribunall, see that when we salute him by the name of Father, (as is becoming his excellent majestie, and the benefit by us of him received) that yee also call those souldiours your Patrones, whose valiant hands and trustie armies crewhile protected you: that this day may give us yet, if nothing else, the honor & name of thankfull persons. Having thus said, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage, and to dilodge: and as they marched in good aray toward the camp of the Dictator, they stucke both him and also all about him into a wonder and admiration. And having pitched their ensignes his souldiours.

A ensignes before the Tribunall: then Minutius the Generall of the horse, went forth before the rest and after he had greeted Fabius himselfe as his Father, and the whole armie likewise saluted those about Fabius, by the name of Patrones: To my parents (quoth he) & Dictator, unto whom I have made you equall in name only (as much as my tongue will give me leave) I am bound and beholden for my owne life only and no more: but to you, I am indebted for saving both my life and all these here. The Act therefore and ordinance of the commons which hath been a clogge and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my selfe I renounce, revoke and abolish: and (that which I pray God may prove to the good, both of you and me, of my armie and yours, as well that which is preserved, as that which is the preserver) lo I submit & surrender again my selfe under your commaund and government, together with these ensignes and legions thereto belonging: beseeching you to pardon me, and to entertaine me in the rouse of the Generall of the Cavallerie, & those here with me, every man in his former place. Then interchangeably they gave their hands one to another: and the souldiours (after the assembly dismissed) were courteously invited, and friendly entertained as well by them that were unknown unto them, as of their acquaintance, and so the day, dolorous, heave, and almost dismall and accursed, turned to be joyfull and festivall.

His speech to the Dictator.

C So soone as tidings came to Rome of these occurrents, and the same confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themselves, as also by the common voice of souldiours from both armies, every man the best hee could; praised and extolled Maximus up to the skie; whose honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Anniball and the Carthaginians, for then and never before, they found, that they had to deale and war in Italie, & with Romanes. As for the two years space before, they set to light both by Romane captaines and souldiours, that they could be hardly persuaded, that they warred with that Nation, whereof there went so great a fame, & of whom their forefathers had reported such wonders and terrible things. They say also, that Anniball as he returned out of the field, gave out these words, That the cloud which seded on the hill tops, covered so long in the wind, that it proved a tempestuous storme in the end.

Whiles these things were doing in Italie, Cn. Servilius Geminus the Consull, having sailed about the coasts of Sardinia and Corsica with his fleet, and received hostages both of the one Ile and the other, passed over into Affricke: and before that he landed in the continent & firme land, he wasted the Island Meninx, and having received ten talents of silver of the inhabitants thereof, for feare lest their territorie also should be consumed with fire, and spoiled as well as the rest, he came to Affricke and there set his forces ashore. From thence he led his souldiours and mariners likewise, one with another, disbanded and out of order, as if they were to rob and spoile some desert Islands, unpeopled and void of inhabitants; Whereupon they fell unadvisedly into an ambush; and being unskillfull of the countrey, and therewith but few and scattered, they were soon enclosed among many, and with much slaughter and shamefull flight, were driven and beaten backe to their ships. The fleet thus having lost a thousand men, and one treasurer of the armie among them, called Sempronius Blasus, losed in great hast from the shore (which now was overspread by enemies) and held their course for Sicilie, and at Lilybarum was set over and delivered, to T. Ostacilius the Pretour, for to be brought backe againe to Rome, by P. Sura his Lieutenant. Cn. Servilius himselfe journeyed through Sicilie by land, and crossed the narrow seas into Italie: for both hee and his Colleague M. Atilius were sent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the armie at his hands, now that his six moneths soveraine government was wellnigh expired. All the Annales in a manner doe record, that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorship, fought and waged warre with Anniball. Cassius writeth also, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Cassius and the rest, either knew not or els forgot, that the Consull Servilius, who then was sent from Rome, and in the province of France, had the lawfull right and authoritie onely to nominate a Dictator: and because the citie so affrighted, by reason of that notable overthrow could not stay so long, they were driven to this shift, that they should be created by the people a Pro-dictator or Dictator his Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious rewarde of that Generall together with the title of his image, which might recomend his house more honourable to posteritie, gained easily this point, and caused the Pro-dictator to be reputed Dictator, and so called.

The Consuls, M. Atilius Regulus and Cn. Servilius Geminus, having received the armie (as before said) fortified in good time the places for wintering harbours (for it was then the Auturne season) conducted and managed the warres together in great concord, and followed the same politicke course that Fabius had done before them. For as Annibal made rodes at any time to purvey come, they would meet him just at every turne, in sundrie places, and either cut off the taile of his men, or intercept and catch them as they went scattering, but never hazard all in one set field; the onely thing that the enemye shot at, by all the meanes hee could devise. And so neere driven was Annibal, and to those tearmes of want & scarcitie, that but for very shame (least by his dislodging and departure hee might be thought to flie) hee would have retired backe into Gallia, as being out of all hope to maintaine his armie with victuals in those parts, in case the new Consuls who next succeeded, should hold on still the same policie and manner of warfare. Winter now approached, and all the war that was, continued and rested about * Gerion: at what time there arrived at Rome, Embassadors from Naples, who brought with them, and presented into the counsell house, fortie massie bols of beaten gold: and withall delivered this speech and said, That they knew full well, how the treasure of the people of Rome was wasted and consumed by long warres. And for as much as the said warres were maintained, as well for the defence of the cities and lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother citie, and principall citadell (as it were) of all Italie, and for the soveraigne dominion & Empire thereof; the Neapolitanes thought it meet and reason, that what store of gold their auncestors had left unto them, were it for to adorne and deck themselves, or to relieve them in time of need and necessitie, with it they were to aid and helpe the people of Rome in their adversitie. And if they could have beene thought themselves of any other meanes besides, wherin they might steed and befriend them, they would as willingly and frankly have made presentment thereof: saying, moreover, that the Senatours of Rome should doe them an high pleasure, if they would make account of all that the men of Naples had, as their owne; and judge them worthy, at whose hands they would vouchsafe to accept a present, much greater, and more precious in regard of the minde and affection of the givers, than the substance and value of the thing. The Embassadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberalitie and munificence, as for the care they had of them: and that boll was onely received, which weighed least.

About the same time, a Carthaginian spy, who for two yeares space had walked unknowne and unsuspected, was detected now and apprehended at Rome: and after his hands were cut off, was suffred to depart. Five and twentie slaves were crucified for a conspiracie contrived in Campus Martius. The informer was made free, and had * 20000 pound of brasse bullion given him for a reward. There were also sent Embassadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand againe Demetrius Pharius, who having bene vanquished in plaine field, was fled unto him. Others likewise were dispatched to the Ligurians, as well to exortulate with them and complaine, that they had succoured Annibal with men, money, and other munition: as also to hearken and learne (seeing they were so neere) what the Boians and Insulrians did or went about. Besides, a third embassage was addressed as farre as to * Illyricum, unto King Pinens, to require and call for the Tribute, whereof the terme was expired and past: and if he were minded to take a longer day, then to receive hostages & pledges of him for securitie. See how careful the Romanes were, and what a provident eye they had, notwithstanding the great warre which lay heavily upon their necks and shoulders, to their other affaires: in so much as no one thing in the world, how distant and remote soever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and church matters, they made some scruple of conscience, that the temple of Concord (which L. Manlius, L. Deputis in Gallia, had vowed two yeares before in time of a sedition and mutenie of souldiers) was not as yet set out to workmen for to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Duumvirs were for that purpose created, by Aemilius the Pretor or L. Governour of the citie, namely, Cn. Papirius, and Cass. Quintus Flaminius: who gave order, that the Temple should be built upon the Capitoll hill. The same Pretor, by vertue of a decree of the Senate, sent his letters also unto the Consuls, importing thus much, that if they thought good, one of them should repaire to Rome for the creation of new Consuls; and that himselfe would summon the Parliament against that day, which it should please them so appoint. The Consuls wrote back againe according to the premises: That they might not depart farre from the enemye without damage of the State: advising them to hold an assembly for the Election afore said, by authoritie of an interregent rather, than that one of the Consuls should be called away from the warres. But the LL. of the Senate thought it better, to have a Dictatour chosen by one of

A new Consuls, for the holding of such high court of parliament. So L. Valerius Philo, was nominated Dictatour; and he chose for Generall of the horsemen M. Pomponius Matro. But these men being not only, and lawfully created, were commaunded to the forthright end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Interregne. The Consuls had their commission, for government and conduct of the armie, continued and confirmed for one yeare longer. The Senatours named for Interregents; first Cn. Claudius Cento, the sonne of Appius; and after him, P. Cicerellus Asina. During whose interregne, the Parliament was holden, with much contention & debate betweene the Nobles and the Commons: The vulgar people endeavouring to advance unto the Consullship C. Terentius Varro, a man of their owne coat and condition; one chose him to good liking, and favour with the common sort, by opposing himselfe and contesting against greater personages, and by other popular practices and courses that he used to winne grace among the people; as namely, by abating the greatness of Fabius, and the majesty of the Dictatourship: for nothing was there els in him, to commend him to the world; but a malicious malice to bring others into disgrace. The Nobles withstood the Commons all they could, to prevent this mischief. That most should not take a custome to be their equals, by meanes of flattery and flattery head against them. Bibius Herennius a Tribune of the Common and kinsman to C. Terentius, blamed & accused much not only the Senatour, but also the Augurs, in that they forbade the Dictatour to finish & go through with the election: and so by drawing them into hatred, sought to purchase favour and credit unto Terentius his Candidate, who stood to be Consull. First, quoth he, where as the Noblemen for many yeares together, sought occasions of warre; and trained Annibal into Italie, the same persons craftily have made a long warre of it, when it might have been brought to a finall end before now. Also, when it was well seene that they might have fought a battaile with the compleat power of foure legions all together; seeing that M. Annianus in the absence of Fabius had a luckie day: two legions only and no more, were offered and exposed as it were to the enemye to be hewen in peeces: and then afterwards, they were rescued and saved from massacre, and the very edge of the sword: to the end that Fabius might be called Father and Patrone: even he, who to say a truth, first impeached the Romanes for vanquishing the enemies, before that he saved them from being vanquished. Moreover, the Consuls that succeeded, following the same course and artificiall fetches that Fabius practised before them, drew out the warre till on length, when they had good meanes of victorie; and might have fully finished it.

D A complot (no doubt) contrived and concluded among all the Nobles. And never will they see to make an end of warre, before there be a Consull chosen, a meere commoner in deede, to wit, a man never seene afore, and of the first head. For those who of commoners are now noblified, are all alike and of the same profession; they draw all in one line; and have leaunte one lesson; and ever since that they have left to be contemned of the Nobilitie, are fallen to despise and disdain the Commonaltie. For who seeth not? that in seeking to have an Interregne, their onely purpose and teach was, that the Election might be full and whole in the power and ordering of the Nobles. That was the thing which the Consuls aimed at, in staying behind in campe with the armie: and afterwards when there was a Dictatour created against their wils for to hold the great assemblee for the Election, their drift was, and they wrought so, and brought it about in the end, that the Augurs should give it out and pronounce, that there was an error committed in creation of the Dictatour. And therefore, saith he, the commons cannot of all things away, with these Interregnes: and verily, one of the Consullships (at least) apperteineth of right to the Commons of Rome: and no doubt, the people in their free election would more willingly make choyse of one to be Consull, and conferre the dignitie upon him, that loved rather to win the victorie at once; than to continue commaunder in the armie a long time. When the Commons were once inkindled and set on fire with these speeches and remonstrances, albeit three of the Patritij were competitours, namely, Pub. Cornelius Merenda, L. Manlius Vulso, and M. Aemilius Lepidus, and two new noblemen, who were already familiar and acquainted with the Commons, to wit, C. Attilius Serranus, and Q. Atilius Patrus, of whome the one had bene High Priest, and the other Augur: yet at length was C. Terentius onely created Consull; to the end that the election should be in his power, that hee might choyse unto him a Colleague at his pleasure. Then the Patritians having a sufficient tryall, that their Candidates and competitours were of small force and not able to prevaille, urged and put forward L. Aemilius Paulus, who sometimes had bene Consull with M. Lulius, in the condemnation as well of himselfe as of his companion, escaped the perill of being burnt, G and was well senced and scorched as it were in the fire: a man of all others most mischievously bent against the commons: him they urged to stand for a Consulship, notwithstanding he refused a long while, and alledged many reasons against it. And so the next Comitall or Parliament day, by occasion that all the concurrents & competitors aforesaid that stood with Varro, gave place & left off their suite, he was chosen to march with the Consul elect, for to thwart and crosse him, rather than to be assistant unto him in the government. This done, they proceeded to the election of Pretours, wherein M. Pomponius Mitho, and P. Furius Philus, were created. Vnto Pomponius, fell by lot the iurisdiction within the cite of Rome: and vnto P. Furius Philus, betweene the citizens of Rome and foreiners. Two other Pretors besides were chosen, M. Glaucius Marcellus, to be sent L. Deputie into Sicilie, and L. Posthumius Albinus into Gallia. All were created in their absence, and excepting Terentius the Consul onely, there was no Magistracie conferred upon any, who had not aforetime borne and exercised the same: for divers valorous and hardie men were passed over, & left out, because in such a time of trouble, it was not thought good to preferre any man to a government, wherein he was raw, and unexperienced. The armies also were augmented; but to what proportion they arose, either in Cavallerie, or Infanterie, I dare not set downe any thing for certaintie: so greatly do authors varrie both in the number and qualitie of the forces. Some say, there was a new supplie of 10000 souldiers enrolled. Others asseme, that to the five legions, there were adjoynd foure new besides, to the end they might employ nine legions in the warres. Also, that the legions were increased in number both of foote and horse: to wit, with the addition of one thousand footemen, and three hundred horsemen in every Legion: [For sometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foote, and 300 horse, called quadrata legio: whereas at first, Romulus ordeined it to be 3000 of the one, and 300 of the other.] so as a legion consisted now of five thousand foote, and three hundred horse: and that the associates should double the number of horsemen, and find even proportion of foote men with the Romanes.

Some Historians have written, that at what time as the battell of Cannae was fought, the Romanes were in campe 87200 strong. But in this they all agree, that the Romanes warred with greater preparation, and more force and suite than in yeeres past, because the Dictatour had put them in good hope, that the enemy might be vanquished and subdued at once. But before that these new Legions advanced under their ensignes and banners out of the citie, the Decemvirs were commaunded to goe and peruse the bookes of Sibylla; by reason that men were commonly put in feare, and terrified with newes of strange sights and prodigious tokens. For the rumour went, that both at Rome in the Aventine, and also at Aricia, it rained stones much about one time; and that in the Sabines countie (which no doubt portended a great massacre and slaughter) there issued out of a certaine fountaine, waters hore, with much bloud: and men were more terrified therewith, because it did so many times together. Besides, in the street called Fornicata, toward Campus Martius, divers persons were blasted & smitten to death with lightning from heaven. These prodigious signes were expiate and purged with due remedies out of the aforesaid bookes. Embassadors also from the citie of Pestum, brought unto Rome a present of massie bols of beaten gold. Thanked they were, like as the Neapolitanes before them, but the gold was not received.

The Embassadors
of K. Hiero, in the Senate of Rome.

At the same time, there arived at Ostia from K. Hiero a fleet of ships, redy rigged, & furnished with store of victuals; The Syracusan Embassadors were brought into the Senate house, where they declared, That K. Hiero, so soone as he heard of the death of C. Flaminius the Consul, & the defeiture of the armie, tooke it so heavily, that no proper calamitie of his owne, or losse incident unto his kingdom, could have troubled him more and touched him neerer: and therefore albeit he knew full well, that the grandeur & courage of the people of Rome, was ordinarily more admirable in their adversitie, than in prosperitie and welfare, yet he had sent all those things, where with good friends and faithfull Allies are wont to furnish the associates in time of war: praying the L.L. of the Senate, in any case not to refuse the same, but to take all in good worth. And first M and formost, for good luck sake & fortunate presage, they have brought with them the image of Victorie in gold, weighing 320 * pound: requesting, that it wold please them to accept the same, to have and to hold it, as their owne for ever. Moreover they had transported with them * 300000 Modios of wheate, and 200000 of barley, to the end they should be at no fault for victuals, and

A and were redy moreover to bring in more, according as they should need, & to what place they would appoint. As for footmen heavily armed, & horsemen, he knew well the people of Rome would use none but naturall Romanes, or at least wise Latines. But forasmuch as he had seen & observed in the Roman camp, forrain aids consisting of light armed souldiers, therefore he had sent 1000 Archers and Slingers, a meet and competent power to match with the Balcares & Mores, and other nations that use shot, and to reach their enemy a far off. Over and besides these gifts and reall presents, they counselled and advised them, that the Lord Deputie of Sicilie, should passe with his fleet into Affricke, both to find the enemy worke, and give him his hands full of warre at home: and also to affoord him lesse respite and worse opportunitie, to send aid and succour to Anniball. The Senate returned this answer againe unto the King. That King Hiero had done the part of a right good man, & a singuler friend and allie: who ever since that he was entered into amitie with the people of Rome, hath held on the same course still, in keeping his faithfull alleageance, and never failed, but at all times, and in all places succoured and advanced the state & empire of Rome, with all bountie and princely munificence: which the people of Rome tooke most thankfully, as in right they ought. As for gold, some other cities likewise had brought and offered unto them, but accepting onely in good worth their kindnes, received it not. But the image of Victorie, & the happie presage and foretoken thereof they gladly accepted: and for that blessed Saint, they appointed & dedicated even the Capitoll, & temple of Iup. Opt. Max. to be the seat & shrine thereof: that being consecrated in that castle & highest forresse of the citie of Rome, it might be propice and gracious, and remain firme and fast to the people of Rome. As for the slingers and archers, together with the corn, they were delivered to the Coss. Five & twenty gallics, with five ranks of oares to a side, were joined to the Navie which was under the conduct of T. Octavius the Propretor in Sicilie: who had commission, if he thought it good & expedient for the commonweale, to passe over into Affricke. The Consuls having finished the musters & levied souldiers, staid a few daies, untill their allies were come with aide from the Latines. Then were the Souldiers particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put to their corporall oath, and sworne to make their repaire at the Consuls commandement, and without their leave not to depart: for untill that daie, there passed nothing but a sacrament parole & simple promise in generall. For whensoever the horsemen resorted to their Decuries, and footmen to their Centuries, both they of the Cavallerie in their Decuries, & also of the Infanterie in their Centuries, swore (after a sort) voluntarily among themselves, That they would not abandon their ensignes by way of flight, or upon any feare, nor go out of their ranks, unless it were to fetch either some offensive armour, or to smite an enemy, or to save the life of a citizen. Which having been aforetime a voluntarie covenant & accord between themselves, was now by the martial Tribunes or Colonels, reduced to a formall and solemne oth, and bound the souldiers to observe the same, of necessitie. Yet before the ensignes set forward and marched out of Rome, the Consul Varro dealt many hortwords and brave orations in the assemblie of the people, intimating & purporting thus much in effect: That the Nobles had called for war in Italie, where it was like to remaine long enough, and to sticke close by the ribs of the common-weale, if the were served with many such Generals as Fabius was, As for my selfe (qd. he) I shal (I trow) vanquish the enemy, the first day that I set eie upon him, yea and finish the war at once for ever. But his collegue Paulus made but on only speech, even the day before they were to take their leave of the citie: which was not so wel taken of the people for the present, as it proved true in the end. Wherin he gave Varro no hard words, nor girded at him otherwise than thus; That hee marvelled much, how any captain, before he had experience either of his owne armie or of his enemies, and knew the situation of the place and ground, and the nature of the countrey, sitting as yet within the citie in his gowne, could perfectly tell what he was to do in the field, and in armes: and be able also to foretell and set downe the very day; wherein hee was to encounter and joine in raunged battaille with the enemy. For his owne part, he would not cast thus afore-hand, nor plot his designes & counsailes before due time & season, which present occurrences are wont much more to minister unto men, than men to fit them to the occurrences that shal happen. This wold he with all his hart, That the enterprises taken in hand warily & with discretion, might prove as luckie & fortunate. As for inconsiderat, rashnesse, besides that it implieth folly, hath ever to that day sped but ill. Thus it was wel seen, that this man of himselfe enclined to prefer safe proceeding & advised counsel, before doubtful waies & foole hasty courses: & to the end that he might persevere in that resolution tion more constantly, Q. Fabius Maximus at his departure (by report) bad him farewell; in this G or such like manner.

The Oration of
Q. Fabius Max.
to L. Aemilius
the Consul.

If either you, L. Aemilius, had a Colleague like unto your selfe, (which I could rather wish) or that your selfe were furable to your Colleague, these my words to you were altogether needlesse and superfluous. For you twaine, being two good Consuls, would even without my speech do all things faithfully to the good of the Commonweale; and contrariwise, if both of you were bad, yee neither would vouchsafe to give care to my sayings, nor ponder in mind my counsels. But now, when I consider your companion what he is, and your selfe, to be a man of that qualitie and worth, you are hee to whome alone I am addressed to direct my whole speech; to you, I say, whom me thinks I foresee already, like to be in-vaine and without effect; an honest man and a good citizen. For if the Commonweale be halt and lame but of one side, as great sway and authority will bad projects & lewd courses carrie, as the good, sage, and wholesome counsels. For you are far out of the way and much deceived, L. Aemilius, if you thinke to bee lesse troubled with Anniball than with C. Terentius. And I wote not well, but I greatly feare, that you shall have a more comberous aduersarie of the one, than a dangerous enemy of the other. For, with Anniball you are to fight in the field; and in time of battell onely: but with Terentius you shall have to doe in every place, and at all houres. Against Anniball and his Legions you shall make head; and have the help of your own Cavallerie & Infanterie: but Generall Varro will assaile you even with your owne souldiours. Farre be from you in any ill sence the late remembrance of C. Flaminius, for I love no such unluckie boding. Howbeit, he began his mad fits when hee was once Consul, and never before: when hee was in his province with commaund, and in the campe with his armie, and never els. But this Varro, even before he stood for the Consulship, and all the whiles he was a suiter therefore, and now likewise, that he is Consul, before that he seeth campe or enemy in field, is hornemad, and talketh like a man besides himselfe. What foule worke then (thinke you) will he make, when hee shall see himselfe with armed youths about him in the campe; who now amongst peaceable citizens in their gownes and long robes within the citie, stirreth so great stormes and tempests, cracking & vaunting at every second word, of nothing but fight, skirmish, and battaile? What a coyle I say, will he keepe there, where no sooner a word spoken, but a blowe given; and when upon direction, presently ensueth execution? But in case this man (as hee saith flatly he will) fall immediately to strike a battaile; either I know not what belongeth to Atrillia, rie, and have neither skill how to conduct this kind of warfare, nor any experience of the qualitie and nature of this enemy, or els there will be another place more noble and memorable by our deafeate and overthrow, than was the Lake Thrasymenus. But it is no time now to stand upon these tearmes, and to glorifie my selfe in comparison of this one person: who have loved (as is wel known) to exceed & go beyond all measure in despising glorie and honor, rather than in desiring and coveting the same. But the truth is this; and so it will be found in the end, that the only way to war against Anniball, is that, which I tooke and alwaies used. Neither is it the issue & event alone (for that is maister and teacher of fooles) which sheweth and proveeth this unto us; but even reason it selfe which hath, and will be still the same & immutable, as long as things in the world hold on as they doe. We warre (you see) in Italie, at home; in our owne ground and place of residence: all quarters round about us; full of our owne citizens or friendly Allies: who daily helpe us, and will bee readie still to furnish us with armour, men, horse, and victuals. Sufficient prooffe and testimonie of their faithfulness have they given us already in our hard distresse and adversitie. Space and procelle of time maketh us better, stronger, wiser every day than other; and more constant and resolute. Contrariwise, Anniball is in a strange and forraigne land, in his enemies countrie, in the mids of all things that are cross and adverse unto him; farre from his house and home, farre from his native soile, having peace no where, neither by land nor sea. No cities receive him and give him entertainment, no wals he hath within which he can retire himselfe in safetie. Nothing seeth he, whereforever he goeth, that he can say is his owne. From day to day, from hand to mouth, he liveth of rapine and spoile. Scarce a third part hath he of victuals, which hee transported over the river Iberus. Hunger and famine hath wasted more of them, than the edge of the sword; and for this small remainder that is left, hee is hard and cruel, proud ded of food and sustenance. Make you any doubt then, but he shall vanquish him, whose victuals still and take our ease, who day by day detaileth himselfe, and wareteth old and feeble, who neither hath store of victuals to maintaine an armie, nor supplie of men to make up his broken bands,

A nor masse of monie to entertaine them. How long was he faine to fight for Gertion, a poore little castle in Apulia, as if it had been for the wals of Carthage it selfe? Neither will I boast and magnifie my selfe at all, before you, L. Aemilius. Doe you but onely consider, how Cn. Servilius and Attilius, the last Consuls, plaied mockholiday with him, and deluded him. This is the onely way of safetie, L. Aemilius, which I feare me, our own citizens will make, difficult and dangerous unto themselves, more than the enemies can. For you shall have your own souldiours & your enemies, both of one and the same mind. Varro the Roman Consul, and Anniball the Carthaginian, Generall, will aime and reach at one and the selfesame thing. And you, being but one man, must make account to resist two captains; and resist them you shall well enough if you will stand firm and hold your owne against all bruits and speeches of the people, if neither the vaine-glorie of your fellow that shall be blased, nor the infamous rumors that shall bee falsely blowne abroad to your disgrace, shall once stirre you from your constant resolution & maintenance of the truth. Old sayd sawes these be, and common proverbes, That right and true-dealing may well be sicke, but it shall not die: it may lie a bleeding, but shall not miscarie. And he that will despise vainglorie, shall attaine in the end to true glorie. Let them call you and spare not, fearefull for careful, cold and slow for wise and considerate, an ill souldiour and ignorant for a skilfull warrior and experienced. But be not you dismayed: I had leifer heare a wife and sober enemy to fear you, than see foolish and brainesicke citizens to praise you. Adventure all things boldly, Anniball will contemne your enterprise nothing rashly, he shall dread you. And yet my purpose is not, neither speake I this, that you should enter into no action, at all: but my meaning and advise is, that in all your doings you be guided and directed by sage reason, not haled and carried away with blind fortune. Order the matter so, that all things lie within your compasse, and at your disposition. Stand ever armed, and upon your guard. Have your eye about you still, and keepe good watch, that neither you lose any opportunitie that shall present it selfe unto you, nor yeeld unto the enemy any occasion for his advantage. Take time and leisure, you shall find all things cleere, plaine, easie, and certaine. Contrariwise, hast maketh wast: it is ever to seeke, it foreseeth nought, but is starke blind.

The Consul answered to these speeches, with no lightsome cheere and glad some countenance, as confessing, That all he spake was rather true in substance, than easie in execution. For (saith he) if the Generall of horsemen were so violent, and not to be endured of you, who were his Dictatour & Sovraigne Commanders; what course shall I take, what shift may I make, what power and authoritie sufficient, am I like to have, to sway against my seditious, quarrellsome, and headie Colleague? For mine owne part, in my former Consulship, I hardly escaped a scouring, and much ado I had to passe through the light fire of the flaming peoples doome and heavey censure, wherein I was well scorched and halfe burnt. I wish all may be well in the end. Howbeit, if any thing shall fall out otherwise than well, I had rather hazard the pikes and darts of the enemy, and leave my life behind me among them, than put my selfe to be tried againe by the voice & suffrages of angrie & restie citizens. Paulus had no sooner delivered this speech, but (as the report goeth) he went forth on his journe, & the cheefe LL. of the Senat accompanied him. The other Commoner Consul was likewise attended of his favourites the Commons, more looked on and gazed at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth and qualitie of their persons.

So soone as they were arrived at the campe, and that the new armie was intermingled with the old, they divided the whole into two camps, and ordered the matter so, that the new which was the lesse should be neerer to Anniball; and in the old, the greater number and the whole strength and floure of the maine forces should be quartered. Then they sent away to Rome M. Atilius, the Consul of the former yeare, who excused himselfe by reason of his old age; and desired to be gone. But they gave unto Cn. Servilius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and besides of two thousand horsemen and footemen of their allies in the lesse campe. Anniball, notwithstanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was reinforced by one halfe more than before: yet wonderful joyfull he was at the coming of these new Consuls. For not onely he had nothing left him of victuals which from day to day he brevied for, to serve his present neede and no more; but also there was no more to be had, and nothing remained for to fill his hands with; by reason that after the territorie was, not late to travaile in, that come from all parts was conveyed unto the strong walled townes and there laid up: so that (as afterwards it was known for certaine) he had scarce come ynough for to serve ten daies : and the Spaniards, by occasion of the dearth and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, if they might but espie a good and commodious time therefore. Over and besides, to the inbred rathnesse and overhastie nature of the Confull, fortune also ministred mate to confume him therein. For in a certaine tumultuarie skirmish (to stop and impeach the forragers and boothalers of Anniball, and which began rather by chance, as the souldiours happened to encounter one another, than upon any considerate counsell aforehand, or by direction and commaundement from the Generals) the Carthaginians had the foile, & went by the worse; for of them there were 1700 slain: but of Romanes and Confederates, not passing 100. And when in the traine of victorie they hotely followed the chase in disaray, the Confull Raulus, who that day had the absolute command (for they governed by turnes, each on his day) refrained and staied them. Verro thereat chaufed and frownded, crying out aloud; That hee had let the enemy escape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given over the pursuit, the warre might have been ended at once. Anniball tooke this losse and damage nothing neere the heart, but rather made full reckning, that he had caught (as it were) with a bait, and beshed the audaciouesness of the foolchastie Confull, and of the new souldiours especially. For he knew as well, all that was done amongst the enemies, as in his owne campe; namely, that the Generals were not futable nor forcing one unto the other: and that of three parts of the armie, two in a manner were but rawe, fresht, and untrained souldiours. And therefore supposing he had now gotten place and time favourable unto him, to contrive and compasse some stratageme; the night following he led forth his souldiours, carying nothing about them but their armour; and abandoned the campe full of all things, as wel privat goods and furniture, as publike provision: and beyond the next hills, he bestowed secretly in ambush his footmen well appointed & in ordinance of battell, on the left hand; & the horsemen on the right: and conveyed all his carriages into the mids between the two flanks: to the end that whiles the enemy was busied in rifling and ransaking the tents, forlorne (as it were) and forsaken by the flight of the owners and masters, he might surpris him laden & encombred with bag and baggage. He left behind him in the campe many fires burning, to the end that the enemies should verily thinke and beleve, that under a pretended shew of an armie in campe, his purpose was to hold and keepe the Confulls, amused still where they were, whiles himselfe in the meane time might gaine more ground and escape further away: like as he had plaid by Fabius the verie before. When day light was come, and the Confull, first that the standing guards were gone, and perceived (as they approached neerer) an unwonted silence, they marvelled much. But after they discovered certainly that the campe was abandoned, and no person remaining behind, that was running of all hands who could run fastest to the pavilions of the Confull with newes that the enemies were fled, in such feare, as they left their tents standing entire, and had quit the campe wholly: and to the end their flight should be more secret and not descied; they had left light fires burning in everie place. Then began they all to crie & call upon the Confull, for to commaund the standers and ensignes to be brought abroad, and to lead forth in pursuite of the enemies; & without any stay to make spoile and havock of their campe. And in truth, one of the Confull was no wiser than the common souldiours. But Paulus replied & told them ever & anon, that they were to be circumspect and warie, & to looke about them what they did for feare of an ambush. Yet being in the end no remedie, and that otherwise hee could neither staie the mutinie, nor rule the captaine thereof: he sent out M. Statilius (the Provost marshall) with a troupe of Lutean horsemen, in cypiall, to discover the coasts & see all were cleare: who having ridden hard to the gates, and given order to all the rest for to stay without the fortifications; himselfe with two hundred besides, entred within the rampire; and having looked and searched every corner advisedly, portired and made relation, That past all peradventure there were rhaves abroad, & a peece of officerie was in hand: for why, there are fires made (qd. he) on that side only of the campe, that looked toward the enemy: the pavilions stand open, and all things of price & value which they looke most store by, are left at random even to sit our hands; & we have seen besides in divers places full ver plate and coine scattered along the way here and there, as if were a baril laid to traile in a bootie. These circumstances reported, of purpose to wither their minds from covetous and greedie desire of pillage; set them on & kindled them the more. And the forrers had no sooner cried aloud, that unlesse the signall were given, they would set forward with our Commanders, but they had a captain straight at hand to lead them the way for immediate pursuit, and to found the march.

A march. Paulus who of himselfe made flow haſt, and perceived beſides that the birds in taking the Auſpice, approved not this enterpriſe, nor gave good tokens of happy ſpeed, gave order ſtraightwaies that his Colleague ſhould be advertiſed of the unluckie Auſpice; who, was readie now to ſet out of the gate with his ſtandard, and that in any wife he ſhould ſay. *V*herwith albeit Varro was not wel content, yet the late miſfortune of Flaminius, & the memorable overthrow at ſea of Claudius [ Pulcher*] Conſull, in the Punick war, wrought ſome ſcruple of conſcience and feare in his heart. But it was even the faire grace of the gods (if a man may ſo ſay) and nothing elſe, which put by and deſerred; rather than impeached and inhibited the danger and deſtruction that hung over the Romanes heads. For, as good hap was, it chaunced at the very inſtant, when the Conſull commanded the enſignes to be brought into the campe; & the ſoldiours would not obey him, that two ſlaves (who ſerved ſometime two horſemen; the one a Formian, and the other a Sidine, and who in the year when Servilius and Asilius were Conſuls, among other foragers were taken priſoners by the Numidians) made an eſcape and fled that day to their old maiſters againe. *V*who being brought before the Coſſ, advertiſed them conſtantly, that the whole armie of Anni- ball ſlay cloſe in embuſcado on the farther ſide of the mountaines. The coming of theſe bondſlaves to right and jump as they did, cauſed the ſouldiours to obey their Coſſ. *V*hereas the one of them, by his ambitious courting and ſeeking unto them at the firſt for a Conſulſhip; and afterwards, by his unſeemly indulgence and pleaſing of them, had loſt all his maiſtie and reputation among them. *A*n C *Anni*ball when hee ſaw that the Romanes rather began to ſtirre without adviſe, than ſtill to run raſhly on head to the full, and that his craftie deviſe was diſcloſed and tooke no effect, returne againe into his campe. *V*where, hee could not for want of come make abode many daies; and beſides, not onely ſouldiours (who were not all one mans children, but a mingle mangle and medley of all Nations) began daily to plot and enter into new deſignements, but alſo their captaine himſelfe was of many minds. For whereas they began with muttering and grumbling, and afterwards with open mouth, to demand and call for their due wages, complaining firſt of the death of victuals, and in the end, of meere hunger and famine: and withall a rumour ran, that the mercenarie ſouldiours, and the Spaniards eſpecially, were minded and intended to give him the ſlip, and to turne to the enemies; *Anni*ball likewiſe be thought himſelfe otherwhiles as it was ſaid, how he might ſlie into Gallia, but ſo, as he would leave his Infanterie behind him at ſixe and D ſeven, and ſo be gone with his Cavallerie alone. As men, I ſay, were thus plotting and deviſing in the campe, he reſolved at length to diſlodge from thence, and to remove into the hotter countries of Apulia, where the harveſt was more timely: conſidering withall, that the farther hee went from the enemies, his ſouldiours who were by nature light-headed and unconstant, would not ſo eaſily revolt and ſlie from him. So he tooke his way by night, and made fires likewiſe, & left a few tents ſtanding in ſight; that the Romanes, ſeering the like traines and ambuſh as before, might keepe in, and not ſtirre abroad. But when as the ſame Statilius the Lucine, having ſcoured all the coaſts, both beyond the campe, and the other ſide of the hills, and brought word, that he had diſcovered the enemies a farre off diſmarching, then began they the morrow after to thinke and conſult of making after him with hote purſuite. But albeit both Conſuls continued, as ever E before, the ſame men ſtill, that is to ſay, diverſly minded, and perſiſting in their ſeverall reſolutions; but ſo, as all in a manner accorded with Varro; and none agreed unto Paulus, but onely Servilius the Conſull of the former yeere: yet according to the opinion and counſell of the Major part, they went both together (for what might hold that which ſhall neceſſitie drive), to make Canna much renowned and famous for the noble overthrow and defeature of the Romanes. Neere this village *Anni*ball had encamped under the wind Pulturnus, and had it on his backe; which wind, when the fields are ſcorched and burnt with drought, is wont to bring with it clouds (as it were) of duſt. Which as it was good and commodious for the very campe it ſelfe; ſo it was like to ſerve in ſpeciall ſteed, when they ſhould range their battaile in order, and fight with the wind blowing on their backe, againſt the enemy, whoſe eyes the duſt was readie to put out, flying
The Conſuls having diligently ſearched the waies, and tried the paſſages ever before them, followed *Anni*ball hard, and ſo ſoone as they were come to Canna, had him in ſight: where they forſet two camps, of like diſtance almoſt aſunder, as at Gerion and devideid their forces like as before. The river Auſidius ran cloſe by both theſe camps, and yeelded waiting places a-cording as either of them had occasion and neede, but not without some skuffling and skirmish. But from the lesser camp, which lay on the farther side of Aufidus the Romanes had more libertie to water, because upon the farther banke there was planted no skence nor gard of the enimie. Anniball having possessed himselfe of a good plot of ground to his mind, commodious and meete for the service of horsemen (in which kind of forces he was invincible) ordred his battalions in array, and by putting out certaine Numidian light horse, made a bravado; and bad the Consuls battaile. And even then it fell out, that both the Roman camps were disquieted and troubled anew, what with the mutinie of the soldiours, and what with the disagreement and jarring of the Consuls; whiles Paulus laid hard unto Varro, and set before his eyes the rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; and Varro againe hit him home, and twit him with the example of Fabius, which made so goodly a shew in the eyes of feareful, idle, & cowardly captaines: both of them fell to protesting & calling God and man to witnesse, the one giving out, that the fault was not in him that Anniball was now Lord welcomer of all Italy already; and why? because himselfe was kept short and tyed fast enough by his colleague, and the soldiours whose hote blood was up, and who were eager of fight, had their weapons even plucked out of their hands: Aemilius on the other side complaining, that if ought should happen amisse, unto the Legions thus betrayed, and offered willfully and unconsiderately to the daunger of doubtful battaile, notwithstanding he were not blameworthy, but innocent altogether, yet should he be the first that smarted, and be partaker of the mischiefe and misfortune: and yet he would gladly see, whether they who were so readie and halfe of their tongue to speake, would be as nimble and active of their hands to fight, when the time came. Thus whiles they spend time in chopping logick, and quarrelling one with another, rather than in good and sober consultations, Anniball who had stood arraigned a good part of the day readie to fight, minding to retire his other forces into his camp, sent forth certaine Numidians out of the battaile to charge upon the Romanes on the other side of the river, who from the lesser camp went for water. These being a disordred and confused multitude, were not fully landed on the banke, but with the shout only and tumult of the Numidians they were discomfited and put to flight: whereupon the enimie rode further, even to the standing Corps de guard, quartered before the rampier, and hard at the very gares of the Roman campe. This was such an indignitie offered to the Romanes, to see themselves now thus braved and bearded even in the very camp by the auxiliarie souldiers, and the raskal sort of the enemies, that there was no other thing stayed the Romanes from passing the river presently, and embattailing themselves, but only this; that it was Paulus his turne that day to have the soveraigne command of all. And therefore the morrow after, when it came to Varro his course for to rule, without any advise of his companion, he put forth the signall of battaile, & with all his forces put in order of battaile, went over the river. Paulus also followed after him, as one who might well enough mislike and disallow the purpose of his colleague, but otherwise could neither will nor choose, but second him, & take part in the execution. Being once over the river, they joyned so the forces which they had in the smaller camp, unto the other: and in this manner they ordred the battaile. In the right point which was neerer to the river, was arrayed the Roman Cavalterie, and after them the footmen. The left point al without forth, was flanked with the horfemen of the associates: within forth stood their Infantry: but in the middle part were bestowed the archers and loose shot, close to the maine battaile of the Roman Legion; and of all the rest of light armed auxiliarie souldiours, consisted the vanguard. The Consuls led both the points, Temius the left, Aemilius the right, Cn. Servilius had the conduct of the maine battaile. Now Anniball by the breake of day, having sent before the Batane slingers, and his other light armour, passed over the river, and marshalled them in battaile away, ever as they came to land. The horse as well Gaules as Spanyards, he opposed in the left point, neere to the banke, even against the horfemen of the Romanes: the right consisted of the Numidian light horse, and the maine battaile was strengthened & fortified with his Infantry, but in such manner as the Affricanes flanked both in maer of wings: and betweene them were bestowed the Gaules and the Spanyards in the midst. A man that had seene the Affricanes, would have taken most of them for Romanes, so armed were they with Roman armour, gotten made off at Tybbis, but most of all at Thrafinus. The Frenchmen and Spanyards, had argues more of one fashion, but their weapons were unlike and farre differing. Those of the Gaules were very long and not pointed. But the Spanyards whose manner is rather to fight with the thrust and to joyn, than to slash and strike, edged long

A had handsome short cutlasses, and sharp at the point. And after this sort stood these two nations armed before the rest (terrible to behold, both for the bignesse of their persons, and also for their habite and attire.) The Gaules all from the navell upward naked: the Spanyards with linnen waistcoates or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordred and embroidered with purple and skarlet. The completer number of all, as well horse as footemen, that stood in battaile, amounted (as they report) unto fortie thousand foote, and ten thousand men of armes. These Captaines had the leading of the two points, to wit, Asdruball commanded the left, Maharball the right. Anniball himselfe in person with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battaile. The sunne shone sidewise upon the flanks both of the one and also of the other armie, very indifferent and commodious to both parts; were it that they were so placed and marshalled of set purpose, or chanced at adventure so to stand: the Romanes with their faces full South, the Carthaginians into the North. But the wind which the inhabitants of that countie call Vulturnus, arose and blew full up on the faces of the Romanes, and rayled such store of dust, and drove it so upon their eyes, that it took away their sight and prospect. The cry and shout began on both sides, and the Auxiliarie souldiours put themselves forth first to skirmish, and charged one another with their light shot. Then the left point of the Gaules and Spanish men of armes, encountered and ran full upon the right hand of the Romans Cavalterie, nothing at all after the order of horse service, for they were of necessity to affront one another straight forward, as having no rouble left about them to sling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and enclosed on the other with the battallion of footemen. Whereupon I say, they were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them, so long as their horses stood close and thrust together: but at length when they began to stir & winke, the riders, man to man, fell to rake hold and clasp one another, & every man to pluck his enimie besides his horse, so as now they were driven much what to fight on foot. This conflict was rather sharpe than long: and to be short, the Roman Cavalterie was discomfited and put to flight. And anon, as the horse made an end of their fight, began the medley of the foote also. At the first the Gaules and Spanyards equall to their enemies both in force and courage, maintained the conflict right hardily, and kept their order and array. At length the Romanes cast about and devised on what side, and with what forme of a close battailon, to force back that pointed squadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by so much the weaker, and bearing out withall, from the rest of the battaile. Now when they had once driven them to recule, and to give ground, the Romanes preased on still at one instant, and with the same violence perced through them as they fled for feare headlong, untill they were entered as far as to the very midst of the vanguard & maine battaile: and finding none able to stand in their way and make resistance, they gained in the end the very rereward of the Affricanes: who having drawn in from both sides their skirts and wings, stood together strong, and firmly kept their ground. The Gaules and Spanyards continued still in the midst, somewhat advanced without the rest of the battaile. Now when this pointed squadron was driven in by the Romanes, and made even & equal first with the front of the battaile, and afterwards upon further enforcement, gave way for them to passe in a lane through the midst thereof; by that time the Affricanes charged upon their flanks: and whiles the Romanes unwarily were engaged overfarre within them, they came about them on the skirts, & within a while having stretched out & spread their wings, inclosed the enemies round on their backs also. Hereupon the Romanes who had performed one battaile and conflict in vaine, were forced to give over the Gaules & Spanyards, whom they had disparayed and put to flight, and were to begin a fresh fight with the Affricanes: and that to their owne great disadvantage; not only because they being enclosed and pent up in a straight rouble, were to deale with them that had compassed them all about and were at libertie, but also because they being wearied, were to maintaine a new skirmish with those that were fresh in hart, and lustie. And now by this time, in the left point of the Romanes battaile, where the horfemen of their associates were marshalled to affront the Numidians, they were faine to close fight: which at the first these Numidians began but coldly and faintly, after the deceitfull manner of Carthaginians, into whose time they were sib and neere neighbours. For 500 of them or thereabout, having besides their usuall javelins & darts which they commonly cary, short daggers or skaines hidden under their cuirasse & harnesse, made semblance of riding away from their owne companies, & siding to the Romanes; with their bucklers at their backs, all of a sodain dismounted from their horses, and throwing their bucklers, targets, & speares at their enemies feet, were received within within the main battell, and from thence conducted to the hindmost in the rearward, were commaunded there to abide behind at their backs. And untill such time as the medley joined on all sides, they continued quiet. But when they saw every mans eye and mind busied and occupied in the conflict, then they caught up those bucklers that lay strewed and scattered among the dead bodies all abroad, and plaied upon the battell of the Romans from behind: and what with wound-ding their backs, and cutting their hamstrings, they made foule worke & carnage among them; and more than that, raised a greater feare and tumult by farre. Now when the Romans in one place were frighted and ran away, and in another fought for life, armed only with despair of all meanes to escape; Asdruball who had the charge of that side, caused the Numidian horsemen who fought but coldly with those that stood affront them, to be withdrawn from the mids of the battell, and sent them to pursue the enemies in the chase. And to the Affricaines overyearenon H with execution and killing, rather than with any other fight, hee joined the Gaulles and Spanish footmen to assist them. On the other side of the battell, Paulus, albein at the very high thicke and encounter, he was fore wounded with a bullet from out of a sling, yet oftentimes he made head against Anniball, and kept his battailons close and thicke together; yea, and in diverse places renued the medley, and evenmore the Roman horsemen guarded and protected him. But at the last they left their horses, because the Confull his strength failed him to rule his army, and to him. Whereupon there was one brought word unto Anniball, that the Confull had commanded his men of arms to light afoot. Then (quod Anniball, as the report goeth) Xea many! But how much gladder would I be if hee delivered them into my hands bound hand & foot. And surely the horsemen fought so after they were alighted, as if there had been no doubt, but that the enemies had the victorie. Howbeit, although they had the worke, yet they chose rather to die in the place, than to flie: and the Victours angled at the heart with them for thus having the accomplishment of the victorie, went downe with them, and killed outright all those whom they could not make to give ground and yeeld. And yet a few, such as were wearied with much toile & overcharged with many wounds they enforced to recule. Anon they were all disbanded and scattered afunder: and as many as could, recovered their horses, and fled away. Cn. Lentulus a Colonell seeing (as he rode by) the Confull sitting all agone bloud upon a stone. Ah L. Aemilius (quoth he) whom the gods ought of right to regard and save, as being the onely guiltlesse man, and innocent of this daies worke and unhappie overthrow, take here this horse of mine, while some yet gour and strength remaineth in you. Able I am to mount you upon him, to accompanie & secure you also. Come I say, and make not this battell more cursed, and sorrowful by the death of a Confull. Without it ywis we have cause ynough already, and too much, of dolorous teares and wofull lamentation. Whereunto the Confull made this answer: I con thee thanke, L. Cornelius Gra-mercie for thy kindnesse, and God blesse thee in this thy vertue and prowess. But take thou heed to thyselfe; least by thy foolish pitie of mee, thou loose that little time which thou hast to escape out of the hands of the enemies. Save thyselfe, and go thy waies to the L.L. of the Senat, and will them all from mee in generall, to fortifie the cite of Rome, and man it well with strong guards, before the enemy follow the traine of victorie, and come against it. But more particularly, let Q. Fabius understand, that L. Aemilius yet, was mindfull of his wholesome precepts, all the whiles he lived, and now also forgot them not at the houre of his death. And suffer thou me to yeeld unto nature, and let goe my last breath, even here among the heapes of mine owne slaie souldiours, that I may end my daies and die neither an accused and guiltie person, nor in my Confullship stand up to accuse my Colleague, and to defend mine owne innocencie, and justifie my selfe, by the blaming of another. As the Confull uttered these words, first the multitude of his owne citizens in the rout, and then the enemies in pursuit, ran over him, and not knowing who he was, overwhelmed him with javelins and darts good store. As for Lentulus, his horse carried him away to a little hill. Then they fled all amaine as fast as they could: 7000. recovered the lesser campe, and ten thousand the greater: and upon two thousand put themselves into the large it selte of Cannæ. But because it was an unvalled and fencelesse towne, they were immediately environned by Cartho and the horsemen; and so fortified every one. The other Confull made no semblance, that hee was offended or displeased with the companies that thus fled: were it of purpose, or as it chanced; and accompanied with fiftie men of armes, or thereabout escaped to Venusia. In this battell were slaine of Romans (by report) 40000. footmen, and 2700. horsemen; and in a manner, as many besides of Allies, as of naturall citizens. Among (whom there

A there was one Confull, two Treasurers, Attilius and Furius Bibaculus, one and twentie Colo-nells, some also who had ben Consuls, Pretors, and Ediles. Of which number was Cn. Servilius, and G. Minicius Numidius, who this yeere before had been Commander of the Cavallerie for some certaine daies. Besides eightie Senatours, or such as were Senatours fellows, & had borne those dignities in regard whereof they were to be chosen Senatours. These served as voluntaries and were enrolled among the Legions. There were taken prisoners at this field, as the generall speech went, thier thousand footmen, and three hundred men of Armes.
This is that noble battell, so famous for the overthrow at Cannæ, and comparable to that defecture at the river Allia. For like as this was of lesse importance than the other, in respect of that which ensued after the conflict, because the enemy staid his hand, and pursued not his victorie:
B. So if we consider the losse of men and defecture of the armie, it was the greater, & for the shame-full sight more dishonourable. For the running away that was at Allia, as it betrayed the cite, so it saved the armie; but at Cannæ, when the one Confull fled, there were scarce fiftie of his armie that accompanied him; and as for the other Confull, whiles hee lay a bleeding and dying, all his forces, to speake of, took their heales.
Now, there being a number in both camps halfe disarmed, and wholly without their cheefe Commanders, the captains of the greater camp, sent a messenger unto the other, willing them to come over thither, that they might march in one entire companie together, and depart to Cannusum in the night season, whiles their enemies were fast asleep; as partly wearied with long fight, and partly charged with wine and good cheate after their joyfull victorie. This advise, some there were that misliked altogether and rejected. For why (say they) might not they come hither themselves to us, as well as send for us, since we may as soon so join together? Because ywis, all the waies betwene are full of enemies; and they chose rather to hazard the bodies of others, than adventure their owne persons in so great danger. Others were not so much displeased for anie dislike of the motion, as their hearts failed them to take in hand the enterprise therof. Then spake C. P. Sempronius Tuditans a Colonell. And will yerather chose (quoth he) to be taken captive by a most covetous and cruell enemy? And to have your heads valued at a price? And that Chap-men comming to buy you in over-market, should aske every one of you this question, Whether art thou a Roman citizen, or a Latine Confederate? And so by thy disgrace, reproch, and miserie, another man shall get honour, and thy selfe none. Yet are not (I see well) like to Lucius D. Aemilius, who made choise to die valiantly, than to live in shame and obloquie; nor to many other so brave and hardie men, who lie about him dead on the ground by heaps. But before day light surprise us, and greater troupes of enemies beset the passages, let us breake through these; that in disorder and out of array, make so foule noise at our gates. The point of sword and edge of courage, is able to passe through enemies, stand they never so thicke and close together. We will make a pointed battailon in wedge-form, and pierce through their lose and thin squadrons, as easily as if nothing stood in purway. Go with me therefore as many of you, as are willing to save your selves & the Commonweale. The word was no sooner out of his mouth, but his sword was out of scabbard; and with a pointed battailon tooke his way through the mids of the enemies: and when the Numidians flanked them, and shot hard at their right side that lay open to them, they shifted their targuets to their right arme, and so escaped, to the number of 600. unto the bigger campe, and forthwith from thence, joining to the other greater companie, they returned themselves safe to Cannusum. These exploits were performed by men vanquished in more upon a present fit of courage, as each mans naturall instinct guided, or chance led him, than by any sage advise of their owne, or command of other.
Now, when all the rest came about Anniball, immediately upon this noble victorie, to congratulate and reioice with him, yea and to advise him, that after so great a battaille performed, he should the rest of that day, and the whole night following, both refresh himselfe, and also give rest and repose to his wearied souldiours: Mabarball, Generall of the Cavallerie, was of minde that it was no giving over thus; Nay (quoth he) that you may know of what consequence this bat-taille is, you shall breake your fast and eate your dinner five dayes hence in the Capitoll. Follow hardly with your horsemen, that they may see you are come, before they heare that you are coming. No, saith Anniball again, let curriers on Gods name go afore, and spare not to cary newes thereof. Your words are good, and it is a gay matter, and plausible you speake of: but the way thereto is longer, and more than I can presently conceive and comprehend. I con you thanke Mabarball

The speech of
P. Sempronius Tuditans, to his fellow souldiours.

Maharball, and I commend your good mind and forwardnesse; but we had need to deliberate and pause further upon this poynt. Ah (quoth Maharball) true it is, I see well, that God hath bestowed one man with all gifts. Thou hast the way & Anniball to win a victory; but not the grace to use a victorie. And certes, in this one daies delay, as it was certainly beleev'd, stood the safetie and preservation of the citie and Empire of Rome. The morrow after, so soone as ever the day beganne to appeare, they minded onely and intended the gathering of spoiles; and to view that great butchery & carnage: a pittifull & lamentable sight even to the very enemies to behold. So many thousand Romans lay there along in every place, horsemen and footmen pell mell, one with another, according as their hap was to meete together, and either to joyne in fight, or die in flight. Some were seen to arise up al bloudie front, out of the midst of the slaughter'd bodies, such, as the bitter morning cold had nipped their wounds, and made them to start up by reason of their smart, and were by the enemy knocked downe againe and killed. Other some they found lying along still alive; cut shorter by the thighs & hammes, who offered their bare neckes and throates to be cut, and called vnto them to let forth the rest of their blood. Divers were founde with their heads covered within the earth; who as it appeared, had made themselves holes & gutters in the ground, for this purpose, to inter themselves wherinto they thrust their mouthes and faces, and being buried with mould cast over them, were so stifled and choked. But above all the rest, there was one that drew every mans eye upon him, and made them all to wonder, a Numidian with his nose and eares pitiously mangled and cropt, but yet alive, lying under a Roman dead. For when his hands so wounded as they were, would not serve him to handle a weapon, for very anger hee fell raging mad, & lay (so long as he had any breath left within him) bying his enemy with his teeth.

After they had spent a good parte of the day in gathering spoiles, Anniball marched forward to assault the lesser campe: and first and foremost hee turned aside the arme of the river that flanked them, and so excluded them from the water. But they all within being overwearied with toyle, with watching and bleeding of their woundes, yielded sooner than he looked for: and covenanted, Imprimis, to deliver up their armour and horses: Item to pay 300 quadrigate peeces of silver, for every Roman: 200 for every one of the Allies, and every bondman 100 a peece. Item, that after this ranfome paid, they should depart in their single apparrell. Thus they received their enemies into the campe, and were themselves put all in ward: but Allies and citizens by themselves, apart one from the other. While they trised time there, there were about 4000 footemen, and two hundred horsemen, even as many as either their strength or harts would serve, who out of the greater campe fled to Cannusium, some marching in order, others scattering abroad over the fields, which was not the worse way of the twaine, and lesse safe. And then the campe was surrendered to the enemy, by those that were hurt and heartlesse, upon the same conditions that the other was. A rich boote was there gotten: and setting aside horses, and men, and silver, which they used much in trappings and caprisons of their horses, (for souldiers, be ye sure, occupied very litle silver, either in their owne apparrell, or at their boord) all the pillage was given to be rifled and ranfacked amongst them. Then he gaue commandement, that the dead bodies of his owne men should be gathered together for to be buried. And as men say, they were to the number of eight thousand; all right valiant and hardie men. Some Authors report, that the Roman Consull also was sought up and interred. As for those, which escaped to Cannusium, were by the Cannusines entertained onely within the walles, and lodged in their houses: but a noble Lady & a wealthie, named Bissa, relieved them with some victuall apparrell, yea and mony also in their purses for their wayfare. In regard of which bountifull liberalitie of hers, after the warre was finished, she was highly honored by the Senate of Rome.

Now, there were amongst them foure Coronels, namely Fabius Max. of the first Legion, whose father had bene Dictator the yeare before: & L. Publicius Bibulus, of the second Legion, together with P. Cornel. Scipio, and Appius Claudius Pulcher of the third Legion, who had bene Aedile but lately afore: and by general consent of them all, P. Scipio, a very young man, and M. Claudius, were chosen to bear the soveraigne rule; & to haue the absolute command & conduct of the armie. But as they sat with some few others, in counsaile together about the managing of their maine affaires, behold P. Furius Philus, whose father had bene a Consull, gaue them to understand, that all their consultations were in vaine, and that they did but foster and cherish

A chieftain a foolish hope of an overthrowne state: for the Common-weale was in a desperate case, past all cure, and remediesse. Also that certaine noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cecilius Metellus was the principall, minded nothing else but to take sea, & were readie to imbarke, to abandon Italie, and to flee for sicke cor to some king or other. This evill tydings as it was most grievous & heavie in it selfe, so falling out as it did, presently upon other misfortunes so suddainly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and astonished them all. And when they that were present in place laid their heads together, & thought good to call others to counsell upon this poynt, Scipio a young man, even then predestined to be the fatal Capitaine of this warre, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) it is no time now to sit consulting in so great extremitie, but leaving all discourses, presently to proceed to action; and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to save the Common-weale, take armes and goe with me, forthwith: for to what are our enemies (to say a truth) encamped against us more, than where such designements are plotting and contriving. Forth hee went with a few following after him, unto the lodging of Metellus: and finding there the young Gentlemen aforesaid, close together in counsaile thereabout: he drew his sword, and brandisht it naked over their heads, as they sat in consultation. I sweare before you all (quoth he) & I sweare from my very hart, & no man yet gethime thereto, that I for my part, will neither forsake the Common-weale, nor suffer any Citizen else of Rome to abandon her. And if I faile witting and willing, then confound mee & Scipio, & thou & L. Cecilius after me, as I have done. I advise thee: & yee all that are here present take the same oath: for whosoever shall refuse, knowe hee assuredly, that upon him I have drawne this sword. Hereat they being no lesse terrified, than if they had seene the Conquerour himselfe, Anniball in person, tooke the oath every one, and yielded themselves unto Scipio, for to be kept in ward to serve against Anniball.

At the same time, while these things were working at Cannusium, there arrived at Venusia, upon foure thousand foote and horsemen together, such as in their flight had bene disparted a funder all over the fields; and repaired unto the Consull there. The Venusines tooke order for them all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into severall hostes: & they bestowed upon the horsemen a side callock, a coat, & 25 Quadrigates a peece, and gave ten Quadrigates to every footman: and armour besides, to as many as wanted. And in all other courtesies of hospitallitie, both publike and private, they strove and endeavored, that the people of Venusia should not in any kinde offend friendly offices, come behinde one woman of Cannusium. Howbeit in regard of the great multitude, the burthen and charge lay more heavey upon Dame Bissa: for now their number was risen to be ten thousand. Then Appius and Scipio having intelligence, that the other Consull was alive and well, dispatched a messenger presently, to advertise him how many footmen and horsemen there were in all with them: and to know his pleasure withall, whether he would command the armie to be brought unto Venusia, or abide still at Cannusium. But Varro (the Consull) of his owne accord brought his forces to Cannusium: So as by this time, they made a prettie good shew of a Consular army, & seemed sufficient to defend themselves, if not by force of armes in the field, yet at least wile, with the strength of walles within the towne. But the newes came to Rome, that there was not so much as this small remnant left of Citizens and Confederates together; but that the two Consuls and both the armies were purall to the sword, and hewen in peeces to the last man. Never was there knowne so great terrour and tumulte within the wals of Rome, (and the citie still remaining in safety) but therfore even as first, sike under my lode & say nothing at all: & never will I go about to recount those things by discourse of words, which in reporting, I should make lesse than they were indeed. For they went not now, a flying nimour first of one foile, and then of another, to say of this losse, and to morrow of that, as they used before, when the Consull & his armie were defeated at Thrasymenus: but manifold overthrowes together were multiplied, all huddled one to another, how both the Consuls were slaine, and two Consular armies lost, and no campe nor pavilion of the Romans left standing: neither Leader nor Soldier remaining alive, and how Anniball was now become Lord of Apulia, of Samnium, and well nere of all Italie full & whole. And verily there is not I suppose a nation under the copie of heaven besides, but would have bene overwhelmed and crushed utterly under the huge heape and heavey waigh of so great a ruine and overthrow. Should I compare therewith the desolure and soile that the Carthaginians received ved at the Ilands Ægates, in a conflict at sea: wherewith they were so quelled, and their backs so broken, that at one clap they lost Sicilia and Sardinia both: and that which more is, yielded themselves tributaries and subjects to the people of Rome. Or should I make comparison of their unfortunate and unhappy battaile in Africke afterwards: wherein this very same Anniball gave over play, yielded the bucklers, and confessed himselfe vanquished. Nay, they are not any way comparable with this, but only that they were borne and supported with lesse courage, and valour of mind.

Well, to proceede, P. Furius Philus, and M. Pomponius the Pretours, assembled the Senate in the Court Hostilia, for to consult about the defence and guard of the citie: for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both defeated, the enimie would speedily come to assault Rome, the onely peece of worke, and warlike service that remained behind undone. But being to seeke what counsell to take, and what remedie to devise for redresse of these calamities, so exceeding great and grievous; and yet not knowne to the full, and interrupted and shrewdly troubled besides with the clamorous noyses and plaints of women: whiles that in every house almost, they ceased not to mourne, weepe, and waile confusedly, as well for the quick as the dead (because as yet it was not openly & for certain knowne who were alive, and who were slaine). Then Fabius Max. gave his opinion, that certaine light horsemen should be made out and sent forth by the highwaies Appia & Latina, & to ride along, & enquire of them whom they hapned to meeete with, (such I meane as fled, and were skattered here and there asunder) if happily some of them could report upon his knowledge, what was become of the Gonsuls; and the Armies: and in case the immortall gods had of their mercie and compassion spared some poore remnant still of this miserable and wofull empire, for the Roman name; where that residue of small forces was; what way Anniball tooke; and whither he was gone after the battaile was fought; what preparation he maketh, what presently he is doing, or intendeth for to do. His advise was, I say, that to espie, herken and learne certainly, these premises, certaine lustie young men; active and industrious, should be employed. But for the LL. of the Senate thus much; that considering there were few Magistrates at home, and those notable to rid the citie of this tumultuous and fearefull hurlyburly, therefore they should take upon themselves, to debate the dames and women for comming abroad; and force them every one to keepe home; and tarry within dores; to restraine the plaints and outcries of households and families; to cause silence throughout the citie; to take order that all Posts, and messengers of newes, should be brought before the Pretors; and that every man should attend at home the tidings, good or bad; that continued himselfe, or his owne state. Over and besides, that they should set warders at the gates; to see that no person went out of the citie: and compell every man, to hope for no other earthly safetie for themselves, but in the preservation of the citie; and walls thereof. And when the multitude and hurly is once hushed, then (quoth he) may the Senatours well be called againe into the Counsell house, and consult for the defence and safeguard of the citie. When all the assembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and went every man on Fabius his side without contradiction, so as the market place, by authoritie of the Magistrates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senatours were divided and gone sundrie wayes, to appeare at the uppers: then at last, came letters from T. Sempronius the Consul, importing that D. Acilius the Consul was slaine together with the armie: that himselfe was at Cannusum, busily rallying the reliques of so great an overthrow, as it were after a shipwrack upon the sea: that there were ten thousand souldiours of them, or very neere, and those much out of frame and good order. As for Anniball, he sat still now at Canna, busily occupied about the ransomings of prisoners; and intentive to the rest of the spoyle and pillage: not minding the victorie with the hind and courage of a conquerour, nor yet after the guile and manner of a noble warrior and great commander. Then were the private and particular losses also divulged and spread abroad through every man his house and familie; and the whole citie was so filled with sorrow and lamentation, that the Anniverarie solemnitie of sacrifices to Ceres was foreborne, because it was not lawfull for those that mourned to celebrate the same: and there was no daunce or mirth throughout the citie, but a still heavinesse and sorrow for the time: Least therefore other sacrifices likewise, as well publick as private, upon the same occasion, should be neglected and discontinued, these passed judgment of the Senate, by vertue whereof a tyme was prescribed, to make an end of mourning within certaine dayes. Now was the trouble of the citie no longer allayed, and the Senatours called againe

A into the Counsell house: but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicilie from T. Octavius the Vicepretor, notifying thus much, That the realme of Sicilie was much wasted by the Carthaginian navie: and when he would have succoured him at his earnest suite & petition; there was another Armado readie rigged, decked & furnished, riding by the Ilands Ægates, waiting the opportunitie of the time, that when the Carthaginians perceived once that he had turned and bent his forces to the defence of the coast and river of Saracole, they might immediately set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore, in case they were minded to aid and maintaine a confederate king, and defend the realme of Sicilie, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Consul and also of the Vice-Pretor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. Clandius, Admirall of the fleet, which rid in the harbour of Ostia, should bee sent unto the armie at Cannusum, and letters be dispatched withall unto the Consul, willing him upon the deliverie of the armie to the Pretour, to repaire unto Rome with all speed possible, and not faile, so farre forth as he might, without any detriment & hinderance of the Commonweale. Besides these so great losses and adversities, men were put in feare with sundrie prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one yeare, two Vestall virgins, Opimia, and Floronia, were detected and attainted of manifest whoredome: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Collina, the other killed herself. L. Cantilius (a Secretary or Scribe unto the Bishops, whom now they call Minors Pontifices) the partie who had committed fornication with Floronia, was by the chiefe or high Priest so beaten with rods in the Comitium, that he dyed under his hand. This heinous fact, and enormous offence falling out among so many misfortunes and calamities, was reckoned, I say (as usually it is) for a portentuous signe; and therefore the Decemvirs were commaunded to search and peruse the Bookes of Sibylla. And Q. Fabius Pictor was sent to Delphos, to consult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learne, by what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and what would be the end of so great and fearefull miseries. In the meane while, out of the learning contained in those bookes of destinies, there were performed certain extraordinary Sacrifices: among which a Frenchman together with a French woman; likewise a Grecian man and woman, were let downe alive in the Beast market into a vault under the ground, stoned all about: a place aforetime embrued and polluted with the blood of mankind sacrificed, but not according to the ceremonies and religion of the Romanes. When they had sufficiently (as they thought) pacified the gods, M. Claudius Marcellus sent from the haven of Ostia for the defense and guard of the citie, 1500 souldiours, whom he had levied and enrolled for the service at sea. Himselfe having sent afore the legion belonging to the Armad (which was the third) with T. Cneius Sulpicius a Coronell, and delivered the fleet unto P. Furius companion with him in commission: within few dayes after made hast, and with great journey arrived at Cannusum. At Rome, by vertue of the authoritie of the Senatours, M. Junius was created Dictatur, and T. Sempronius Generall of the horse, who proclaimed a muster; and enrolled all the younger fort above 17 yeares old, yea and some also under that age, that yet were in their Prætexta, and were not come to Toga virilis. Of these were made up foure legions: it was the upper garment that the Romanes children used untill they were fully 16 yeares of age, adorned with purple. Likewise they sent unto their Allies, and namely, to the Latine nation, to receive souldiours from thence according to the forme of the league: giving commaundement, that harness, weapons, and all other habiliments of warres, should be in readinesse. Also to furnish out the armie, they plucked from the temples, and publick galleries and walking places, the auncient spoiles and armour of their enemies. And for very neede and want of free men, they were compelled to devise a new kind of mustering never used before: for they bought up in market overt, with the citie money, 8000 lustie strong young men, neere bonds and slaves: but they demanded first of every one by himselfe, whether they were willing to serve in the warres, and so they put them in armour: And they thought it better to take up and levee souldiours thus, than to redeeme and buy againe their own who were captives, albeit they might have beene ransomed for smaller summes of money. For Anniball, after this so fortuneable field fought at Canna, setting his minde wholly upon the affaires belonging to an absolute conquest, rather than any more warres; caused his captives to be brought forth; and severed the Romanes confederates apart from the rest; and unto them (as he had done aforetime at Trebis, and the Lake Thrasymenus) hee spake graciously, and sent them home unransomed. The Romanes also hee called unto him, and gave them kind and loving words, more than ever

M. Iunius to the

ever hee had done before. What? wee and the Romanes (quoth hee) waire not mortally and deadly one with the other to the utterance: nay, our quarrell is rather for honour and soveraintie. And as my father and progenitors afore me, were subdued of the Romanes, & yielded at length to their valour and prowesse: so the onely thing that I seeke for, & indevor unto is this; That they likewise in their alternative turne, may give place unto my felicitie and vertue together. And therefore I graunt the Romanes this favor and libertie, to redeeme their prisoners: and this shall be the ranfome, for every man of armes I demand *500 Quadrigates, 300 for a footman; and 100 for a bondman. And albeit the horsemens ranfome was somewhat enhaunsed, above that summe which they capitulated for, when they yielded, yet glad they were to accept of any condition & covenant whatsoever. So it was agreed, that tenne out of them should bee chosen by voices, to goe to Rome unto the Senate: and he tooke no other pledge for assurance of them but their oth, that they would returne again. With them was sent Carthalo, a Nobleman of Carthage, with commission (if he could perceive haply the Romanes incline to peace) to offer unto them conditions, and to capitulate with them. They were not so soone gone out of the campe, but one of them (a man of no Romane nature and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten somewhat behind him, and so, to discharge himselfe (forsooth) of his oth, returned into the campe, and before night overtook his companie againe. When word was brought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Licor sent out to meet Carthalo upon the way, and to warne him in the name of the Dictatour, before night to depart out of the confines of the territorie of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience graunted them in the Senat house by the Dictatour. And the principall man among them, Marcus Iunius, spake in this manner.

Right honourable, and my very good L.L. of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant, that never any citie whatsoever, hath bene at lesse charge for redeeming of prisoners taken in warres, and made so small regard of them, than ours. But if wee be not blinded in our owne conceits, & think better of our cause, than there is reason; never were there any soldiours that fell into the hands of our enemies, more to be accounted of by you than we are. And why? VVe yielded not our weapons in battell for cowardise and feare, but after that wee had stood welneere untill night, fighting over the dead bodies of our fellowes slaine, and so maintained the medley to the very last, then we retired our selves into the campe. Therest of the day, and the night following, notwithstanding we were wearie with travell, and faint of our hurts, yet wee manfully defended our rampier. The morrow after, when we were beset and invested round about by the conquerors armie, yea, and excluded from water; and saw no other hope at all to breake through our enemies, raunged so strong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproofe; & against the law of armes, that when 50000 of our citizens were slaine in field; some Romane soldiours should remaine alive after the battell of Cannæ; then and not afore, we agreed upon a summe of monie, that being ranfomed, we might bee set at large, and so we yielded unto the enemies our weapons, wherein now we saw no helpe at all. VVe have heard likewise, that our aunccestors redeemed themselves from the Gauls with a summe of gold: and our fathers also, notwithstanding they were most streight laced, and hardly brought to capitular and compound for peace, yet sent Embassadours to Tarentum, for to redeeme their captives: and both those battailes, first in lie with the Gauls, and then before Heraclea with Pyrrhus, were not so ignominious and shameful full for the losse it selfe, as for the fright and beastly running away. But the plaines of Cannæ are coveted all over with heapes of Romane bodies; and we that bee here, had not remained alive after them, but that the enemies strength held out no longer, nor their sword would serve to kill any more. And yet there bee some of our men also, who fled not backe in battell: but being left behind to guard the campe, were taken prisoners by the enemies as well as we, at what time as it was surrendered into their hands. Certes, I envie not the fortune, nor repine at the welfare and good estate of any citizen or fellow soldiour, neither would I be thought the man, who by debasing another, would seeme to advance my selfe. But even they verily (unless peradventure good footmanship and swift running deserve reward) who for the most part fled out of the field unarmed, and never flinted before they gat Venusia or Cannusium over their heads, cannot justly preferre themselves before us, nor boast and glorie, that they stand the Commonweale in better stead than we. Find them you shall (I doubt not) good men & valourous soldiours: so shall you too, yea, and more readie to do true service to our countie, in that by your bountie and good means

A we have been ranfomed and restored again into our countie. Yee have levied souldiours of all ages and degrees, and I heare say, there be 8000 bondmen in armes. VVe are no fewer in number our selves, and redeemed we may be with as small monies as they are bought. I say no more but so, for if I should make farther comparisons betwene us and them, I must doe wrong to the Romane name and nation. This is a speciall thing moreover (my L.L.) which in mine advise yee are duly to consider in this deliberation, in case yee be so hard-hearted, as to have no regard of us, or of our desert, namely, in what enemies hand ye leave us. It is with Pyrrhus peradventure, who used us being his prisoners, like friends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Carthaginian? who whether he bee more covetous or cruell, can hardly bee imagined. O that yee saw the yrons and chains, the nasty filthinesse and foule usage of your citizens. I am assured, you would be no lesse moved and affected to compassion at the sight thereof, than if yee beheld on the other side your Legions lying slaine all over the plaines and fields of Cannæ. Yee may observe and behold the sorrowfull cheare, and salt teares of our kinsfolke, standing here in the porch and entrie of this Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they so fare, & are so pensive for us, and for them that are absent, what heavie hearts have they themselves (thinke ye) whose libertie and whose life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Annibal himselfe would, contrarie to his nature, be respective and mercifull to us, yet should we thinke our lives did us small good, so long as we are reputed of you unworthie to be ranfomed & redeemed. There returned in times past to Rome certaine captives, sent home by Pyrrhus without any ranfome paid, but they returned accompanied with Embassadours, right honourable personages of this citie, who had bene sent for their redemption. And shall I returne unto my countie againe, not esteemed a citizen worth 300 Deniers. Every man hath a mind by himselfe, and a fanisie of his owne my L.L. And I wrote well, that my bodie and life is in jeopardy. But I feare more the hazard of honor & good name, least we should be thought condemned and rejected by you. For the world will never beleieve, that you did it to spare your purse, and to save monie.

When he had made an end of his speech, immediately the multitude who were gathered together in the common place, set up a lamentable and piteous crie, & held out their hands unto the counsell house, beseeching the L.L. of the Senate to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinsfolke againe. The very women also, for feare and necessitie, thrust themselves among this prease of men in the market place. But when all others besides the Senatours were voided, they began to debate and consult about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in opinion. Some thought it reason, that their ranfome were disbursed out of the common chest: others were of mind, that the citie should bee at no charge at all for their redemption: marry they would not be against it, but that they might be enlarged and delivered at their owne cost and expences. And in case there were any that had not readie coine ynough for present payment, the chamber of the citie should lend them monie, so as the people might have good securitie, as well by sureties bound, as by their goods and lands, morgaged for the satisfaction of that debt. And when T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of the old world for precise severitie, and as most folke thought too too hard and austere in this point, was demanded his opinion, hee spake by report, to the cause in this wise.

E If the Committees (quoth he) had treated and made suit, for the redemption of them onely that are captive in the hands of the enemies, & there staid; if they had not touched the person of any other besides. I would in few words have knit up my verdict and judgement of them. For what need I to have done els, but put you in mind, and exhort you, to observe the custome delivered unto you from your aunccestors, and to maintaine the example, so good and necessarie for the service of warre. But now, seeing they have not onely justified, but also (as it were) glorified themselves, in that they yielded unto the enemies, and thought their good reason to bee preferred, not onely before them that were taken prisoners by the enemies in the field, but also those that saved themselves, and escaped to Venusia and Cannusium; yea, and before C. Terentius himselfe the Consul; I will not hide any thing from you my L.L. but acquaint you with every thing that was done there. And would to God, that the words which I will utter here in your presence, I might deliver at Cannusium, even before the bodie of the armie, the best witness of every mans cowardise or valour: or at leastwise, that P. Sempronius were present here alone, whome, if these fellows would have followed as their leader, they had been souldiours at this day in the Romane campe, and not captives at the devotion of the enemies. For whiles the enemies were wearied

with fight, joyous and jocund of their fresh victorie; and most of them retired into their owne camp; they might have had the whole night to save themselves at their pleasure: & if that were not, yet being seven thousand strong, they had bene able to have made a lane through them; were they never so thick, & to have broken away in despite of their harts. But neither attempted they so much of themselves, nor yet would follow the leading of another. P. Sempronius Tuditanus ceased not all night long almost, to exhort, to admonish, and encourage them; for to follow his conduct, to take the time when but a few of the enemies were about their campe, while they were at repose and rest, and while the night lasted favourable vnto them; for to hide and cover their enterprize: persuading with them, that before day light they might easily reach unto places of securitie, and arrive safely at the cities of their Allies. Like as in the daies of our Grandfathers, P. Decius a Tribune Colonell in Samnium; like as of late time when I was a young man my selfe, in the first punick warre, Calpurnius Flamma said unto three hundred his voluntarie fouldiers, at what time as he minded to lead them to the gaining of a little hill, standing in the mids of his chemies: Let us die hardly my fouldiers, and by our death save and deliver our Legions, beset and besieged round about. If P. Sempronius had said so much to you, he would never haue esteemed you men of valour, nor yet Romanes, if no man among you would haue borne him company, or seconded him in that singular vertue. But he shewed you a plaine and easie way, leading as well to life and safetie, as to honour and glory. He offered himselfe to be your guide, to bring you to your native countrie, to your parents, your wives and children: yet would not your hearts serve you to escape and save your selves. Where had your hearts benethen, if he would have had you to die for your countrie? 50000 of our Citizens and confederates, lay that very day flaine at your feete. If so many examples of manhood and vertue could not move you, nothing in the world will ever move you: if so great a foile and overthrow was not able to make you despise and set litle by this life; none will ever do it. Desire home a Gods name, and long after your native countrie, whiles yee are free and in safetie may, desire to be in your countrie, whiles it is your countrie, and whiles yee are Citizens thereof. Now your desire and longing commeth too late, being disfranchised, having lost your former estate and right of Citizens, and made your selves bondslaves to the Carthaginians. Think yee for a peece of money to recover your libertie againe, and to returne to your former degree, from which through faintheartednesse and cowardise yee are fallen? You would not hearken nor give care to P. Sempronius your Citizen, willing you take weapon in hand, and to follow after him: but anon after, yee could listen after Anniball, commanding you to betray and render the campe, and deliver up your armour. But why blame I their lithernesse and dastardly feare, when I may reprove and accuse them for wilfull and lewd wickednesse? For they not onely refused to be ruled by his good counsaile and exhortations, but also attempted to hinder and stay him in his intended enterprize, had not right hardie and valiant men with their swords drawne, set these dastardly beastes farther off. P. Sempronius, I tell you, had somewhat a do; to passe the ranks and squadrons of his own countriemen, before he could break through the battailon of his chemies. Longeth our countrie to have these for her citizens? who if the rest had bene like them, should by this day, have had never a one of them that fought at Cannae, for her citizens. Of seven thousand armed fouldiours, there were found 600 that had the heart to breake way, malgre the enemies, to escape and returne with libertie, and with their armour home into their countrie, notwithstanding there were fortie thousand enemies to resist them: how easily they, and safely, deeme you, might a power almost of two Legions, have passed through them, and gon their waies? Yee had had this day my Lords twenty thousand at Cannisium, of right brave, hardie, and loyall fouldiours. But now, which way can these lukes possible be reputed true and faithfull citizens, (for valiant fouldiours, I am sure, they will not thinke themselves, nor take upon them to bee, unless a man could bee persuaded and beleve they were such) who would have impeached and withstood the rest for getting away, even when they were at the point to open a passage? or that they rather do not envie now, both the safetie & also the honor of others, which they have woon by prowesse; knowing in their owne conscience, that their timorousnesse and cowardinesse was the cause of most ignominious and shamefull servitude. They loved better to close within their pavilions, and to looke for the day-light and the enemy together, when as in the still dead time of the night, they had the opportunitie to escape. But how then? Although their hearts failed them to breake away out of the campe, yet to defend the same manfully fully, they durst charge and labour enough. Besieged they were, and streightly beleaguered: in which they were day and night for a good time, and in their armour forced to stand upon their arms, and humbly they put themselves within their rampires, and at length (God woe) when they had rayed & endured all extremities, when all succours failed them for sustentation of their life, to breake with hunger and so enfeebled, that they were not able to beare their own armour and lift up their weapons; overcame at the last rather with the necessities of mans frail nature, than by the violence of the enemies they, good men, gave over and yielded them selves. Nay forsooth, it is neither so nor so. The morning when the Hanniballites, the enemies, approached toward the rampire, and within two houres after, without any tumult or tumult of skirmish, they delivered up their weapons and themselves, 50000 or so what. Anniball received them for two daies together. When they should have stood to in the field, he sought, and they fled backe to their tents: when they were to guard & defend their campe, and rampire, they attended them to meet the enemy, who had no other quarter in battail nor in battail. He agreed to ransom you, you say, when you ought to have suffered forth of the campe, finger behind ear, and saynall: & when need was to be aided by hand to defend, like valiant men, surrender campe, give up your weapons, and yield your owne bodies to the enemy. Nay, but to speake what I thinke, my sentence is, my Iudgement these shewes deserve no more to be ransomed, than those to be delivered unto Anniball, who issued out of the campe, pearced through the mids of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves, for to do service another day in their countrie. When Manlius had said, albeit the prisoners were allied neere in kindred to most of the Senators, yet overlaid besides the precedent of the citie itselfe, which never from the first beginning favored the redemption of such fouldiers, he stirred themselves to be taken prisoners: the ransome it selfe, which amounted to a good round summe, made them to pause: because they were unwilling both to empty the publicke treasure, having already disbursed great summes in buying up bond-slaves and arming them for the warres) and also that Anniball (who as the voyce went) was at a very great under for money) should be enriched thereby. When this their answer was returned, to wit, No redemption of captives: there was a newe fit of weeping and wailing afresh added to the former sorrow of the people, namely for the losse of so many Citizens: and so with many a teare that they shed, with sundrie plaints & mones which they made, they accompanied the Committees above said, as far as the gate. One of the ten went home to his house the same time, who upon a fraudulent and carelesse returne made into the enemies campe, as is aforesaid, supposed he had acquitted himselfe and disburdened his conscience of his oath. Which being knowne and recounted to the Senate, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and sufficient guard at the charge of the citie, and so carried backe to Anniball. There goeth another report of these captives, that first there came ten of them as Committees: and when it was debated in the Senate, and doubt made, whether they should be admitted into the citie or no; they were at length received, but so, as that they had no audience in the Senate: and upon longer stay made than they looked for, three others followed after them, to wit, L. Scribonius, C. Calpurnius, and L. Manlius. Then by mediation of one Tribune of the Com, a kinsman of Scribonius, the matter was propounded in the Senate concerning the ransome of the captives, but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Anniball, and the other ten that first came, remained stil behind, who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand backe to Anniball, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note forsooth of the names of the prisoners, and thereby seemed to have discharged their conscience of the oath. Also, that in the Senate there was hard hold much question and variance, about the delivering of them againe into the hands of Anniball: and how at last, they who were of opinion to have them rendred and sent backe, failed of their purpose, by reason they came short by some voyces and opinions, and that the other side carried it cleane away. But by the next Censors that came in place, they were so marked & branded, with all notes of disgrace and shame, that some of them immediately made themselves away with their owne hands: and the rest forbore, not onely the common place and market all their life time after, but also came not abroad in manner, to be seen in the very streete, and never looked out of their doores. Thus a man may rather marvelle, that authors should so differ among themselves, than from any of them picke out and discerne the truth. But how much greater this overthrow and losse at Cannae was, than any other before time, appeareth by this evident argument, in that those Allies, which ever to that day stood fast and sure unto them, now fell to shrink and faile: and surely for no earthly thing else, but because they began to despair of the maine chaunce of the whole State and Empire. For first upon this revolted unto the Carthaginians, the Attellanes, the Calabres, the Hirpines, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnites, except the Petellines, all the Brutii in general, and the Lucanes. And more than these, the Surrentines, and the whole tract well peopled, of the Greeks along the sea coast. The Tarentines, Metapontines, the Crotonians, the Locrians, and all the Gaules within the Alpes. And yet for all these defections, and rebellions of their Allies and subjects, were not the Romans one whit inclined to make any mention of peace, neither before the coming of the Consull, nor yet after that hee was returned, and retired againe the dolorous remembrance of that wofull overthrow received. And even at that very instant, so high-minded was the cittie, and so farre from drooping and being cast downe, that as the Consull returned homeward from so great a defeat, whereof himselfe only was a private pall, hee was not onely met upon the way by all the States, and companies of the cittie in great numbers, but also highly thanked, for that hee, despairing not of the State of the Commonweale: who, if hee had been the Generall and Leader of the Carthaginians, should have beene sure to have smoked for it, and endured all extremities of torment and punishment.

THE XXIII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the three and twentieth Booke.

HE Campanes revolted unto Anniball. Mago was sent to Carthage, with newes of the Florie at Canne: and in the entrie of the Counsell house, he poured out (on the floor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romanes there slaine, which by report exceeded the measure of a Modius. Upon these tidings, Hannibal the noblest personage among all the Carthaginians, persuaded with the Senat of Carthage, to give unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by reason of the Barchine side and faction that gave said him. Cl. M. acellus the Pretour, fought fortunately before Nola, in a little while, he made out of the towne against Anniball. The Armie of Anniball fell in riot at Capua, and gave themselves to such sensualitie, while they wintered there, that both in bodily strength, and also in courage of mind they became much enfeebled. Cassilinum was besieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven to extreme famine, so that thongs and leatherns, plucked from off their shields and targets, were used to feede upon, and rats. They lived with nuts which the Romanes sent into them downe the river Vulturnus. The vidue of the Senat was replenished by receiving unto them a new supplie from out of the order of knights or gentlemen, to the number of 197. L. Posthumius the Pretour, was together with his armie defeated by the Gaules and put to the sword. C. Marius and Publius Scipiones, vanquished Asdruball in Spain, and had the conquest thereof. The remnants of the Armie defeated at Canne was sent away and confined into Sicilie, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finished. A league and societie was concluded betwene Philip the king of the Macedonians and Anniball. Symplicius Gracchus the Consull, discomfited and slue the Campanes. Moreover, this booke containeth the fortunate exploits achieved by T. Manlius the lord Deputie in Sardinia, against the Carthaginians and the Sardi, who had the Generall himselfe Asdruball, together with Mago and Hanno, prisoners. Claudius M. acellus the Pretour, was vanquished and defeated in a set battaile before Nola by the Armie of Anniball: and was the first that put the Romanes some good hope of better successe, after they had beene taunted with so many foies and losses.

Aniball after the battaile fought at Canne, & the winning and ransacking of both the Roman camps, dislodged anone, and was removed out of Apulia into Samnium, being sent unto, for to come unto the Hirpines countrey by Statius, who promised to betray and deliver the cittie of Consa into his hands. Now there was a citizen of Consa, named Trebius, a noble personage, and of great name in his countrey. But the bend and faction of the Cossages (a familie of great power, by favour of the Romanes) kept him downe and overweighed him: but after the same of the battaile of Canne, and the coming of Anniball, divulged and blowne abroad by the speeches of Trebius, those Cossages abandoned the cittie: and so was it without any conflict rendered unto the Carthaginians, and received a garrison. Anniball leaving behind him there, all the pillage and baggage that he had, divided his armie into two parts: giving Mago in charge, to possesse himselfe of the townes of that countrey, which would revolt of themselves from the Romanes: or else to force them thereunto, in case they denied and refused so to doe. Himselfe tooke his journey through the land of Campaine, toward the nether sea, intending to assault Naples, that he might bee lord of a port towne also, and have it at his devotion. When hee was entered the confines of the Neapolitanes, hee placed some of the Numidians in ambush, as cunningly as he could, (and therefore for the most part, the waies are hollow, and full of close and secret noukes and holes) others he commaunded to make a shew of driving a bootie out of the fields, and to ride out braving before the gates of the cittie. Against whom (seeming to bee not many, and those disordered) a troupe of horsemen issued forth, but the enemies of purpose giving back and retiring from them, killed and trained them on to the place of ambush: and so they were environned on every side, and there had not one of them escaped alive, but that the sea was neere, where they espied many sither boates along the shoare on the bancke side, and as many of them as were skilfull in swimming, gat unto them, and saved themselves: but in that skirmish nevertheless certaine young gentlemen were slaine. Among whome, Heges also, the Captaine of that Comst of horsemen died in the place, who followed too hotely upon them that reculed and seemed to flie. But Anniball after he had viewed the wals, and saw they were not easie to be woon, was discouraged and scared from giving assault to that cittie. From thence he turned his journey, and took his way to Capua, a cittie flowing in wealth and superfluitie of all pleasures, by reason of long felicitie, and the favourable aspect of gracious fortune. But among all corruptions that there reigned, it was infected most with the licentious loosenesse of the Commons, who exceeded beyond all measure, and abused their libertie. Publius Calpurnius, a man of noble race there, and popular with all, but one that by lewd & indirect courses became rich & mightie, by means thereof had both Senat and Com. under his girdle, & might do what he would. This man chanced to be head Magistrat the same year that the Romanes were defeated & overthrowen at the Lake Thrasymenus: & supposing that the Communitie (who had ben a long time maliciously affected to the Senat and Nobilitie) would by occasion of alteration in the State, enterprise some notable act to wit (in case Anniball should come with his victorious armie into those parts) the murdering of the Senat, and delivering of Capua into the Carthaginians hands. This man I say, lewd and bad enough otherwise, but yet not sturke naught, and wicked in the highest degree: and desirous to lord it, and dominiere with the safetie of the Commonwealt, rather than with the utter destruction of the same, as knowing full well, that no state could remaine safe, spoiled and bereft once of a publicke counsell, cast about and plotted, how he might both save the Senat, and also oblige the same to be at his, and the Commons devotion. He assembled therefore the Senat one day together, and after he had proffered with a solemne preamble, That in no case hee would like and allow of the disengagement and intent of revolting from the Romanes, unless it were upon necessity and constraint: for as much as himselfe had married the daughter of Appius Claudius, and had faire issue by her: and besides, affianced a daughter of his own in marriage unto Livius in Rome: but yet (quoth he) there is a matter of greater consequence toward, and a danger like to burst out more to be feared than that. For the Commons intend not by way of revolt, and rebellion to rid the cittie of the Senators authoritie, but are purposed to massacre all the Senators, and so to deliver unto Anniball and the Carthaginians, the Commonwealt, clearly void of a Senat. Of which imminent perill (quoth he) I know how to free you, in case you will wholly trust and rely upon me, and forget all former jarres, and old debates, which have fallen out in governance and managing of the State. Now when all of them in place, for feare were forced to put themselves into his hands: I will quoth he shut you up within this counsell-chamber, and pretend unto them, as though I were one of their complices, both privie and partie to this intended practise of theirs: and so by soothing them up, under a colourable approbation and allowance of their designements, which I should in vaine crosse and gaine say, I shall find out a ready way to save all your lives: And for assurance hereof, aske and have of me what bond and securitie yee will your selves. Thus having made his faithfull promise to be fast and true unto them, he went forth, and commaunded the Counsell-house doores to be shut sure, and left warders to keepe the gate and entrie thereof, that no man without his licence and commandement, should either enter in, or come forth. Then after he had called all the people together to an audience, in a solemne and frequent assembly, thus he spake unto them: That which ye have often wished for (O ye Campanes, my good neighbours and friends) namely, to have the power and meane to revenge your selves throughly of this wicked and cursed Senate, nowlieth in your hands to performe with safetie at your pleasure. And ye neede not by way of an uprore to assault their houses one after another, to the great danger and hazard of your persons, considering how they are defended with strong gards of their vassals, favorites, and bond-slaves: ye have them all fast and close mued up within the counsell chamber: themselves alone, without companie, without armour & weapon; there you may take them. But see that ye do nothing hastily upon head without pause, nor rashly without adviement. I will so compass and bring about, that ye shall give your doome of life and death upon every one of them; to the end that each one may have his desert, and suffer due punishment accordingly. But above all things ye must have an eye and looke to this, that ye proceede not too much in heate and choler: but that ye have more regard of your owne safetie and profite, than of yre and revenge. For (I take it) they be these Senatours onely whose persons ye hate and detest; and your meaning is not wholly to put downe & overthrow the Senat quite: for either ye must accept of a King, (oh government abominable) or else admit a Senate, the onely counsell in deede of a free citie and State: and therefore with one bush (as they say) ye are to stop two gaps, and to do both at once, namely, to abolish and depose the old Senate, and to elect a new. I will commaund, that the Senatours shall be cited by name one after another: and concerning their life and death, I will demand your opinion and resolute sentence: and looke what judgement ye give, shall surely stand and be put in execution. But before the condemned guiltie person be done to death, ye shall substitute in his rounge a new Senatour, some good man of valour and courage, and worthy to succede him in his place. With that, he sate him downe. And after all their names were throwne into a lotterie pitcher and shuffled together, he caused him to be cited and called aloud by name, and the man himselfe to be brought forth of the counsell house whose name chanced to be drawne out first. He was no sooner named, but every man cryed out, that he was a lowd and wicked person, and worthy to be hanged. Then Picuvius sayd, I see (quoth he) what destinie ye rede this man. Rejected he is, and cast out for naught and unjust: choose now a good Senatour, and a righteous in his rounge. At the first, all was silent, and as still as midnight, for default of finding a better to place in his stead. Afterwards, when some odde groome past all shame and reverence, seemed to nominate one: by and by they grew to much lower words and greater clamours: while some sayd flatly they knew not the man; others laid to his charge sundrie lowd and naughtie vices, and objected against him either object of basenesse, poverie and beggary, or else some dishonest kinde of trade and occupation, whereby hee lived. Thus sared they a much worse a good deale, when a second or third Senatour was named: so as it was well seene, that the men bethought themselves and repented of that they had done already, considering how they failed still and were to fecke, when they should substitute another in his place: for as much as it booteth not, but was absurd to nominate the same againe, since that their nomination gained them nothing, but either to heare their vices decyphred, or to beare reproachfull tearmes: and as for all the rest, they were farre more vile and obnoxious persons than those that came first into their remembrance, and were soonest thought upon. So the people fell at length, and gently came downe to this point, and confessed, that much better was bad they knew, than bad they knew not; and seldome came the better: willing the old Senatours to be let out of ward and enlarged. By this pollicie Picuvius having bound the Senate

A. nate to himselfe, more than to the Commons, and even as much as their life was worth; without force of armes ruled the royst, and all was at his devotion and commaund. Hereupon, the Senatours laid aside the remembrance of their owne dignitie, port, and libertie, became affable to the Commons, & would salute them kindly: inviting them courteously, and interteining them liberally at their boards, with exquisite and delicate fare: undertaking and maintaining all their suites and causes: ready at all times to assist them and stand by them: and in one word, empanalling Iuries (to go upon all causes & matters in law) of those whom they knew to be gracious and popular, and fitter to winne and procure the favour and affection of the common sort. Thus at the Counsell-table all matters were decided, as if the Commons had there sat, and not otherwise.

B. This Capua was a citie ever given to dissolute life & excesse in pleasure, as well by reason of the naturall corruption and infer disposition of the Inhabitants, as also for the plenteous & flowing abundance of all delights; and the alluring inticements of all dainties, that either sea or land might afford. But at that time (such was the obsequious fawning and flatterie of the Nobles, such was the licentious living of the Commons) they were so lavish, that they exceeded in lust and superfluitie beyond measure, and laid it on in expense without stay. Besides their contempt of Lawes, Magistrates, and Senate, they grew to this passe after the overthrow at Cannae, that whereas before, they had some awfull and reverent regard of the Romanes, now they despised and set naught by the government and Empire of Rome. And nothing else stood in the way, but that presently they would have rejected their rule, and shaken off the yoke of obedience

C. and allegiance, saving onely this, That by reason of ancient entercourse of crosse and mutuall marriages, many noble houles and mightie families were linked and allied to the Romanes: and againe, which was the greatest bond of all, whereas there had served in the Romane warres, certaine of them: there were three hundred men of armes, and those of noblest birth of all the Campanes, chosen out of them: and sent by the Romanes to bee resiant in sundrie garrisons of the cities of Sicilie: whose fathers and kinsfolke (with much ado) obtained, that Embassadors should be sent unto the Consull of Rome: They found the Consull at Venusium with a few souldiours, and those armed by the halves (for as yet hee was not gone to Cannusium) being in that poore taking and hard plight, as he could not be in worse; either to move pittie in the hearts of true and well affected allies, or to breed contempt in proud and hollow-hearted friends, such

D. as these Campanes were. Contempible was their case, but the Consull made himselfe & his condition more despised, by bewraying too much his present distresse, and laying open to the world the nakednesse of his calamitie. For when the Embassadors delivered unto him, That the Senat and people of Capua tooke it to the heart, and greatly grieved at the adverse overthrow of the Romanes; and promised therewith, to furnish him with all things fit and meet for war: Ye have (quoth he) O Campanes, observed an order & custome, and for form and fashion visited us your confederates, in willing us to require at your hands all supplements of warre; rather than said any thing directly bestirring the present estate of our fortunes. For what have wee left us at all, after this discomfiture of Cannae, that wee should bee willing to have that supplied by our allies, which is wanting? as who would say, wee had somewhat already. Should we demand of

E. you footemen, as though wee were furnished with horse? Should wee say that we lacked mony, as if mony only were wanting, and nothing else? No, no, Fortune hath dealt so hardly with us, that shee hath left us just nothing, nor so much as that, which might bee made up and supplied by others. Our Legions of footmen, our Comets of horse, our armour and munition, our Standards and Ensignes, horse and man, monie and victuals: all is gone; lost and perished; either in the battaile, or the morrow after in the ruine of our campe, when we were turned out of our tents and pavilions. And therefore yee are not, O Campanes, to aid and helpe us in this warre; but in our behalfe; and for us; yee ought to take the whole charge of the warre upon your owne selves, against the Carthaginians. Call to remembrance how in times past, when your auncelsters and forefathers were fearefully driven to keepe within your walles, standing in dread and bodily feare, not of the Samnites onely your enemies, but also of the Sidicines: wee took them into our protection, and defended them before Satricula: and how for your sakes we began warre with the Samnites, and maintained the same for the space almost of an hundred year, and in great varietie of fortune, giving and taking sundrie foiles all the while. Over and besides, call to minde, how wee concluded an indifferent and equall league with you, to the dis-

bassadors of Capua.

advantage of neither parts: how wee graunted unto you the libertie of living under our owne lawes: and how at the last (a matter ywis of right great importance and consequence, before this our late overthrowe at Cannæ) wee graunted unto a great part of you, the freedome & privilege of Bourgeoisie, and parted with you the franchises of our owne citie. And therefore yee ought of right (my masters of Capua) to repute this losse and misfortune now received, to bee as well yours as ours: and to make reckoning to defend the common state & countrie of both. It is neither Samnite nor Tuscan that wee have to deale with, to whom, if we lost & parted with our Empire, yet it remained still within the compasse of Italie: but the enemy that pursueth us is a Carthaginian, drawing after him a traine of souldiers, who are not so much as borne in Affricke, but coming from the farthest and most remote parts and bounds of the world, from as far as the streights of the Ocean sea, even from Hercules his pillars: void of the knowledge of all law, right, and difference of condition, without reason and discretion, and (in manner) without comerce of mans language. These souldiers so fierce and fell by nature, so cruell & merciless by use and custome, their captaine hath withall made more wilde and savage, by making bridges, caufies, and high-waies, over heapes of dead mens bodies: and (which I abhorre to speake) by teaching them to eat mens flesh. To see and endure these men to be their LL. whom feeding as they do upon such execrable meates and viands, which even to touch and handle without great horror wee may not: to resort for justice as farr as into Affricke and Carthage, and to suffer Italie to be reduced into a Province under the Numidians and Moores, what is hee that would not detest and abhorre, were he but borne onely within Italie? A woorthie honour and immortall glorie it will be for you, O ye Campanes, if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruine and falling downe prostrate under the weight of this late overthrowe, might by your fidelitie and forcible power be staied and vpheld; and set upright againe. I suppose yee have levied and enrolled already, thirtie thousand foote, and foure thousand horse out of Campaine: for coine, for corne, ye have store and plentie: Now if your faith and truth be answerable to your wealth and fortune, neither shall Anniball find that hee hath woon the victorie, nor the Romanes feele that they have lost a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Consull gave the Embassadors their discharge, and dismissed them. As they returned homeward, one of them, Sabinus Virius by name, said thus unto his fellows: Now is the day come (qd. he) wherein the Campanes may be able; not onely to recover againe the lands which in times past the Romanes have wrongfully taken from them, but also obtaine & enjoy the sovereign rule & Empire of all Italie. As for Anniball, we may conclude, covenant, & capitulate with him what articles & conditions we list our selves, to our best behoofe & benefit: And it is all to nothing, that Anniball, having now dispatched & finished the war, will of his own accord depart like a Conqueror into Affricke, & withdraw his forces out of these parts: so as the dominion of Italie shall bee left wholly to the people of Capua. Virius had no sooner delivered these speeches, but they all applauded him and accorded thereto. And in such tearmes they related their Embassage, as all men thought no lesse but the Roman Empire and name was utterly perished and extinct for ever. Incontinently the Commons and the greatest part of the Nobilitie of Capua enclined to revolt and rebell: Yet by the countenance and authoritie of the Auncients and Elders, the matter was staied & deferred for some few daies. At length, the greater part prevailed, whose opinion was, That the same Embassadors which were sent to the Roman Consull, should be addressed in embassie unto Anniball. But I find in some Aunciall records, that before they went, & before their resolute determination to revolt, there was an Embassage sent from the Capuans to the citie of Rome, demanding thus much, That if they meant to have any helpe and aid from them, one of their Consuls might bee a Capuan. Whereat the Senat of Rome tooke such snuffe & indignation, that the said Embassadors were commanded to void the Councell-houle, & a Sergeant sent after them at their heeles, to set them out of the citie: charging them at their peril, to take up their lodging that night without the territories of Rome. But because this demand jumpeth too neere to the like that the Latines made long before: & both Celcius & other Historians have (nor without good reason) passed it over, & said nothing thereof, I dare not avow it for a truth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Anniball, & concluded peace with him under these conditions, and covenants: Imptimis, That no generall, capitaine, or magistrate of the Carthaginians, should have any jurisdiction or power over a citizen of Capua: Item, That no citizen of Capua should be compelled against his will to serve in any warres, or execute the

the charge and office of a souldiour. Item, That the Campanes still enjoy their old lawes and magistrates of their owne: Item, That Anniball deliver unto the Campanes three hundred Roman captives, such as they themselves shall choose; whom they might course and exchange for those three hundred horsemen of the Campanes that were in garrison, and served for pay in Sicilie. These were the articles of the accord. But the Campanes stucke not to doe more than so, and to go farther than their capitulations: committing divers and sundry outrages. For the commons suddenly at once, apprehended all the Roman captives over the confederat souldiers, yea and attached other citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any militarie charge, or otherwise occupied in their privat affaires; and caused them to bee clapped within the stouyes and hote houses, as in ward and safe custodie, where their breath being stifled, and stopped up with exceeding heat, and steaming vapours, they were stifled, and dyed miserably. But there was one Decius Magius, a man who wanted no meanes of soveraigne authoritie, but onely the sobrietie, discretion, and wisdom of the citizens with whom he lived; who withstood all that ever he could such enormous & audacious courses, and endeavoured to hinder the embassage sent to Anniball. And so soone as he heard that Anniball was sending a garison, he recomended unto his fellow citizens, the proud and lordly rule of Pyrrius, the miserable and wretched thraldome of the Tarentines, as precedents sufficient to give them warning. He ceased not to crie aloud in open place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garison into the citie; then, that being admitted they should either be thrust out againe; or rather, if they would expiate and make amends by some valiant and memorable act, for that shamefull lewd part of theirs, in revolting so from their most auncient Allies, yea and kinsmen by blood, they should fall upon the Carthaginian garison, and kill them every one, and so reconcile themselves againe to the Romanes. Anniball having intelligence of these plots (for they were not a forging and contriving in a corner) first sent certaine messengers to summon Magius to repaire unto his presence within his campe. After that, seeing he stoutly denied to go (for he pleaded that Anniball had no authoritie nor right to commaund a citizen of Capua) he waxed wroth, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be haled perforce bound, unto him. But fearing, upon better advise, least by offering such violence some tumult might arise, and in the heat of blood, breake forth into an inconsiderat fray, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marius Blotius, the Pretour or L. Governour of Capua: signifying, that the morrow next following, he would be personally in Capua: and so with a small gard about him, he set forth of his campe, and put himselfe on his journey. Marius assembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent solemnities, with their wives and children, to meet Anniball upon the way. They of the adverse side unto Magius and the Romanes, performed this not only obediently, but also most effectually and with great diligence and endeavor. Yea, the common sort likewise were very forward in this action, as desirous especially to see this great Generall and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories. Decius Magius neither went forth to meet him, nor yet kept his house, because hee would not seeme to feare and cary a guiltie conscience: but walked up and downe idely for his pleasure in the Market place with one of his sonnes, and a few of his vassals and followers, whiles the whole citie besides was busily occupied, and much troubled in the entreteining and beholding of this great Captaine and commander of the Carthaginians. Anniball being entred the citie, incontinently required to have audience in their Councell house. Whereupon, the Nobles & principall citizens of Capua requested him, that he would not that day intend any weightie matters of importance, but himselfe in person solemnize it, with joy and mirth, as an high and festivall holiday for his welcome thither. And albeit he was by nature hastie, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not seeme at his first coming to denie them anything, he employed a good part of that day in seeing and vewing the citie. Intertained and lodged he was and his whole traine, with the Manj, Celerus, Stenius, and Pacuvius, the most noble and honorable personages, and the welchiest of all others. Thither unto him, Pacuvius Calavins (concerning whome I spake before, the principall man of that bend and faction, which reduced the citie to the obedience and devotion of Anniball) brought his owne sonne a yong Gentleman, and said withall, that the youth kept continually with Decius, and that he was faine to pluck him away from his companie and traine, whose part he tooke, and stuck most stiffly to him, in maintaining the old societie and amitie of the Romanes, against the new league with the Carthaginians; nians; and neither the bending and inclination of the whole cite to the contrary side, nor yet the reverent majestie of a father, had yet driven him from his obstinate resolution. And for that time, the father laboured with Anniball rather by way of prayer and intreatie, than by excoꝛding and cleering his sonne, that he would not be discontented nor displeased with the young man. So he was overcome with the importunate request and plentifull teares of the father, and gave commandement, that he together with his father, should be bidden to supper, at which feast he purposed to have the companie of no other guests of all Capua; but only of his hostes that gave him enterreinment; and one Subellius Tauris, a famous and brave warrior. To supper they went long before day light went downe; and sared at the table, not after the guise of Carthaginians, nor according to the discipline of souldiours, but after the order of a cite and house, which had bene used a long time to have the board furnished with sundrie sorts of delicate dishes, and with all delicate junkets to please the palate and tast. Perolla onely the sonne of Calavius, could not be brought to change his mind; and shew himselfe chieefull and merrie at meate, notwithstanding the masters of the feast, and Anniball himselfe otherwhiles, invited him to beate them companie, and sit with them; but he ever made his excuse to his father, that he was ill at ease and sickly whensoever he seemed to examine him; and to know the cause of this wonderfull trouble of mind, and vexation of spirit. So a little afore sunne setting, when his father arose, and was gone out from supper, he followed hard after him; and when they were come into a secret place apart, (a garden it was on the back side of the house) I will tell you a thing father, I have in my head a pollicie, and a readie meane, how we shall not only obreine pardon at the Romanes hands, for our trespasse committed, in falling away from them, and turning unto Anniball; but also how we Campanes may be in faire greater estimation and favour among them, than ever we were. The father marvelling hereat, was desirous to know what devise that might be: and with that, the youth cast his gowne from off his shoulder, and shewed him a good blade, girded to his side. I will quoth he out of hand, establish and scale sure, the Romanie league with the blood of Anniball. I was desirous (father) to let you know of it aforehand, if peradventure you would be willing to be out of the way when the deede is a doing. The old man seeing and hearing this, in a great fearefull agonie, as if he had bene present to see the execution of that which he heard him to speake of. Now I beseech thee, my sonne (quoth he) and pray thee of all loves and bonds that bind children and parents together, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either commit or suffer this so horrible a part, full of all abhominable wickednes whatsoever, and not to be named. There are not many houres since, that we sware by all the gods and holy hallowes in heaven, and by joyning hand in hand, made faithfull promise, and obliged our selves, to communicate together with him, and to eat at the holy table of sacred viands. And are we no sooner departed asunder from our familiar conference and parlee, but we arme our selves against him? Arise! thou in deede from thy friends guest-bourd, to which thou wert thy selfe the third man bidden of all the Campanes, and even by Anniball, and wilt thou staine and pollute that bourd with the blood of the principall guests? I, thy father, erewhile was able to reconcile Anniball to my sonne; and can I not pacifie my sonne likewise, & appease his scarce stomach against Anniball? But if there be nothing sacred and inviolable, nothing to be trusted in the world, neither faithfull promise, nor religious oth, nor any pietie at all and good nature, things so honest and just: then adventure hardly, and spare not to put in execution all actions detestable and not to be spoken, so that besides the note and infamous marke of wickednesse, they bring not upon our owne heads present mischiefe, and utter confusion. Darest thou alone as saile the perfon of Anniball? What wilt that multitude about him do the while, so many freemen and bondmen both? All their gard and regard, all their eyes upon him alone, what serve they for? What will become of so many hands of theirs? Thinkest thou that they will be benumbed and dead, at the time of that frantick enterprife of thine? The grim visage of Anniball himselfe, whome whole armies of souldiours tremble to behold: whome the people of Rome dread, and for feare of whome they quake againe, wilt thou alone abide to see? And if all other meanes of help should faile him, wilt thou endure to strike and wound me thy father, putting my bodie betweene, for the savegard and defence of Anniball? And stabb me thou must through the very hart, before thou canst hurt him or run him through. Suffer therefore thy selfe here to be frightened from this thy intended mischiefe, before thou have the foyle there; and misse of thy purpose. Let my prayers take place with thee, as once this day they prevailed for thee. With that, he marked

A marked his sonne to weepe and shed teares, and embracing him about the middle, and kissing him ever and anon, he left him not, nor gave over to pray and intreate him instantly, untill he got at his hands to lay off his sword, and promise him faithfully, that he would not attempt any such enterprife. Then the youth, seeing how the case stood, I wil (quoth he) pay unto my naturall father that kindnesse and love, in which I am bound as a debtour to my native countrie. But alas for you, good father, I am right sory for your hard hap; who are to answer before God and the world, for the betraying of your countrie, no fewer times than thrice already. Once, when you gave counsell and perswaded to forsake the Romanes, and to revolt from them: againe, when you were the principall agent, and advised to make peace with Anniball: and now this day the third time, when you are the only obstacle and hinderance, that Capua is not restored againe into the hands of the Romanes. O sweet countrie and native soyle of mine, take here at my hand this sword, wherewith erewhile I was girt and armed for deere love of thee, and was fully minded to defend this thy chiefe castle and fortresse, and not to spare, but embroe it in the blood of thy mortall enemy: take it I say, since mine owne father is ready to wrest it from me. This sayd, he flung his sword over the garden wall into the high way and open street: and therewith, because he would not grow into any suspition, he shewed himselfe againe to the guests within the house, and tooke part of the banquet. The morrow after, the Senate in favour of Anniball, solemnly met together in great number: in which frequent assembly, the beginning of his speech was very pleasant and gracious: wherein he gave the Capuans thanks, for preferring his amitie before the alliance of the people of Rome: and among other faire and magnificall behests to them made, he promised that within a while, Capua should be the head cite and chiefe State of all Italic, whereunto the people of Rome, together with other nations, should resort for law and justice. Mary quoth he, there is one that hath no part or fellowship in the societe and league made betwene the Carthaginians and you; namely, Magius Decius, who neither was a Campanian, nor ought of right so to be called and reputed: him I demaund to be delivered into my hands, and that in my presence, the Senate should be asked their opinion concerning his trespasse, and an A& presently entred thereof. All of them there assembled allowed of the motion, and gave their assent in the end: albeit a great sort of them thought both the man unworthy of that hard fortune & calamitie, and that this was but an ill beginning and a very overture to the infringing of the right of their freedome. The chiefe Magistrate then, went forth of the Counsel chamber, & sate in the Iudiciall hall or temple, and commanded Decius to be attached, and to stand before him at his seate, and there to answer for himselfe and make his defence. Who persisted still in the same stoutnesse and boldnesse of spirit, alleadging that by verne of the covenants in the league comprised, he might not lawfully be pressed and forced thus farre. Whereupon he had yrons clapt upon him, and commaundement was given, that he should have a Lictor attend upon him, and so be conveighed into the campe of Anniball. All the way as hee was led, so long as he was bareheaded and open faced, hee went preaching to the multitude that flocked about him, and with a lowd voice spake and said. Now Capuans, yee have the libertie that ye sought and longed for. In the open market place, at noone day, and in your sight, lo how I, a man inferiour to none in all Capua, am led away bound in chaines to die: What greater violence could be offered, if Capua were wooon by assault of the enemies? Go forth, go & meet Anniball, adorne & hang the cite with rich cloth of tapistrie. Register in your Kalender, among other holydaies, this day of his Entrie, that in the end ye may behold this goodly triumph over the of your owne cittizens. Vpon the utterance of these words, the multitude seemed discontented at the indignitie of this sight. Whereupon hee was hood-winked, and his head covered, and the Sergeant was charged to have him away quickly; and make hast out of the gates. So hee was brought into the campe, and immediately shipped and sent to Carthage, for feare least some commotion might arise in Capua, upon so unworthie and shamefull a deede: and feare the Senate also should repent themselves, that they had delivered and yielded out of their hands a principall perfonage among them: also to prevent, that no Embassage might be sent into him for his redelivery, whereby he should either offend his new allies, in case he denied them their first request, or suffer Capua to have alwaies a buisie and seditious citizen, ready ever to stirre up new troubles, if he graunted their suite. The ship wherein he was embarked, was by tempest cast upon Cyrene, a port towne in the dominion at that time of the KK. There, Magius fled for refuge as to a Sanctuarie, unto the Image of king Ptolemaus, and was brought by his guard and keepers unto unto Alexandria to the kings presence, and enformed the king, how contrarie to the tenor and privilege of the covenant, he was in bonds by Annibal. Whereupon hee was loosed from his chaines, and put to the choise, whether he would returne to Capua, or goe to Rome. Magius answered, that he could not in Capua remaine in safetie, and if he went to Rome at that time especially, when there was warre betwene the Romanes and Capuans, he should bee sooner lodged there in prison like a fugitive runagate, than intertained in house for a friend and loving guest; and concluded in the end, that he would make abode and live the rest of his daies more willingly in no place of the world, than in his highnesse realme, whom he found already to be the favourer of his life, and the redeemer of his libertie and enlargement.

The answer of the Oracle.

Whiles these occurrents fell out abroad, Q. Fabius Pictor, sent (as is above said) Embassador to Delphos, returned to Rome, & out of a writing he red openly, the answer of the Oracle in these words (now yee must understand, that in this Scripture were certaine gods and saints named, unto whom they should make solemne supplication, and the manner also with all ceremonies and complements thereto belonging.) Then (6 Romanes) if yee shall so doe, your state shall prosper and be more happie: your Commonweale shall goe forward better to your mind, yea, and victorie in the wars shall happen unto the people of Rome. But remember, that when all things shall goe well on your side, and your State shall be saved and preserved, yee send unto Pythius Apollo a present, according to the merite of a due recompence; and of the sylver raised of the pillage, prizes, and spoiles taken from the enemies, doe him honour accordingly. After he had rehearsed these words truly, translated out of the Greeke Originall, then he said moreover, That so soone as he was departed from the Oracle, he presently sacrificed unto all those gods with frankincense and wine. Also, that he was commaunded by the Priest of Apollo, that like as he both came to the Oracle, and also celebrated sacrifices, crowned with a garland and chapelet of Lawrell, so hee should in the same manner adorned, take ship, and be imbarcked, and not lay off the said garland before hee was arrived to Rome. Finally, that after all ceremonies performed most precisely and diligently, which hee was commaunded to observe, hee had laid and bestowed the said chapelet upon the altar, before the Shrine of Apollo at Rome. Then the Senate made a decree, That those sacrifices and supplications should with all speed and carefull regard be celebrated.

Whiles these things passed at Rome and in Italie, Mago the sonne of Amilcar, arrived at Carthage, and brought the first tidings of the victorie at Cannæ. This Mago was not immediately and directly sent from his brother, out of the field where the battaile was fought, but first certaine daies about receiving the homage and subjection of certaine cities of the Brutij, which revolted from the Romanes. Who having audience given him in the Senate of Carthage, related what acts and exploits his brother Annibal had achieved in Italie: namely, That he had given battaile to sixe Generals, whereof foure were Consuls, and two were the Dictator & Commander of horsemen: That he had fought against sixe entire Consular armies, in which battailes he had slaine above 200000 enemies, taken prisoners more than 50000. That of those 4 Coll. he had killed twaine outright: as for the other two, one of them was deadly hurt, the other having lost his whole armie, was fled, accompanied scarcely with 50 men. That the Generall of the Cavalterie created with full Consular authoritie, was discomfited & put to flight: & the Dictator (sooth) because he never would hazard the fortune of a field, was counted the onely warrior and worthie Captaine: That the Brutij and Apulians part of the Samnites and Lucanes, were revolted to the Carthaginians: That Capua, the head citie not of Campanie onely, but (after the Romanes defeature and overthrow in the battell at Cannæ) of all Italie also, was surrendered to Annibal. For these so many and so worthie victories, he required (meete and requisit as it was) that there should be a solemne feastivall day holden, and sacrifices solemnified to the honor of the immortal gods. And for better assurance of these luckie and fortunate achievements, and to verify his words, he caused the gold rings of the Romanes slaine at Cannæ, to be poured forth in the port, and entrie of the councill house. The heape of them was so great, that as some authors affirm, when they measured the same, they filled three Modij, and an halfe. But the constant report went, and sounding nearer to a truth, that they were not above one Modius. Hee added moreover, and said (and all to prove their overthrow the greater) that none of his knights & men of arms, & those of the better sort, who served on horses found at the cities charges, used to wear that ornament. The drift and conclusion of his speech was this, that the sooner that Annibal hoped to make

A make an end of the warres, the more he ought to be aided and helped with all provision and furniture accordingly. And why? The service was farre from home, in the mids of the enemies land, a huge deale of corne was consumed, a great masse of monie was spent: and as so many battailes had utterly swoopt up the enemies armies, so reckning was to be made, that they had in some measure lessened and empairied the forces of the conquerour. Therefore, a new supplie of men was to be sent over, and monie for souldiers pay, yea and corne also was to be transported to so brave souldiers, that had done so singular good service, and deserved so well of the Carthaginian nation. Vpon these reports of Mago, when all men els were wonderous glad, and tooke great contentment, Himilco, a man of the Barchine bend, supposing he had now good occasion and opportunitie offered to carpe and check Hanno. How now Hanno quoth he, what say you to this geare? repent you still, and mislike the warre undertaken against the Romanes? Let us see now, B give your voyce and opinion that Annibal be yeilded: forbid now thanksgiving to be performed to the immortal gods, for this prosperous speed and fortunate successe. Let us heare a Roman Senator now to speake in the councill house of the Carthaginians. Then Hanno; I would have held my peace this day, my LL. quoth he, for feare to speake ought that in this common and generall joy might not be altogether pleasant unto you. But now, seeing a Senator blindly spurrerth me the question, whether I mislike still of the enterprise of war against the Romanes? if I should keepe silence and say nothing, I might seeme either proud and insolent, or else faultie and culpable. Whereof the one is the part of a man that hath forgotten the libertie of other men; the other a propertie of him, that thinketh not of his owne. Well may I therefore answer C to Himilco, that I cease not yet to mislike this warre, nor never will give over to blame and challenge this invincible Captaine and warrior of ours, before I see the war ended and determined, upon some indifferent hand, & tollerable condition: and nothing els shall stint the misse I have, and quench the longing desire of the old peace, but the making of a new. And therefore these particulars, which Mago crewhie so magnified and vaunted of, are for the present, joyfull newes to Himilco and other of that crew, and the supports of Annibal; and to mee likewise in some measure, they may be acceptable tidings, in this regard, that good successe and luckie speed in warre, if we will make the right use and benefite of our fortune, will be a mean to procure us a more easie and honourable peace. For if we let slip this advantage and opportunitie of the time, when as we may seeme, rather to give than take conditions of peace, I feare mee, that even this present D so goodly a shew of rancknesse as it maketh now, will run up all to straw, and beare no head to yeeld come in the end. And yet, let us consider now, what a speciall matter this is. Slaine I have whole armies of enemies: Therefore send me fresh and new souldiours. What could you (Sir) demaund more, if you had been overthrowne? Vpon I have by force two strong holds where the enemies were encamped, full and fraught (we must needs think) of prizes and victuals; Allow me more corne and monie. What would you have required and craved more, I say, in case you had been rifled, and turned perforce out of your owne campe & pavilions? But that I may not marvel alone at these strange Enthymemes and conclusions (for it is as free and lawfull for me to ask some questions, seeing I have already answered to Himilco) I would faine have Himilco or Mago, I care not whether, to make answer likewise to mee. Say, that in the battaile before Cannæ, the E Romane Empire was wholly defeited and foiled. Say also, that certaine it is, how all Italie is at point readie to revolt, tell me first and formost, whether any one Nation of the Latine people is fallen from them to us? Secondly, whether any one person of the five and thirtie wards in Rome, is run away, and fled to Annibal? When Mago said nay, and denied both. Why then (quoth hee) there be great numbers of our enemy still behind. But I would gladly know what courage, what heart, what hopes, that multitude hath. When Mago answered, he could not tell. And nothing quoth Hanno is more eise and easie to be knowne. Say man, sent the Romanes any Embassadors to Annibal to treat for peace? Nay, had yee any intelligence brought unto you, that there was so much as one word lised, or mention made at Rome of peace? When Mago said flatly, nay, to that too. Why then (quoth Hanno) by this account, this warre will find us F worke, and keepe us occupied as much as it did, the very first day that Annibal set foot in Italie. Howe variable fortune was in the former Punicke warre, how victorie went and came reciprocally, wee are most of us yet alive that well remember. Wee never sped better, nor had a luckier hand, both by land and sea, than before Caius Lucatius, and Aulus Posthumus were Consuls. And whiles Lucatius and Posthumus were Consuls, were wee vanquished and utterly overthrowne before the Ilands Ægates. And in case now (which God forfend) G fortune should chance to change and turne her wheele, hope yee to have peace, then, being overcome, which now when we are conquerours, no man offereth nor seeketh after. For mine owne part, if any man should aske mine opinion of peace, either to present and tender it to the enemies, or to accept it at their handes, I wote well what to say: but if yee would knowe what I thinke concerning those demaunds of Mago, my advise is, that there is no sence nor reason to send aide and supplies to conquerours: now if they beare us in hand, delude, and abuse us with a vaine and false persuasion of conquest and victorie, much lesse a great deale. These remonstrances of Hanno tooke small effect with many of them: for, both the secret grudge and rancor which he bare to the Barchin house, much impeached his credit and authoritie, and also by reason that their mindes were so fully possessed of the present joy, they could admit and abide H heare of nothing, that might sound otherwise to daunt their glad hartes thinking, verily, that the warre would soone be at an end, if they now would straine a litle and helpe it forward. And therfore with great consent, there passed an Act of the Senate, That there should be a supplic sent unto Anniball of fortie thousand Numidians, fortie Elephants, and many talents of silver. Also the Dictatour was sent before with Mago into Spaine, to levie and hire twentie thousand footmen, and foure thousand horsemen, for to make up those broken armies which were in Italie and in Spaine. But these matters (as usually it hapneth in time of prosperitie) were performed but slackly and at leisure. The Romanes contrariwise, made more speed, as being by nature more industrious: and besides, such was their adverse fortune and extremitie, that they might not sleepe their affaires and go slowly about their businesse. For neither the Consull was wanting in any affaires that were by him to be managed: and the Dictatour M. Iun. Brutus, so soone as hee had performed all the complements concerning sacrifices and religious ceremonies, proposed unto the people, That (as the usuall manner was) he might mount on horsebacke. Which done, over and besides the two legions of citizens, which in the beginning of the yeare had bene levied and enrolled by the Consuls, and the bondslaves that were before mustred, and cer-tein squadrons gathered together out of the Picene & Gauls countrie, he proceeded to the last remedie and succour of a distressed and well neere desperate state, when as honest and direct courses must give place unto commodious and profitable pollicies, and alight from his horse, and made proclamation, That whosoever were guiltie & condemned of any capitall crime, or whosoever were imprisoned for debt, & wold willingly serve under him, he would take order that they should be exempt from all punishment, & discharged from their creditours. And of such he armed sixe thousand, with the spoiles of the Gauls, which in the triumph of Flaminus were carried in shew. Thus he departed from Rome five and twentie thousand strong.

Anniball having possessed himselfe of Capua, and solicited the Neapolitanes once againe, and sounded their minds, proposing before their eyes feare and hope, and all in vaine, led his forces into the countrie of Nola: with this minde, not at first to go roughly with them to worke, and by way of open hostilitie, because he was not out of all hope, that they would willingly come off and yeeld themselves: but in case they hasted, and answered not his hope and expectation in some good time, hee would surely proceed against them in all extremitie, and put them to whatsoever they could endure or feare. The Senate, and especially the principall of them, continued fast and sure in their alliance with the people of Rome. But the commons (as their maner is, desirous of alteration, and to see a new world) enclined wholly to the side of Anniball, casting many doubts, and feares, that their lands and possessions should be wasted and spoiled, with furdrie calamities and indignities that follow upon siege: neither wanted there heads and ringleaders of a rebellion. Whereupon the Senat (for feare least if they should seeme to thwart and crosse them, they had not bene able to withstand the violence of the multitude once up) and drewne to an head) closely dissimuled their intent & purpose, and so by temporizing, prevented a present mischief. For they made semblance that they liked well, and were resolved of revolting unto Anniball; but upon what conditions and capitulations, they should enter into new league and amitie, they knew not certainly. So having taken a farther time, they dispatched M halt certaine Embassadors unto the Rom. Prætor Marcellus Claudius, who remained with the army at Cannusium, advertising him in how great jeopardie the state of Nola stood, to wit, That Anniball was already lord of their lands, and the Carthaginians would soone be maisters of the citie, unlesse they were succored & relieved: that their Senat were driven to this shift, for to yeeld

A yeeld unto the commons, and graunt to revolt whensoever they would have them; and by that meanes staid them that they rebelled not over hastily. Marcellus after hee had commended the *Nolan*es, willed them with the same dissimulation to protract time, and hold off untill his com-ming: & in the mean while, to conceale & keepe secret to themselves, the dealings and treaties with him; and in no case to be knowne of any hope they had of aid from the Romanes. Himselfe went from Cannusium to Calatia; and from thence passed over the river Vultur, and by the way of Saricula and Trebia, journeyed over Suessula through the mountaines, and arrived at Nola. A litle before the coming of the Roman Pretour, Anniball was departed & gone out of the territorie of Nola, and drew downewards to the sea-side neere unto Neapolis: his teeth watered at the port towne, and that out of Affricke his ships might arrive thither, as to a safe aid and safe harbour. But after that hee heard that Naples was held by a Roman provost, M. Iu-liu
B. ius Hannu (sent for thither by the Neapolitanes themselves) and had received a garrison: seeing he could not be admitted into Neapolis, no more than into Nola, he went to Nuceria. Having beleaguered it round a long time, and often assaulted it forcibly, and assailed to sollicite as, well the Commons as the Nobilitie, but without effect; at the length by famine he forced them to yeeld; and so became master of the towne, upon composition. That they should depart every man disarmed, in their single garments. Then, as one that would seeme ever from the beginning, to use clemencie to all Italians, but onely the Romanes, he made faire promises of great rewards & advancement to honor, unto all those that would tarry behind & serve under him.
But as soon as upon those hopes wold remaine with him. For they all gave him the slip, and went C sundrie waies, some to their friends and acquaintance, others at a venture as their minde stood, to divers cities of Campane; but most to Nola and Naples. Amongst the rest, there were almost thirtie Senators, and those (as it fell out) of the best sort, that came to Capua: but being kept out there, because they had shut their gates against Anniball, they went to Cumes. The pillage of Nuceria was bestowed upon the souldiours, the citie sacked and burnt. Now kept Marcellus Nola, nor presuming more upon the strength of his owne garrison, than upon the confidence he had in the great men and chiefe of the citie. But he had the commons in jealousy, and about all, one L. Banti, who for that he had comploted to rebell, and therefore stood in feare of the Roman deputie: one while was pricked and incited to attempt treason, and to betray his countrie; another while, in case he should faile of that opportunitie, and misse his purpose, to make an escape and run away to the enemy. A courageous & lustie yong man he was;
D & the bravest Cavalier in those daies of all the Roman confederates. His hap was to be found lying halfe dead among the heapes of slain bodies before Cannus: Annib took order for the curing of his hurts, & when he was thoroughly healed, right courteously sent him home well & bountifully rewarded. In remembrance of which favour and good tyme, and in token of thankfulness, he was willing to deliver & yeeld Nola into the hands of Anniball, to be at his devotion. But the Pretour had an eye unto him; & observed how his head wrought, and was busily occupied to bring an alteration. And seeing there were but two waies to deale with him, either by punishment to keepe him short, and cut him off; or by some benefit to winne his heart: he thinking it a better course, to gaine unto himselfe so hardie and valiant a friend, than onely to bereave his E enemy of his right sent for him; & in this manner spake friendly unto him. You have (quoth hee) amongst your countrymen and fellow citizens, I see well, many that envie you, as it appears well by this, that there is never a neighbour you have at Nola; that hath told me of you; and how many noble exploits and good services in warre you have performed. But yet your valour cannot be unknowne and hidden; ever since you served in the Roman armie. For many there be that were souldiours then with you, which have made report unto me of your prowesse, and what perils you have entred into, and how often you have put your life in hazard, for the safetie and honour of the people of Rome; and namely, how in the battaile before Canine, you gave not over fight, untill at length having bled well neere to death, you were borne to the ground and lay under foote, overwhelmed with men, horse and armour, falling upon you; and so kept down F that you could not rise up againe. But be of good cheere man, and go on still in this thy worke and well doing; you shall have at my hands all honour and reward that may be possible: and the officer you come to me and keepe me companie, you shall find it will be more for your reputation and commoditie both. The yong man was glad at heart for these gracious words & large promises: and so Marcellus gave unto him freely, a goodly brave counsell, and commaunded the Treasurer

Treasurer to tell him out in monie 5000 Bigates of silver, charging his officers & Lieutenants to let him have access to him at his pleasure, whensoever he came. By this courteous usage and humanity of Marcellus, the young mans stout heart was so doulced, mollified, and easie to be wrought, that of all Confederates and Allies there was not one, who bated himselfe more valiantly, nor maintained more faithfully the State of Rome. When Anniball was approached to the gates of Nola (for he was returned from Nuceria, and come thither againe) and the Commons within the towne practised affekt to rebell, Marcellus had a little before the comming of the enemies retired and put himselfe within the wals: not for feare, that he should not be able to keep the field and his hold; but least he should give advantage and opportunity to betray the citie, seeing too many of them within, disposed and forward thereunto. After this, they began on both sides to arraunge their battailes in array, the Romanes under the wals of Nola, the Carthaginians before their owne fort. Small skirmishes there were, between the citie & the campe of Anniball (with variable event of fortune) because the Generals were not willing, either to denie and debarre some few that were so eager and forward to call for fight, or yet to give forth the signal of a generall battaile. While these two armies temporized thus, and held their campi guard, continually, and in manner of a solemnesse Assemblie, the chiefe Nobles of the Nolaes advertised Marcellus, that there used to be night-meetings and conferences betweene their owne Commons and the Carthaginians: and that it was plotted and set downe, That when the Roman host was issued in battaile ray out of their gates, the Commons in the mean while should fall to lifting of their carriages, packs, and trassles within, and then shut the gates upon them, and keepe the wals: and so having the citie, and all their goods and baggage under their hands, should from thence forth receive Anniball into the citie in steed of Marcellus. Upon these and verifications, Marcellus after he had thanked and commended the Senators of Nola, determined before any commotion and mutinie arose within the wals, to trie the fortune of a battell. At those three gates that stood toward the enemy, he ranged his forces, divided into three battalions, & gave order, that all the carriages should follow after, and that the lackies, launders, & other camp-followers, together with the feeble and sickly persons, should carie stakes and pales for the rampier. At the middle gate he placed the floure & strength of the legions, together with the Roman Cavalierie: at the two gates of either hand, he bestowed the new souldiours, the light armour, and the auxiliarie horsemen of allies. The Nolaes were by straight commandement forbidden to approach the gates or the wals. As for the baggage & carriages, the ordinarie guard was appointed to attend thereupon; for feare, least while the Legions were busie in fight, there should bee some assault upon them. In this order and array marshalled they were, within the gates. Anniball, who likewise readie arrainged, stood with banner displayed (as hee had done for certaine daies together) until it was well toward noone, first wondered at it, that neither the Roman armie issued out of the gates, nor any souldiours appeared upon the wals: & supposing afterwards, that their usuall complots and conventicles were discovered and revealed, and that for very feare they kept within and sat still, sent backe part of his souldiours into the campe, with commandement, in all speed to bring abroad into the open field, before the vanguard, all the ordinance and artillerie for to batter the citie wals, with assured confidence; that if hee came hotely upon them, and gave an assault, while they thus lingered and stood not forth, the Commons would make some tumult and stirre within the citie. But anon, as every man was busily occupied running to and fro in hast about his owne charge, before the vanguard and forefront of his battaile, even at the point when hee advanced forward to the wals, all upon a suddaine a gate was set open, and Marcellus caused the trumpets to sound the alarme, and the souldiours to set up a shout, commanding the footmen first, and then the horse, to fallie out, and with all the might and force they could, to charge upon the enemy. Soone had they turned their main battell sufficiently, & made disorder there, when at the two gates of each side, Publius Flaccus, and Caius Aurelius, two Lieutenants generall, issued forth upon their pances and wings. The horse-boies, skul lions, and the other multitude above said, which was set to guard the carriages, arose up and made a new outcrie & shout, as though the Carthaginians, who were termed them before for their small numbers, especially, they represented, all at once a shew of a mightie armie. I dare not avouch that which some Authors thinke not to write, that of comons were slaine in this medley 2300: and that the Romanes lost but one onely man. But when a victory soever it was, either so great, or smaller, surely a doubtie peece of service was that day achieved.

A and I wot not whether I may truly say, of the greatest consequence that any ever was, during the time of that waire. For as the time was then, it was a greater matter for the Romanes (albeit they were the conquerors) not to be vanquished of Anniball, than it was afterwards to vanquish him. Anniball disappointed of his hope to win Nola, retired to Acerre. And Marcellus immediately having shut the gates, and placed the guards and warders to keepe the same, that no man might goe forth, far judicially in the market place to examine those that had used secret conference and parling with the enemies: & finding above seventie, guiltie of this action, pronounced sentence of death upon them, as in case of treason. Those he cut shorter by the head, & commanded their goods to be confiscate. And thus leaving the government of the citie to the Senat thereof, he departed with all his forces, and above Sueffula encamped himselfe, and there abode.

B Anniball being come before Acerre, first summoned the citie, to surrender voluntarily and without constraint: but seeing them obstinate, and not willing to relent, he made preparation to lay siege unto the towne, and to assault it. But the Acerranes had better heart and courage, than might and strength to resist him. Therefore, when they saw themselves like to bee entrenched all about, and were past hope to defend and keepe the towne: before the enemies had brought all ends of their trenches and sconces together, they got between the trenches & rampiers (where they were not finished, and stood not close together) in the dead time of the night, and escaped through the sentinels and watches that were slenderly looked unto, and as well as they could, making shift through bywaies and blind lanes, over hedge & ditch (as either their wits guided them, or their feare carried them) recovered those citties of Campania, which they knew for certaine were not revolted, but persisted true and fast unto the Romanes. Anniball after he had put Acerre to the sacke, and set it on fire, having intelligence, that the Roman Dictatour and the Legions were received at Casilinum: and fearing, least while the enemy lay so neere encamped, some should have recourse also into Capua, led his armie to Casilinum.

C At the same time Preneste was held by 500 Prenestines, with a few Romans and Latines, who upon the newes of the overthrow at Cannæ, were retired thither. These Prenestines, by occasion, that they were not levied and mustered at Preneste, by the day appointed, set out from thence somewhat too late, and were come as farre as Casilinum, before the rumour was bruited of the defeate before Cannæ: where they joined themselves with other Romanes and Confederates, set forward from Casilinum, and marched together with a good great companie: but meeting

D by the way with the tidings of that unfortunat field, turned back again to Casilinum. And after they had spent certain daies there, as well fearing the Campanes, as suspected of them againe, (for they devised on both sides how to entrap one another, and how to avoid each others trains), & having received also certain intelligence, That in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Anniball was there received, they in one night set upon the townsmen of Casilinum, & killed them, and got that part of the citie which is on this side Vulturis, (a river that runneth through it, and divideth it into two parts) and kept it still. Their number was well increased by the comming of a cohort of foure hundred and sixtie Perusines, who likewise were driven to Casilinum, by the same report and newes, which a few daies before had turned the Prenestines thither. And surely there was sufficient almost of armed souldiours, to man & defend the wals of that

E part, being of so small a circuit as they were, considering the towne was flanked on the one side with the river. And againe, for the proportion of corne (whereof they had small store) they were men but too many. Anniball being now not farre from thence, sent before him the Getulians, under the conduct of a capitaine named Isalca; with direction, that first, if he could come to a partie, he should perswade with the inhabitants within, and by faire words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garison: but in case they continued still in their obstinacie, then to assaile them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the citie one way or other. When they were come under the wals, the barbarous captain Isalca, supposing (because he heard no noyse, & saw no stirring) that they had quit and abandoned the towne and were fled, began to assaile the gates, breake open the locks, and burst the bars. But all at once on a suddaine, the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provided for that purpose within, sallied forth, with an exceeding noyse and tumult, overthrew a number of the enemies, and beat them downe. Thus when the first had the repulse and were set back, Maharball was sent with a greater power to second them, but was not able to make his partie good with these squadrons that sallied forth & charged upon him. At the last Anniball himselfe encamped even before the wall, and with all his powre and forces put together, made preparation to give assault to this little towne, and small garison. And while he pressed hard upon them with fresh and hote assaults, investing it round about, the enemies from off their walls, curtines and turrets, let flye their shot so lustily upon the assaillants, that he lost some of his best and most forward men there. Once they issued forth of themselves upon a bravery, and minded to bid them battaile, but by a counse of Elephants set betweene them and home, they had like to have bene shut forth and kept out; and so they made haft in great feare to recover the gates and put themselves within the towne againe; having lost, considering so small a number, a great fort and more had dyed for it, but that the night parted the fray, and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after, the assaillants were all of them sharp set to give a fresh and hote charge, but not before there was a mirall coronet of gold shewed, and promised unto him that first could scale the walls. And the Generall himselfe cast in their teeth and reproved them for being so long about the assaulting of a small and weak skonsse, to speake of, seated also upon a plaine: whereas before they had woon the strong towne of Saguntum. He put them in mind both all and some, of Cannæ, Thrasymenus, and Trebia. Then began they to set mantlets and pavoises to, and to undermine. Many and sundry enterprises were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either by fine force could be performed, or by art and cunning devised. The Romane associates against these their engins and fabricks, rayed mounts, and platformes: yea and with countermines and crosse trenches, met with the mines of the enemies; so as both above ground, and underneath, they impeached all their attempts; so long, untill Annibal for very shame was faine to give over his impresse for the present. And when he had fortified his standing camp, and placed there a meane guard for the defence of it, because he would not seeme to have relinquished altogether the enterpryse; he withdrew himselfe into Capua, there to winter. There he lodged his souldiers within house for the better part of winter: those souldiours I say, who many a time and often had endured long, and held out against all travails and hardnesse that can possibly happen to the body of man; and never had bene used to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamitie, no miserie could tame and overcome, were spoyled and undone with too much wealth and excessive deinties; and so much the rather, as they more greedily fell thereto; and having not tasted thereof before, gave themselves wholly that way, and were deeply plunged and drowned therein. For sleeping on soft beds, wine and delicate fare, wenching and bathing, stews and hote houses, idleness and taking ease, which by use and custome grew pleasant and delightfome unto them every day more than others had in such sort weakened their bodies, and made their harts so effeminate, that from that time forward, the reputation and name only of their victories past, defended them more, than any present strength & vigour they had in so much, as expert and skilful warriours judged their Captaine Annibal in more fault, and farther overseene in this action, than in not leading his armie straight forward to Rome, after the battaile before Cannæ. For, that stay might have bene thought to have differed onely the entire and finall victorie for a time, but this error and oversight, seemed to dishabill him for achieving the victorie for ever. So little retained he of his former old discipline, that I assure you, he went out of Capua againe, as if he had led some other armie, and none of his owne. For, not only they returned from thence most of them intangled and snared in the love of harlots, but also so soon as they came againe to lye abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beausts hides, to march long journeyes, and to tast of other military toyle and labour; their bodies so tyred, their harts so faint, as if they had bene raw souldiers, new come into the field: in such wise, as all the time of their sommer abode in campe, many of them without licence and passport, would slip out of the way, and depart from their colours: and these start-backs had no other place of haunt to lurke in, but Capua. Now when the winter season began to be more mild, and draw toward the Spring, Annibal brought forth his souldiers out of his wintering harbours, and returned to Cassilinum: where, albeit the assault ceased, yet the siege had continued so streight, that the townesmen and the garison within the fort, were driven to extreame necessity & want of victuals. Now the Captaine over the Romane camp was T. Sempronius [Gracchus] M by reason that the Dictatour was gone to Rome to take new Auspices. And as for Marcellus, who was desirous for his part to relieve and succour the besieged, was impeached for coming to them, partly by the rising and swelling of the river Vulturis, and partly by the intreatie of the citizens of Nola and Acerre, who greatly feared the Campanes; in case the garison were once

THE XXIII BOOKE OF T. LIVIUS.

A once departed from them: And Gracchus, lying and keeping neere unto Cassilinum, stirred not one foote, by reason of the expresse commandement of the Dictatour. That he should attempt nothing in his absence: albeit there came dayly from Cassilinum into the campe such newes, as would have moved and provoked the most patient man that was. For it was constantly reported, and for certaine knowne, that some of them within the towne, no longer able to endure the famine, threw themselves downe headlong, and brake their necks: others stood unarmed upon the walls, offering their bare and naked bodies as a butt and marke to the shot of arrowes, and other darts. Gracchus grieved much to heare these piteous tidings, yet durst he not for his life, skirmish and fight without the warrant of the Dictatour: and he saw full well, that if he would convey corne and victuals unto them openly, fight he must; there was no remedie. Having therefore no hope at all to send any, but it should be spied, he devised to fill many tunnes and pipes with corne, that he had gotten together out of the countrie all about: and withall, to dispatch a messenger to the chiefe magistrate of Cassilinum, advising him, that he should in the night season take up all those vessels which came downe the river. The night next following, every man watched at the river side, according to the hope they conceived by the foresaid Romane messenger, and so received those tunnes, hulling downe the midst of the streame: and the corne was equally divided among them all. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day also. For, ever by night these vessels were let downe into the water; and the same night they might easily come unto them: by reason whereof, the sentinels and guards of the enemies, were nothing ware of that which was done. But afterwards, the current growing more swift and rough, by occasion of continuall raynes that fell, the sayd tunnes were some of them driven crosse the channell to the banke side, even where the enemies warded: and were espied waving and sticking among the willowes and oisters that grew along, close unto the banks: whereof Annibal was advertised. And so from thence forward, they tended the watch more streightly, that nothing sent downe the river Vulturis, could escape them, and passe to the citie. Afterwards, there was powred into the water great store of nuts, from the campe of the Romanes; which floated downe the channell unto Cassilinum; and with grated skimmers of wicker were taken up. But at the last, they within the towne were driven to this poore shift and extremitie, for to take their thongs and bridle reines, to plucke off the leather from their shields & bucklers, and make them soft in skalding water, and prove how they could eat them. Nay, they spared not so much as mice, and rats, nor any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by; upon the banks and terrasses under the walles, but they gathered & digged up. And when the enemies had turned up with a plough all the green sod of the counter-skarpe without the wals, they within cast turnep seed upon the mould. Whereupon Annibal made a hout at it, and cried aloud: What? shall wee sit heere about Cassilinum so long, untill these rapes be come up and grown. And whereas before that time, he would never vouchsafe to heare of any composition and agreement, now at last, he was contented to take reason, and be conferred withall, about the raunsome of as many, as were freemen within the towne. And it was covenanted betwene him and them, that they should pay for their redemption * seven ounces of gold a peece: So upon faithfull promise made, & securitie given, they yielded themselves: and were kept bound in prison untill they had made full payment of the gold aforesaid. After which, they were sent backe under safe conduct to Cumes. For this is more like to be true, than the report which goeth, That there were sent out after them certaine horsemen, who fell upon them & slew them in the way. Most of them were Prenestines. And whereas, there were of them in all, five hundred and sevenie in garison, the one halfe well neere, were either by sword or hunger consumed: All the rest, together which their Pratour Manitius (one who a foretime had bene a Scibe or Notarie) returned safe unto Preneste. In memoriall & testimonie of this, his Statue was erected in the market place of Preneste, armed in his cuirasse, clad in a long robe, with his head covered: and three other images, with a title or inscription engraven in a plate of Brasse, with this tenor: That Manitius had made a vow for the foldiers who lay in garison with him at Cassilinum. And the same title also was graven under three other images, set up in the temple of Fortuna. The towne of Cassilinum was restored againe to the Campanes, with a strong garison of 700 souldiours, deducted out of the armie of Annibal: for feare least when hee was departed once from thence, the Romanes should assaile them.

The Senate of Rome by vertue of a decree, granted unto those souldiours of Preneste double wages wages, with five yeeres vacation and rest from warfare. And when, to gratifie them farther, for their valiant service, they made offer unto them of the Burgeosie and freedome of Rome, they chose rather to remaine still at home, and would not change their owne countrie. But what befell unto the Perusines, is not recorded so plainly: for neither appeareth evidence by any publicke monument and memoriall of their owne, nor yet decree extant of the Romans. At the same time the Petellines (who alone of all the Brutij remained in friendship and amitie with the Romans) were assaulted not onely by the Carthaginians, (that were possessed of a great part of the countrie about them) but also by the other Brutij, with whom they would not joine in the complor of their rebellion. The Petellines not able of themselves to hold out and endure these daungers, sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave their aide and assistance: whose humble praers and piteous teares (for after an answer received, That they should provide and shift for themselves; they fell into lamentable mones and complaints, & lay prostrate upon the earth, before the porch of the Counsell-house) wrought exceeding compassion and pitié in the hearts both of the Senatours, and also of the people: whereupon the LL. were moved againe the second time, by M. Aemilius the Pretour, to deliver their opinion. And when they had cast all about, and well waied and considered their present state, and what they were able to do: being forced to confesse, that it lay not in their power to help their Allies, so far distant & remote from them: they willed them to repaire home againe; and since they had performed their fidelitie to the full, according to covenant, they gave them leave in this calamitie of theirs, to take that course, that they thought best for themselves. When they were returned with this answer unto the Petellines, their Senate all on a suddaine was stricken into such sorrowes, dumpes, and fearful maze; that some of them were of mind, and gave advice, to abandone the cittie, and flee everie man wheresoever he could: others were of opinion and perswaded, that seeing they were forsaken of their old friends, they should joyne with the other Brutij, and by their meanes, turne to Anniball, and come under his protection. Howbeit, a third side prevailed, who would in no wise that any thing should be done over hastily and rashly: but that they might meet againe, and sit in counsaile about the matter. And so it was put off, and respit given untill the next day. Then, after more mature deliberation, and their former feare somewhat assuaged, the principall personages there assembled, grew to this resolution, namely, To convey all things out of the tentorie about them into the cittie, and to fortifie both it and the walles.

Neere about one and the same time, there came Postes with packets of letters to Rome, from out of Sicilie and Sardinia. Those out of Sicilie from Ostacilius the vize-Pretor, were read first in the Senate-house, importing these newes: That L. Furius the Pretour, was come out of Africke, and with his fleet arrived at Lilybæum: himselfe sore hurt, & lying at point of death: that neither souldiours, nor sailors, and mariners, had their monie or corne, duly paid at the day; neither indeed was there any to bee had, for to keepe touch and make payment: moving and advising them earnestly, to send supplie thereof, with all convenient speed: and if they thought so good, one also of the new chosen Pretours to succeed after him. To the same effect in manner, wrote Cornel. Mammula the Propretor, out of Sardinia, as touching that point of money and corne. Answer was returned to the one and the other, That they had it not, & therefore they were to looke themselves both to their Armadoes and armies, and to provide for them. Ostacilius, who addressed Embassadors unto K. Hiero (the only refuge & stay of succor, that the people of Rome had) received for souldiers pay, as much silver as was needfull, and come to serve sixe months. The confederat cities likewise in Sardinia, contributed liberally unto Cornelius, and served his turne. At Rome also for want of silver, there were (by a law published by Minutius, Tribune of the Commons) created three Bankers, called Triumviri Menfarij, to wit, L. Aemilius, who had ben Consull and Censor: M. Attilius Regulus, vize Consull afore time: and L. Scribonius Libo, a Tribune of the Commons for the time being. Two Duumvirs also were chosen, M. & C. Attilij, who dedicated the temple of Concord; which L. Manlius Pretour, had vowed before: Three high Priests also were consecrated, Q. Cecilius Metellus, Q. Fabius Max. and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, all to supplie the roomes of P. Scantinius late deceased: of L. Aemilius Paulus the Consull, and Q. Atilius Pater, slaine both in the journey of Cannæ.

Now when as the LL. of the Senate had fulfilled other wants, and made up all decays and breaches, which fortune by continuall calamities and losses had wrought and brought upon them, so farre forth, as by any wisdome and pollicie of man, they could provide for at length

A length they had respect and regard unto themselves also, even to the desolat estate of the Counsell-house, and the unfrequent number of Senatours, assembling to the publicke Counsell of the cittie. For since that L. Aemilius and C. Flaminius were Censors, there had bene chosen no new Senatours, notwithstanding that in five yeares space, what with unfortunate battailes, and what with other particular chaunces, so many of them had miscaried. And when M. Aemilius the Pretour, in the absence of the Dictatour (who after the losse of Casilium was now gone againe to the host) had at the request of them all, propounded this matter: then Sp. Carvilius, after he had in a long oration complained, not only of the penurie, but also of the small choyce of those citizens, who were capable of Senatours dignitie, spake unto the point, and said, That he held it a matter of good importance, both for the full repairing and restoring of the decayed bodie of the Senate, as also for to bind the Latine nation in a more fast bond of amities: that two Senatours out of every State of the Latines (if the LL. of the Senate of Rome would agree unto it) should be enfranchised citizens of Rome, and taken into the Senate in place of those that were deceased. This opinion of his, the LL. of the Senate could abide to heare, with no better care, than in times past they accepted the motion & demand of the Latines themselves in that behalfe. And there being throughout the whole house a great muttering, for very indignation & disdain of those his words, Manlius above the rest brake out into this speech & said, That they were not all dead, but one man yet was left alive of that house & line, out of which a Consul (when time was) should be chosen in the Capitoll, that he would kill with his owne hand, that Latine whomsoever he saw sitting in the counsell house of Rome. With that, Q. Fabius. Never was there a thing, quoth he, propounded and mentioned in the Senate house, in a worse and more unreasonable time, than at this present, when the hearts and affections of our Allies being so wavering, their faith and allegiance so doubtfull, the very breaking and brooking of such a matter as this, were enough to set them further out. And therefore this inconsiderate speech of one foolish raine person, is to be suppressed and buried presently with the silence of all men, and never once to be spoken of againe. And if ever there were uttered at a counsell table, any secret and myserie, which were to be concealed, this of all other ought most to be kept close, hidden and smothered in oblivion, and reputed as never spoken at all. So this matter was dashed, and dyed there in the very birth. Then they proceeded and agreed, to create Dictatour for the choosing of Senators, one that had bene Censor aforetime, and of all those who had bene Censors, and were then living, the most ancient; and thereto they gave order, that Q. Terentius Varro the Consull should be sent for, to the nomination of that Dictatour. Who being returned out of Apulia, leaving the camp, there with a good guard, and taking long journeyes, untill he was come to Rome: the night next following (as the manner was) created by authority of an act of Senat, M. Fabius Buteo, Dict. for 6 months, without a General of horse. When he was mounted up with his Serjeants to the Rostra, which is the place of publicke audience, for to make a speech unto the people, he said, That he neither allowed of two Dictatours at one time, (a precedent never scene and knowne afore), nor yet could take himselfe for a Dictatour, so long as hee was without his Generall of Cavallerie. I will like alle (quoth he) that the greater authority and power of Censors, should bee put into the hands of one and the selfsame man, twice; & that a Dictator should have the rule & government for sixe months, unless he were created for the managing of warres. And therefore (said hee) I will myselfe limit and gage those things, which fortune, occasion of the times, and necessity have made excessive and beyond all measure powerful. Whether am I minded to depose or displace any of those from his Senatours dignitie, whom C. Flaminius, and L. Aemilius late Censors, have admitted into the Senate: but only, that a transcript and rehearsal bee made of their names, for that I would not have it lie in the power of one man alone, to censure and give judgement of the same and behavior of a Senatour; but this course will I take in substituting new Senatours in the roomes of the dead, that it may appeare, and be said, That this Order and degree is preferred before that, and not one person before another. So after that the names of the old Senatours were copied out and read, then he chose first into the place of them that were deceased those who after the time of L. Aemilius and C. Flaminius Censors, had borne any Magistracie of State, and of the chaire, and yet were not elected Senatours. And according as they had exercised their office one before another in order of time, so were they chosen first Senatours in their course. This done, he made a second election, of those who had bene Adiles, Tribunes, Prætors, or Quæstors; and last of all, such as could shew the spoyles taken from the enemies of Rome

Rome hanging in their houses: or had bene honoured and rewarded with a civill gallant. Thus after he had with right great approbation and contentment of all men, taken into the Senate 177, forthwith he resigned up his office, descended from the pulpit a private man againe, discharged and put from him the Serjeants, and came and stood beneath among the other multitude that attended their owne private businesse: tiding out the time for the noyse and of purpose, because he would not have the people to leave the common place for to wait upon him. Howbeit, for all that lingering and stay which he made, the peoples affection could not move more, and so with a goodly traine of men he was accompanied, and conducted home to his house.

The next night following, the Consull returned toward the armie, without making the Senate privie and acquainted with his departure, for feare he should have bene detained still in the cite for the solemne election of new Magistrates. The morrow after the Senate decreed, upon a motion propounded by M. Pomponius the Pretor, to write unto the Dictatour, that if he thought it were for the good of the common weale, he would together with his Generall of the Cavallerie, and M. Marcellus the Pretor, repaire to Rome to sabrogate and choose new Consuls: to the end that when they were all together in place, the LL of the Senate might by their owne knowledge in what state the Common wealth stood, and consult how to provide for every thing. They all came that were sent for accordingly, leaving behind them their Lieutenants for the government and conduct of the Legions. The Dictatour spake of himselfe but little, and with much modestie ascribing the greatest part of the honor unto T. Sempronius Gracchus, and then summoned the generall assembly for the Election: in which were chosen Coss. D. Posthumius the third time (who then was absent, and as L. Deputie ruled the province of Gallia) and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who at that time commended the Cavallerie, and repaired to Rome with speed. Then were elected Pretors M. Valerius Maximus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fabius Pictor, & Q. Mutius Scaevola. The Dictatour after the choosing of these Magistrates, returned to Tienum, where the armie waited: leaving the Generall of the horse behind at Rome, to the end that he being to enter into his government, within few dayes after, might confide with the LL of the Senate as touching the levie and enrolling new armies against the yeare ensuing.

Whiles they were in their busiest and deepest conferences about these matters, newes came of a fresh overthrow: such was the fortune of that yeare to heape one calamitie in the neck of another: to wit, that L. Posthumius the Consull elect, was himselfe slaine, and the armie together with him in Gallia, utterly defeated and destroyed. The manner of which misfortune was this. There was in those parts a wide and huge Forrest (which the Gauls call Litava) through which Posthumius was to leade his army. The trees there growing on either hand of the paze, the Gauls had so cut, that they might stand upright of themselves so long as they were not stirred, for being forced never so little, they must needs fall downe. Now had Posthumius the conduct of two Romane legions; and of associates besides, from the high costs of the upper sea he had enrolled so many souldiours, as that he came into the enemies countrey as a host. The Gauls who had bestowed themselves in ambush round about the skirts of the wood, so soon as the armie was all engaged within the streights of the paze, moved from thence the trees (so quicked) which stood next unto them, and they fell one upon another (standing as they did, so ready of themselves, and ready to rotte and come downe on both sides of the way) and in the fall overthrew withall and covered over and over both horse and man, with their armes and humors, so as scarce ten of them escaped alive. For as most of them were felled and strucken in the head either with the bodies of the trees, or the broken armes and boughes, so the rest of the multitude, affrighted with this unexpected and unhappie accident, were killed by the Gauls that beset all the streights and passages of the wood, and of that great number, they took few prisoners, who making towards a bridge standing over the river, were intercepted by the way, and stopped by the enemies that kept the adventure of the bridge, in which place Posthumius was slaine, for he strived all that ever he could, not to be taken alive. The spoiles of this Generall captaine, together with the head cut off from the rest of his body, the Romans with great joy and solemnitie brought into the temple that amongst them was reputed most holy & sacred. And after they had censed the head, as their manner is, they enchained and enchained it with gold, and that served as well for any holy vessel to sacrifice and give say, as all upon high and festivall dayes, as also for an ordinary drinking mazar for the high Priests, and other Princes of that temple.

The defeat
in this armie.

A temple. The bootie also, which the Gauls gained of their enemies, was of no lesse importance than the victorie: for although a great part of the beasts and living creatures was crushed and squealed to death with the fall of the wood, yet all other things, by reason that nothing was scattered and lost by flight, were found wholly on the ground, as the souldiers lay along in that order as they marched.

These wofull tidings being reported, the citie was for many daies in such feare and perplexitie, that all shop windowes were shut up, and no stirring at all in the streetes throughout, from one end to the other, as if it had bene night continually. Then the Senate gave the Aediles in charge to walke all about, and command the shops to be set open, and to make no more shew in the citie of publicke sorrow and heaviness. Then T. Sempronius assembled a Senate, spake comfortably to the LL of the Counsell, and exhorted them, that as they were not dismayed with the overthrow and discomfiture at Cannæ, so they would not be cast down & daunted with lighter and smaller losses and calamities. For if it might please the gods to blesse them, & give them good speed (as they hoped no lesse) against the Carthaginian enemies and Anniball, the warre with the Gauls might without danger and inconvenience either be laid aside cleane, or put off and deferred. As for the revenge of this deceitfull practise, it should rest still in the power either of the immortall gods, or of the people of Rome, to be performed one time or other. But for the present, they were to consult and resolve concerning Anniball their grand enemy, & to grow to some point and conclusion of such forces as were meet for that warre. And first himselfe discomfited and laid downe what companies of foot and horse, what number of citizens, & how many confederats were in the armie of the Dictatour. After him, Marcellus shewed and recounted the proportion of his own power & their strength. Also, what forces, and of what qualitie, were with C. Terentius the Consull in Apulia, they were required to declare, who might speake upon their knowledge. Then they proceeded to cast & examine, whether two Consular armies well appointed and furnished, were sufficient to go through so great a war. Thus for that year they let France alone, albeit they had good cause to bee angrie, and were provoked that way to follow revenge. The Dictatour his armie, was appointed unto the Consull. As for the forces under the leading of Marcellus, consisting of them that fled out of the field at Cannæ, those they ordained to bee sent over into Sicilie, there to remaine in service so long as the warre continued in Italie: and that thither also should be posted over out of the Dictatour his Legions, all those souldiours who were able to doe least service, there to abide in souldierie, without any other limitation of time than that, which the laws in that case provide for. For the other Consull, who should be substituted in stead of L. Posthumius, there were assigned two Legions of Romane cittizens: and order was given, so soone as the Auspices would permit, hee should bee elected with speed. Likewise it was agreed upon and ordained, to send for two legions besides out of Sicilie: out of which, the Consull unto whom those Legions aforesaid of the citie were allotted, should take what souldiours hee thought needfull. Finally, C. Terentius the Consull, had his commission of commaund continued for another yeare, without empairing one jot of the armie, which hee had in his conduct for the guard and defence of Apulia.

Amids these affaires and preparations in Italie, the war went forward never lesse in Spaine, E and over to that day prospered on the Romanes side. P. and Cn. Scipions divided their forces so, as Cn. should serve by land, and Publius at sea with the navie. Asdruball the cheefe Colonell and commander there of the Carthaginians, distrusting his owne strength both by sea & land, kept himselfe aloofe, and farre from the enemy, in sure places of safetie. Unto whome, after long suite and instant prayers, were sent 4000 foot, and 300 horse out of Affricke for supplie. Having thus at length, with new helpes gathered fresh hope, he encamped neerer to his enemy, and gave order and direction withall, that the Armada should be rigged and decked for the defence of the Islands, and the sea coasts. And whiles hee was thus beginning hotely to make warre againe, hee was suddainly discomfited and disquieted with the revolt of the Admirals and great capitaines of the navie: who for their fearefull abandoning of the fleet upon Iberus, having been sharply checked and rebuked, were never after trustie and sure, either to the Colonell himselfe, or to the State of Carthage. These fugitive renegates had first practised to raise troubles & insurrections in the land of the Carpesij, and by their solliciting & instigation, certaine citties were procured to rebell, and one of them they had forced by assault. Whereupon, Asdruball turned his forces from the Romanes, and bent them wholly against that Nation: and with a cruell armie entering the frontiers frontiers of the enemies, determined to give the charge upon Calbus, a Nobleman, and renowned cheefestaine of the Carpesians, even before the citie, that some few daies before was lost, where the said Calbus with a puissant power kept himselfe strongly encamped. Having therefore sent out before, certaine vaunt-courriers lightly armed, to traine forth and draw the enemies to skirmish, he made out withall certaine companies of his Infanterie sundrie waies to overrun and spoile the countrie, and likewise to catch up and meet with all straglers, dispersed in the fields. Whereupon, at one time there was a skirmish before the campe: and likewise in the fields, they were either slaine, or put to flight. But afterwards, having by divers waies from all parts recovered againe the campe, suddainly they shaked off all feare, plucked up their harts, & thought themselves good ynough, not onely to defend their fort and hold, but also to bid the enemy battaile. They sallied out therefore of the campe in good array, shouting, dauncing, and hopping after their manner, so as this unexpected boldnesse and courage of theirs, terrified the enemies, who a little before had challenged them to fight. Whereupon Asdruball himselfe withdrew and retired his power for more securitie to an hill of good heighth, and situate for his advantage, with a river likewise betwene him and his enemies. The light armed vaunt-courriers also, and the forsome hope, together with the horsemen that rode scattering abroad, he caused thither to repaire for their better safetie. And because he trusted neither hill nor river, hee fortified himselfe with a trench and rampier besides. In this alternate and interchangeable feare on both sides, there passed some bickerments, and blows were dealt between. In which, neither the Numidian horsemen were able to match the Spaniards in that kind; nor the Moores archers could make their part good with the light Carpesians targatiers, who in nimblenesse & swiftnes were as good as they, and for courage and bodily strength, farre better. These Carpesians seeing they neither could provoke Asdruball to a battaile, with all their braving hard under his campe, nor yet easily by assault win it, they tooke by force the citie Asena, into which Asdruball when he first invaded the frontiers of his enemies, had conveyed store of corn and other victuals: yea, and became LL. of all the countrie thereabout. And they grew so lustie & audacious, that neither in their march and array, nor within their campe they would bee ruled and ordered by any mans command. This secure and carelesse negligence of theirs, when Asdruball perceived to arise (as usually it doth) upon good successe and prosperitie; after an exhortation made to his souldiors, to charge upon the enemies, roving abroad without their colors, he descended from the hill, and marched in battaile array against their campe. So soone as the Spaniards were advertised by those who came in great hast, and fled from the Sentinels and corps de guard, that he was coming, & neere at hand, with a great outcrie they gave the alarme. And as every man could get weapon in hand they ran upon the head to battaile, without direction and commaundement of captain, without signall, ensigne, and order, confusedly. When the foremost in the vaward were joined in conflict and come to hand fight, some of their fellows were seene running on heapes and by troupes, and others were not well come forth of the campe. At the first the enemy was terrified with their bold adventure. Afterwards, as they encountered, thin and loosely raied, with the enemies thicke and closely raunged together, seeing themselves too weak, & not sufficient, so few in number to defend themselves, they looked backe one upon another for succour: and being on every side put backe, and forced to recule and lose ground, they cast themselves into a ring, and thus thrust (as they were) close together, bodie to bodie, and armour to armour, they were so pent and pestered in so narrow a ground, that they had scarce rounne ynough to wield their weapons: so they were compassed and environned round with the enemy, and for a good part of the day hewen, in peeces, and massacred. Some few of them that brake through by dint of sword, escaped to the woods and mountains. With like feare the campe was abandoned: and the day following, the whole nation yielded, and came under the subjection of the Carthaginians.

Long they continued not quiet. For within a while newes came from Carthage, that Asdruball should make what speed he could with his armie into Italie. Which rumour being blowne abroad through Spaine, turned in manner all their hearts away unto the Romanes. Whereupon Asdruball addressed his letters immediately to Carthage, shewing what hurt the fame of his departure had done already: and in case hee should set forward on his journey, and go out of those parts, all Spaine would turne to the Romanes, before hee were passed the river Iberus. For over and besides, that he had not strength ynough to leave behind for a garrison, nor a sufficient commaunder in steed of himselfe, the Generals of the Roman armie, who had set foot in Spaine,

A were such, as he might hardly make head against them with equall puissance. And therefore, if they had any regard of Spaine, hee advised them to send one to succede him with a strong power: For he should have his hands full, and ynough to doe in the province, fall out things as fortunately as they could. These letters, albeit at the first sight they greatly troubled the Senate, yet because the Italian affaires seemed of more moment and greater importance; they wrought no alteration in their intended course, either for Asdruball himselfe, or his forces. Howbeit Himilco was sent with a compleate and competent armie, and a greater Armada; both for the holding of Spaine in their allegiance, and also for their defence by sea and land. Who having passed over with all his power, as well for land service as the sea, fortified his campe, drawne his ships ashore, laid them up in drie land, and empaled them strongly all about; himselfe in person with his elect and most choise men of armes, made what hast possible hee could, through nations partly enemies, partly doubtfull and untrusting, and staid not either in one place or other (but evermore standing upon his guard) untill he was come to Asdruball. After he had declared unto him the order decreed by the Senate, and what he had in commission; and taken himselfe direction likewise from him, in what manner the warre in Spaine was to be managed, he returned backe againe to his owne campe. In which voyage to and fro, hee travailed safely by no one thing more, than by speedie expedition. For hee was ever gone from a place, before the people could agree together, and make head against him. Now Asdruball, before that hee dislodged and set his armie on foot out of those parts, levied summes of money of all the cities and states under his jurisdiction; for well he knew, that Anniball had paid sweetly before him, for his passage through certaine countries, and as well he wist besides, that the Gauls he was faine to wage: for amongst them no money, no men. And if he undertooke and entred upon that great expedition, poore and bare of silver, hee had never reached so farre as the Alpes. Thus having in great hast raised and collected his monies, he came downe to the river Iberus.

When the Romanes heard of the proceedings and designements of the Carthaginians; and likewise of the journey of Asdruball: both the Generals (laying all other matters apart) prepared to joine their whole forces together, to oppose themselves, and to withstand such intended attempts: supposing and considering, that if Anniball (who by himselfe alone was an enemy to Italie hardly supportable) were once seconded by Colonell Asdruball and the Spanish armie, the Empire of Rome would soone be at an end. Upon these carefull cogitations being grieved and perplexed, they assembled all their power neere to Iberus: and after they had passed over the river, and long counselled whither they should encampe themselves and abide the coming of the enemies to bid them battaile; or by invading and assailing the associates & subjects of the Carthaginians, to stay the enemy & hinder his intended journey, they resolved at length & made preparation to assault Ibera, (so named of the river neereby) the richest and most wealthy citie at that time, of all others in those parts. Whereof when Asdruball was advertised, hee for to helpe his friends, advanced himselfe likewise to set upon another citie lately yeilded to the Romanes, and reduced under their subjection. And so the Romanes after they had begun to lay siege to Ibera, gave over that enterprise, and made head against Asdruball himselfe. And for some few daies, they lay incamped five miles asunder one from the other, not without some light skirmishes; but never came to pitch a faire field. At length upon one and the same day (as if they had bene so agreed afore) they hapned on both sides to set out the signall of battaile, and to come forth with all their power into the plaine ground. The Romanes stood arranged in three battalions: one part of the Infanterie was placed before the standards in the vaward; another regiment bestowed behind in the reargard; the men of armes flanked the sides likewise. On the other part, Asdruball strengthened his main battel with Spaniards in the right point he most valued the Carthaginians, in the left, the Affricanes. As for the auxiliar & mercenarie horsemen, whom hee waged and hired, such as were Numidians, hee ordained a front the Carthaginians to be sent to guard them, the rest that were Affricanes, hee distributed and disposed about the skirts and edges of the battalions. Neither were all the Numidians placed in the right flank, but (such as after the guise and manner of Vaulters, led two horses apeece, and used often times in the midst of the hottest conflict, to leape armed as they were from their wearied horses to another fresh one. So nimble are they themselves, and so tractable and well taught to their hands) were their horses. Thus stood they arranged on both sides in order of battaile. The Captains of either part for hopes in manner nothing unequal: for neither in number or qualitie of souldiours, was there there any great oddes betwene them Marie, for courage and heart, there was great difference and inequality in the souldiours themselves. For the Romanes, (notwithstanding they fought farre from home) were so perswaded by their leaders, that they fought for Italie and the citie of Rome: and therefore, as if the whole hope of their fate returned into their countrie, were to be tried and decided in this one battaile, they resolved either to winne the day or do die for it. On the other side, the souldiours were not so resolute, for most of them being Spaniards, would have chosen rather to bee conquered and overcome in Spaine, than with conquest and victorie to be drawne into Italie. And therefore at the first shocke, when scarcely the darts and javelins were lanced & let flie, their maine battaile reculed and so soon as the Romanes with great violence redoubled the charge, they turned their backs and fled. Howbeit in both flanks the fight was hote enough. The Carthaginians of the one side, the Affricans on the other, charged the Romanes very hard, and fought sore against them, as if they had them invironed round about within their battailons. But when as the whole power of the Romanes were once rallied and gathered together in the mids, they were strong enough to remove and seeke the wings of the enemies. So they maintained fight in two divers places at once. But both in the one & the other, the Romanes (after they had discomfited the maine battaile in the mids) were no doubt much better, as well in number, and also in strength and vigour of men. Many a tall fellows was there slaine. And had not the Spaniards at the first when the battaile was scarce begun, fled amaine by heapes, very few of the whole battaile had escaped and remained alive. The horsemen fought little or not at all. For the Moores and Numidians, so soon as they espied the battaile to shrink and loose ground, presently all on a suddaine fled as fast as they could, & left the sides & flanks of the said battaile naked, driving afore them the Elephants withall. And even Asdruball himself, who maintained the medley to the very last, escaped with some few out of the thickest massacre and execution. The Romanes tooke their campe and rested it. This battaile was of such import and consequence, that it caused all the Spaniards, who were before but wavering, to time wholly to the Romanes: and left Asdruball no hope at all, to passe with his forces into Italie, not so much as to make abode with safetie in Spaine. The newes hereof being bruited abroad and sent to Rome, by the letters of the two Scipions, great joy there was, not so much for the victorie, as because Asdruball was tied by the foot, and staid for comming into Italie.

*Bellisima.

Amids these exploitcs in Spaine, Petelia (a citie of the Brutij, having endured the siege and many assaults for certaine moneths) was finally won by Himilco, one of Anniball his capitaines. But that victorie cost the Carthaginians much blood, and many a fore wound. No force nor violence overcame the besieged Petelians more, than very famine. For having consumed and eaten up all food of corne, all flesh of foure footed beasts whatsoever: they were driven at length to feede and live upon shoemakers lether, weeds, and roots, tender barks of trees, & the crops of briars and brambles: and they gave not over so long as they were able to stand on their legs upon the walles, and beare their armour.

Anniball after the winning of Petelia, conducted his armie against Consentia, which being not so valiantly defended, was within few daies surrendered up into his hands. Neere about the same time, a power of the Brutians also, laid siege unto Creroni, a citie built and inhabited by the Greekes, and in times past, mightie in men and munition: but now at this time so distressed with manifold and grievous calamities, that of all ages one with another, they were not able to make twentie thousand men. And therefore no marvel, if the enemies were soon maisters of the citie; being so destitute as it was of citizens to defend it. Once the citie they kept still, into which there were some that escaped in that tumult when the citie was taken, out of the mids of the massacre. The Locrians likewise revolted unto the Brutij and the Carthaginians. By reason that the common multitude were fraudulently betrayed by the chiefe and principall citizens. The Rheginis onely of all that countrie, continued both true unto the Romanes, and also to their owne libertie to the very last. The same disposition to revolt, was to be seen even in Sicilie, in so much as the very house of Hiero was not cleere: and free in all parts from rebellion. For Gelo his eldest sonne, having in contempt both the olde age of his father, and altho after the overthrow at Cannæ the societie and friendship of the Romanes, turned unto the Carthaginians. And he had no doubt made a general alteration in Sicilie, but that his death came between, and cut him off; which hapned so juniper, even when he was arming the multitude, and soliciting his friends to rebellion, that his very father himselfe was drawn unto deepe suspicion that hee

A took his life away. These were the occurrents that fell out that yeare with variable event, in Italie, Affricke, Sicilie and Spaine. In the end of the same yeare, Publius Maximus moved the Senate, and made request, that the temple of Venus Erycina, which he had vowed being Dictator, might now be dedicated. And the Senate made a decree, That Tiberius Sempronius Consull elect, should soone as he was entered into his office, propose unto the people, that they would create two Duumvirs for the dedication of temples: And in honour of Aemilius Lepidus, who had bene Consull twice, and Augustus, his three sonnes, Lucius, Marcius, and Quintus, exhibited certaine publicall games for three daies space; and a shew in the Common place likewise for three daies together, of two and twenty pair of sword-fencers, to fight at shapeto the overage. The Consul Publius Aemilius Leptinus, and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus now Consull elect, who in his Edileship had bene Generall of the holsemen, set out the Roman games, which were renewed and continued still for three daies. Likewise the Plaies of the Common, were thise exhibited by Publius Aemilius Leptinus, and M. Claudius Marcellus. Now after these yeeres expired by the Punick warre, Tiberius Sempronius the Consull, began his government upon the Ides of March, As for the Prators, Publius Valerius Flaccus, who had afore time bene Consull and Censor, objected by lot the jurisdiction of the citibenis, and M. Valerius Corvinus of the strangers and alliens. To Appius Claudius Pulcher, was allotted the government of Sicilie; and to Publius Sulpicius of Sardinia. M. Marcellus was by the people allowed to have the authoritie of a Vice Consull, in regard that he above all the Roman captaines, after the defeature of Cannæ, managed his affaires & varied prosperously in Italie. Now the very first day that the Senate was assembled in the Capitoll, they decreed upon the first motion, that within the compass of that yeare, there should be levied a double tax of tributes; and that one single tribute should be forthwith gathered, for present pay to all the souldiours, saving those that served at Cannæ. Then concerning the atries this order was set downe: Imprimis, that Tiberius Sempronius the Consull, should appoint the two legions of citizens a certaine day to meete at Cales: Item, that six legions should be conducted to the campe of Glandius above Sicculi. Item, that the legions which there were (and those consisted for the most part of the residue of the Cannian armie) Appius Claudius Pulcher the Pretour, should put over sea into Sicilie; and as for those that were in Sicilie, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that amie which was appointed to meet by a day at Cales, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent: and he was commanded to conduct the legions of the citizens to the campe of Glandius. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old armie, and to leade it into Sicilie, Tiberius Gracchus Lieutenant, was sent by Appius Claudius. Men looked at first, and yet they sayd nothing, that the Consull should call an assembly for the treating of a Collegue unto him. But after that they saw that M. Marcellus was sent out of the way (as it were of purpose) whom above all others they were desirous to be the Consull for that yeare, in regard of his notable good service whiles he was Pretour, there arose much muttering in the Senate house. Which the Consull perceiving: my LL. quoth he, it was for the good of the Common wealth, that both M. Claudius should go into Campaine to exchange the armies; and also, that the Election of Consuls, should not be proclaimed, untill that he were returned againe from thence, with dispatch of that business which he had in charge: that ye might have a Consull, such a one as the present condition of the State required, and your selves most desired. So there was no more speech of the election, untill Marcellus was come backe againe. In this meane time were two Duumvirs created, Publius Erycina, and Tiberius Gracchus, of another to the Goddess Mentis. Both stand upon the Capitoll hill, devided asunder no more than with one onely conduit of water passing betwene. And as concerning the three hundred Campaine horsemen, who had served out their full time of warfare faithfully, and were come to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enfranchised citizens of Rome: and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Denizens of Cumes, from the day afore that the Capuans revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The chiefe cause of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied staidly that they knew to whom they did appertaine, seeing they had abandoned their old native countrey, and as yet were not enrolled and incorporate into that state, unto which they had retired. After that Marcellus was come againe from the armie, the solenne day of election of a Consull in place of Publius Postumius, was published. And with exceeding great consent of all men,

Marcellus

Marcellus was chosen: and forthwith he was to begin his Magistracie. At whose first entrance, it hapned to thunder: and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced, that they thought hee was not rightly created. And the Senatours gave it out commonly & bruited abroad, that the gods were not well pleased therewith, because (forsooth) two Coss. were elected of the communalitie (a thing never seene before.) Whereupon Marcellus resigned up his place, and in his roome was substituted Fabius, the third time.

That yeere the sea burned. At Sinuessa a cow brought forth a horse foale. And at Lanuvium in the temple of Iuno Hospita, certaine flames or images dropped with blood: & about that temple it rained stones. For which shewre, there was solemnised, according to the customeable manner, a Novendiall sacrifice. The other prodigious signes likewise, were expiated with great care and heedfull regard. The Consuls then parted their armies betweene them: Fabius tooke charge of those forces which had bene commaunded by M. Junius the Dictator. Sempronius had the conduct of all the voluntary souldiers, and besides of 25000 of Auxiliaries sent from the confederates. M. Valerius the Pretour had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicilie. M. Claudius the Vizconsull, was sent unto that armie, which lay in garison at Nola, above Suessula. And the Pretours tooke their journey into Sicilie and Sardinia. The Consuls, whensoever they would assemble the Senate, proclaimed that the Senatours, and all others that had lawfull authoritie to speake their mind and deliver their opinion in the Counsell house, should meet at the gate Capena. The Pretours, those that were Iudges in the court, and to whom the civile jurisdiction appertained, erected their Tribunall seats and places of Assises at the publicke Fishpooles, and thither they commaunded all wits to bee returned, and apparence there to bee made. And for that yeare all pleas and iudgements of causes passed there.

In this meane time newes came to Carthage: (from whence Mago the brother of Anniball was minded to transport and set over into Italie 12000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, 20 Elephants, and 1000 talents of silver, together with a guard and supplie of 60 gallies) That in Spaine things went untowardly: and that all the cities of Spaine (in a manner) were revolted unto the Romanes. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the enterprise of Italie into Spaine. Considering there was good hope shewed of a suddaine, to recover againe Sardinia, for that there was but a small power of Romanes there; and Cornelius the old Lord Deputie, well acquainted with the state of the province, was now upon his departure from thence, and a new expected in his turne. Over and besides, that the Sardinians were wearie alreadie of the Romanes government, which they had so long endured, as who the yeare that past was, had tyrannised over them cruelly, and exercised their authoritie with oppression, covetously imposing upon them hard exactions and tributes, and levying of them a most unjust taxation and contribution of come: and finally they wanted nothing but an head, upon whom they might relie themselves. To this effect there was an Embassage sent secretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principall actor and procurer hereof, was Hersicora, a man in those daies of greatest authoritie and power among them. Vpon these tidings aforesaid, hapning so just at one time, they were both disquieted and also refreshed. So they sent Mago with his fleet, and other forces into Spaine: and they chose for the expedition into Sardinia, Asdruball surnamed Calvus, for the L. Generall, furnished and appointed with as great a power almost as Mago had.

At Rome likewise, the Consuls having dispatched the affaires of the citie, addressed themselves to the war. T. Sempronius appointed Sinuessa to be the Rendezvous, where the souldiers should meete at a certaine day. And Q. Fabius, by an order and direction from the Senate, made an Edict, That all men should before the first day of Iulie next ensuing, gather all their come out of the countries, and convey the same into the principall walled strong townes: proclaiming that whosoever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay wast; sell their servants in portsale at the speare, and set their farmes and villages a fire. Not so much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiction and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of warre. As for Valerius the Pretor, he was appointed to goe into Apulia, for to receive the armie of Terenius: and when the legions were returned out of Sicilie, to employ them especially for the guard and defence of that countrey; and that the armie of Terenius should be sent with some one of the Lieutenants. And M. Valerius had 25 saile allowed him, to keep and defend all the sea coasts betweene Brundisium & Tarentum. The like number of ships was assigned

*Tarentum.

A to Q. Fulvius the citie Pretor, for to guard the river side, neere adjoyning to the citie of Rome. C. Terentius the Proconsull had in charge to take up by commission souldiers in the Picene countrey, and to guard those quarters. And T. Otacilius Crassus, after that hee had dedicated the temple of Minus in the Capitoll, was sent into Sicilie, as Lord Admirall of the Armado there.

Vpon this warre betweene two of the mightiest cities, and most puissant states of the world, there was not a king and prince, nor a Nation under heaven, but was amused. Among whom Philip king of the Macedonians, had an eie thereto, and was more intensive, in that he was neerer unto Italie, and onely divided from thence by the Ionian sea. Hee at the first, when the bruit came to his eares, That Anniball was passed beyond the Alpes: as hee joied much, that there was warre kindled betweene the Romanes and the Carthaginians, so, as long as it was uncertaine, whether nation was the stronger, he wavered in mind and was in suspence, whether of the twaine he should wish to have the victorie. But after that he heard once, that in three severall battailes one after another, Anniball and the Carthaginians had gotten the better hand, hee enclined to the fortunate side, and sent Embassadors unto Anniball: who falling off, and desirous to avoid the fortunate side, and sent Embassadors unto Anniball: who falling off, and desirous to avoid the havens of Brundisium and Tarentum, which were guarded and kept by the Romane fleet, arrived and landed at the temple of Iuno Lacinia: and so through Apulia, travailing toward Capua, chaunced to light upon the mids of the Romanes corps de guard, and were brought before M. Valerius Levinus the Lord Deputie, being then encamped before Nuceria. Where Xenophanes, the principall of the Embassadors, bashed not to say, That he was sent from king Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amitie with the people of Rome, and had commission & direction to the Consuls, to the Senate likewise and people of Rome, to that effect. Valerius taking great contentment to heare of this new societie and friendship with so noble a king, especially upon the rebellion of so many old allies, courteously intreated and friendly entertained this false hearted enemy, in steed of a trustie friend: & appointed diverse to accompanie him forward, to guide him carefully in the waies; and to shew him what places, what passages and streights were held, and kept, either by the Romanes, or the enemies. Xenophanes with these instructions, passed through the midst of the Romane guards into Campania, and so the next way arrived at the campe of Anniball, and made a league and amitie with him, under these conditions and capitulations. Imprimis, That king Philip should with a right puissant Armada (for that he was supposed able to set out 200 saile) passe over into Italie, wast and spoile all the sea coasts; and to his power maintaine war by sea and land. Item, That when the warre was finished, all Italie, together with the very citie of Rome should be possessed by the Carthaginians and Anniball, and unto him all the pillage and bootie likewise should belong. Item, When Italie was thus subdued, that they should faile into Greece, and wage warre with what Princes there they pleased, and that all the cities of the maine, and the islands which lay to Macedonie, should fall unto Philip, and bee annexed to his kingdome. In these termes, and upon these articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed betweene the Generall Anniball, and the Embassadors of the Macedonians: and with them were sent backe unto the king, for the better ratifying of the said covenants, certaine Legates, to wit, Gisco, Bostar, and Mago, who arrived together at the same temple aforesaid, of Iuno Lacinia, where there rid closely a ship at anker, expecting their returne. From whence being departed, they were not so soone launched out into the deepe, and had taken the open sea, but they were descryed by the Romane fleet that guarded the coasts of Calabria. Q. Fulvius Flaccus made out certain Goryreans, to pursue & search in that ship. Whereupon, the Macedonians began to flie, but seeing themselves overmatched in swiftnesse of saile, and not able to make way with them, they yielded themselves unto the Romans, & were presented unto the Admirall. Who demanded what they were, from whence they came, and whether they were bound. Xenophanes who had already spied so well by making of a lye, began to cog againe, and say: That he was sent from Philip unto the Romanes: that he came unto M. Valerius; because to him onely he was able to passe in safetie, but could not possibly get beyond Campania, being so strongly kept with garisons of the enemies. But afterwards, upon the sight of the Carthaginian habite and apparel, they began to suspect the embassadors of Anniball: and they being questioned withall, their speech and language bewraied them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatened to confesse. Letters also were found upon them, sent from Anniball unto Philip, concerning the peace betweene the king of the Macedonians and Anniball. Vpon these matters thus detected and certainly knowne, it was thought good to convey the Embassadors and their companie with all speede prisoners to Rome, unto the Senate there, or unto the Consuls where-soever they were. To this purpose were chosen five pinnasses that were most swift, under the conduct of L. Valerius Antias, who had his direction and charge to part these embassadors in severall ships, and keepe them sure asunder: and to take good heede, that they neither talked nor conferred together.

About the same time it happened at Rome, that An. Cornelius Mammula, upon his departure out of the province Sardinia, made report in what state the Iland stood, namely, that they all inclined to rebellion and warre: that Mutius who succeeded after him, presently upon his first coming, by reason of the ill aire and unholosome water, was fallen into a sickness, not so quick and dangerous, as chronick and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the service of warre: that the armie there, as it was sufficient to guard and keepe in good order a quiet and peaceable province, so it could not hold out with the warre that was like to ensue. Whereupon the LL. of the Senate gave order, that Q. Fulvius Flaccus, should levee and enroll 3000 foote, and 400 horse, and provide that this legion should passe over with all speede into Sardinia: and send therewith whom it pleased him to conduct and manage the warre until Mutius were recovered of his disease. For this intent was T. Manlius Torquatus sent governour; one, who had bene twice Consull and Cenfor, and in his Consulship had subdued the Sardinians.

Neere about the same time, there was an Armado set out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Asdruball surnamed Calvus, and being fore tossed and beaten with tempests, was cast upon the Balear Ilands: where (so farre out of order was not only the ship tacking, but also the very keeles and bodies of the ships so shaken) they drew up the ships to shore, and whiles they stayed there about calking and trimming them againe, they spent much time.

In Italie whiles the warres began to flake and waxe cold, by reason that after the battaile of Cannæ, the strength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the other, well allaid and made effeminate: the Campanians upon their owne heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Cumes under their obedience, first soliciting them to revolt from the Romanes: and seeing that course would not speede and take effect, they devised by a fraudulent practise to compasse and entrap them. The Campanians use yerele to solemnise a feast and sacrifice in a certaine place called Hamæ: and they gave notice unto the Cumaines, that the whole Senat of Capua would resort thither: requesting the Senat of Cumes likewise to meete them there, for to conferre and consult together in common; how both cities, the one and the other, might have the same friends and the same enemies, and no other: giving them withall to understand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men; for feare of some sodaine and dangerous attempt from the Romanes. The Cumaines, albeit they suspected some treacherie, denied nothing, supposing thereby to colour and cover their owne craftie intended designement. Now all this while, T. Sempronius, the Roman Consull, having surveied and purged his armie at Sinuessa, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces should meete together: passed over the river Vulturinus, and encamped neere unto Luiternum: where because the souldiers in the standing campe had nothing els to do, he exercised them to run often the race and skirmish in aray, to the end that the raw souldiers (for such were the voluntaries for the most part) might by use and practise learne how to follow their colonnes in good order, and in the time of battaile know their owne ranks and ensignes. In these kinds of training, the speciall care that the Generall had, and the onely thing that he aimed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpose, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captaines, that they should not cast in any mans teeth one or other, their fortunes and condition aforesaid, thereby to breede any discord & harburing among the companies: and that the olde experienced souldiers should suffer themselves to be but equal in estate to the new learners: and those that were borne free unto the voluntaries, who had bene slaves: reputing them all of birth good enough, and of gentle blood descended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchsafed to commit their armour and ensignes: saying, that the same fortunes which had driven them so to do, forced them likewise to maintaine the same, and make the best of it, now it was done. The captaines were not more carefull in giving these good lessons and instructions, but the souldiers were as diligent to observe the same: and within a while their hearts and affections grew to bee so linked and united together, that they forgot generally, in what degree

Agree and of what condition each souldier entred into service. Whiles Gracchus was busied hereabout, the Embassadors of Cumes certified him, what kinde of Embassage came unto them from the Campanians, a few daies before, and what answer they had returned: advorsing him that their festivall daie was to be holden three daies after: that not onely the whole Senat would be present, but also the campe and armie of the Campanians. Gracchus having commaunded the Cumaines to convey all that they had out of the fields & territories about, into their cittie, and themselves to keepe within their walles: himselfe the day before the solemnitie aforesaid of the Campanians, removed his power to Cumes, and there incamped. Now Hamæ is three myles off from thence. The Campanians by this time were assembled there in great number, according to appointment: and not farre from the place, Marius Alfius the chiefe head magistrat of Capua, was incamped closely with fourteen thousand souldiours. Hee, what with preparation of the sacrifice, and contriving withall the deceitfull traine of treacherie, was more busie & careful thereabout, than either in fortifying his campe, or in any other militarie action. Thus for three daies continued this festivall sacrifice at Hamæ. And ever in the night season it was performed: so, as before midnight all was done and finished. Gracchus supposing that a good time for his ambush to be enpioied, having set certaine warders before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence; caused the souldiours betwixt the sixth and tenth houre of the day, from hooke untill foure of the clocke, to refresh themselves and take their sleepe: that in the beginning of the darke night, they might assemble together at the watch-word or signall given them. And about the first watch hee commaunded to display their Ensignes and advance forward: and thus with a still march, hee arrived at Hamæ by midnight; surprised the hold of the Campanians, and entred all the gates at once, being negligently guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast asleepe: others, as they returned unarmed from the sacrifice. In this night tumult there were slaine more than two thousand, with Marius Alfius himselfe their leader: and 43 ensignes taken and carried away. Gracchus with the losse of fewer than one hundred of his souldiours, having won the campe, retired speedily to Cumes, for feare of Anniball, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capua. And (as hee was a provident man and of great foresight) nothing was he deceived in his opinion. For so soone as this defeat was reported at Capua, Anniball, supposing that he should at Hamæ find the armie of the Romanes (consisting for the most part of raw souldiers, and those bondslaves) jocund and lustie above measure, & insolent upon their fresh victorie, busie in riling their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pillage, removed his forces in hast, & marched a pace beneath Capua: and encountered with some of the Campanians that were fled, whom hee caused betwixt two guards to be conducted safe to Capua, and such as were hurt & wounded, to be set in waggons and carried thither. Himselfe found in Hamæ the campe empty and void of enemies; and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there scattered. Some there were that advised him presently to advance forward to Cumes, and to assault the towne. And albeit Anniball was willing enough thereto, and passing desirous (seeing hee could not come by Naples) to have Cumes at least a maritime port towne, as well as the other, yet because his souldiours had brought nothing with them but their weapons, as being led forth to march in such hast, hee retired backe againe to his fort and campe upon Tifata. From whence, at the importunate prayers of the Campanians, the day following hee furnished himselfe with all the ordinance and engines meet for the assault of a cittie, and returned toward Cumes; and having wasted the country thereto; hee encamped himselfe a myle from the towne. There Gracchus, more for shame, than hee might nor seeme to leave his associates in such necessitie, (who craved protection and trust that hee reposed in the strength of his armie, staid in Cumes. Neither Fabius, the other Consull, who was encamped at Cales, durst set his armie over the river Vulturinus: as having bene busied first at Rome in renewing the Auspices and bird-sights: and after that, troubled also about the fearefull prodigious signes, which were reported one after another.) And when hee sought expiation thereof by sacrifices, the Soothsayers made answer and said, That they could not perceive that the gods were appeased and pacified for all that hee did. Thus whiles Anniball upon these occasions was kept backe, Sempronius was besieged; yea and by this time assaulted, with fabrickes and engines of batterie. One mightie great towne of wood there was erected

sted against the town. Against which, the Roman Consul raised another from the very wall, some what higher than it: for that he used the wall (which of it selfe was of good height) in stead of a groundworke, and planted thereon strong postes and piles of timber to beare up the forside frame. From thence, at first the souldiours within, defended the towne & walles with stones, with long poles and perches and other instruments to launce against the assailants. But at length seeing the other turret coming forward even close to the towne wall, they flung thereon at once much fireworke, and burning matter: at which fires the multitude of armed men for fear leapt headlong downe the turret: and withall, they of the towne issued out at two gates at once, discomfited the guards of the enemies, and drave them into their campe: so that that day Anniball was more like one besieged himselfe, than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthaginians slain about fourteene hundred, fortie wanting one were taken prisoners alive, such as about the wals & their Corps de gard stood rechelesse & negligent, fearing nothing lesse than a sallie out of the towne, and were suddainly at unwaras taken and surprisid. Gracchus sounded the retreat, and caused his men to retire within the walles, before the enemies after their suddaine flight could be rallied together. The morrow after, Anniball (supposing that the Consul in his russe for this happie hand, would come into the field to fight a set battaile) arranged himselfe in array betwene his Campe and Cumes. But after that, he saw no stirring at all from the usuall guard and defence of the citie, and nothing put to the rash hazard of doubtfull hope, he retired to Tifara, without any good at all done.

At the very same time that the siege was raised before Cumes, Titus Sempronius surnamed Longus, fought fortunatly in Lucania before Grumentum, with Hanno the Carthaginian slew more than two thousand of his enemies, lost himselfe two hundred and eightie men, and went away with 41 ensignes. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himselfe backe into the countrie of the Brutij. And M. Valerius the Pretour, recovered by force from the Hirpines, three townes that had revolted from the Romanes. Terrellius and Sicilius the motives and chieftains of that rebellion were cut shorter by the head. More than one thousand captives were sold at the speare in port sale; to who that would bid most. All the pillage besides was given to the souldiours, and the armie brought backe to Cumes.

Whiles these things hapned in the countries of the Lucanes & Hirpines, those 5 ships above said (wherein were embarked the Embassadors of the Macedonians & Carthaginians as prisoners) having set a compasse from the upper Adriaticke sea unto the nether sea of Tulean ground about (in a manner) all the sea coast of Italie, hapned to saile along neere the citie of Cumes, and being not certainly knowne whither they were friends or enemies, Gracchus put forth out of his fleet two pinaces to encounter them. When as by demanding and questioning one with another, it was once certified unto them, that the Consul was within Cumes, and the ships then arrived in the haven, the prisoners were brought to the presence of the Consul, and all the letters delivered. The Consul after hee had read over the letters, both of Philip and Anniball, sealed them up againe sure, and sent them by land unto the Senate of Rome, but commaunded the Embassadors themselves to be conducted thither by sea. When as both letters, and also the Embassadors were arrived at Rome, in a manner, all in one day, and that (after due examination) words and writings agreed together in one: at the first, the LL. of the Senate were pensive and plunged deeply into cares, considering in how great danger they stood of a new Macedonian warre, who were hardly able to endure the Carthaginian. But in conclusion, so farre were they off from being utterly dismayed heereat, and sinking under the waters, that forthwith they beganne to treate and debate, how they might begin themselves to warre with these enemies first, and so stop them from their entrance into Italie. The captive Embassadors they laid up fast in yrons: their train and retinue were sold in over se market, and besides theesse and twentie ships, whereof Q. Puleius Flaccus was Admirall; they took order for want of men to be rigged and decked: which being provided, furnished and shot into the pottle about together with those five barks, wherein the prisoners were conducted: there were so saile in all, that lodged from Ostia and arrived at Tarentum. Quintus Fulvius had commission to embarke the souldiours of Karrh, who had bene under the leading of L. Apustius the Lieutenant at Tarentum, with this flecte of fiftie saile, not onely to defend the sea coast of Italie, but also to hearken and have an eye after the Macedonian warre: and in case he could learne that the designement and intent of Philip was suitable to those letters and informations of the Embassadors

A Embassadors, then he should by his letters certifie M. Valerius the Pretor so much; and that leaving with L. Apustius his Lieutenant the charge of the armie, he should go to the Armada at Tarentum, and with all speed possible set over into Macedonie, and there endeavor to keepe Philip play at home within his owne realme. As for that money which was sent unto Appius Claudius into Sicilie for to be repaid unto king Hiero, it was appointed unto him, for the maintenance of his Armada, and managing of the Macedonian warre. This monie was by L. Apustius the Lieutenant brought to Tarentum, and with it, there were sent from Hiero 156600 Modij of wheate, and 100000 of barley.

Whiles these preparations and doings passed at Rome, one ship of those prisoners which were sent to Rome, chanced to single it selfe from the other, and to escape away to Philip: where by he was advertised, that the embassadors or commissioners were taken, and the letters intercepted. But he not knowing what covenants had passed betwene Anniball and his legats, and what answer they should have brought unto him, sent forth another embassage with the same commission. The Embassadors sent unto Anniball, were Herastius surnamed Sicilius, Criso of Berrea, and Sesibulus of Magnesia. These went too and fro betwene in safetie, these caried and recaried their errands fortunatly. But the summer was come and gone, before the king could enter into a cition, or execute any enterprife. Of so great moment and importance was the boording of that one ship at the first with the embassadors, for the differing of that imminent warre intended against the Romanes.

When Fabius had passed over the river Vulturnus, after the expiation at length of the prodigious tokens aforesaid, both Consuls together made warre about Capua. Fabius by assault wonne these cities, Combulteria, Trebula, and Austicula, which had revolted unto the Carthaginians: and within them he surprisid the garison souldiours of Anniball. Many of the Campanes likewise were taken prisoners. At Nola (like as in the yeare before) the Senate held with the Romanes, but the Communitie tooke part with Anniball, and plotted secretly, how to murder the Nobilitie, and to betray the citie. But to stop the proceedings of these mischievous designements, Fabius led his armie betwene Capua, and the camp of Anniball upon the hill of Tifara, and fortified himselfe upon the mountaine Vesuvius, in that fort where Claudius had encamped before. From thence he sent M. Marcellus the Viz. Consul with those forces which he had, into Nola, there to ly in garison.

D Likewise in Sardinia, T. Manlius the L. Deputy began to administer those affaires, which had bene forelet, by occasion that Q. Mutius the Pretour was fallen sicke, and lay of a long and lingering disease. Manlius after he had drawne the gallies ashore at Caraleis, and put the mariners and rowers in armes for land service, and received of the Pretour his armie, was able to make 22000 foote, and 1200 horse. With this power of men of armes & footmen together, he entered into the enemies countrey, and not farre from the camp of Herseora, pitched his tents. Herseora himselfe was by chance gone then, into the countrie of the Pellidians (a people of Sardinia) to arme the youth there, for the mending of his strength; and left his sonne named Hiosius, ruler over the campe in the meane time. He a lustie hote youth, rashly joyned battaile, and quickly was discomfited and put to flight: thirtie thousand Sardinians in that field were slaine, and upon 1030 taken prisoners alive. The rest of the armie first fled stragling asunder over the fields, and through the woods; but afterwards, hearing by the voice that went, how their captain was fled to

E Cornus the head citie of that region, they retired thither also. And surely they had in that one battaile, made an end of all warre in Sardinia, but that the Armada of Carthage, under the leading of Asdruball (which by tempest had been cast upon the Baleare Islands) came in time to entertaine the Islanders, in hope to rebell. Manlius, after it was noised abroad, that the Carthaginian fleet was arrived, retired himselfe to Caraleis: which gave Herseora good opportunitie to venture to joine with Asdruball. Who having landed his souldiours, and sent the ships back againe unto Carthage, went forward by the guidance of Herseora, robbing and spoiling the lands of the Romanes confederates: and had come as farre as Caraleis, but that Manlius with an armie encountered him upon the way, and restrained him from so lavish overrunning and robbing the countrey. At the first they encamped one against the other, not farre asunder: afterwards they began to put out certaine bands and companies, and to maintaine light skirmishes with variable event, untill at last they pitched a set field, and in full battaile fought for the space of 4 hours. The Carthaginians held out conflict a good while; and the victorie still remained doubtfull

(for the Sardinians were ever used to have the soyle) but as it fell, seeing every quarter full of the Sardinians either lying along dead; or running away, they also were distressed; and as they turned their backs, and were about to flye, the Romans whetted about with that wing, where with they had defeated the Sardinians, and enclosed them abund, and so they fell rather to killing than fighting any longer. 12000 enemies were there slain: of Sardinians and Carthaginians together about 3700 were taken prisoners, and by military ensignes nobly. This was a noble and famous battaile, memorable especially above all, for taking of these prisoners, namely, Adrabal the L. Generall, Hanno and Mago, two noble men of Carthage. Mago was of the Barchine house, neere of kin and in blood to Anniball. Hanno was the solicitor of the Sardinians to rebellion, and no doubt, the principall author of that warre. Neither was this field less famous for the overthrow of the chiefe commanders of the Sardinians: for both Hesperus the sonne of Asdrubal was slaine in fight: and also Hesperus himselfe, as he fled, with a few horsemen, hearing besides other calamities and losses, of the death of his sonne in the night season, because he would have no man come betweene to stay his purposed intent, killed himselfe. All the rest fled to the citie. Comus, as they had done afore, and there as in a place of refuge sought to save themselves. But Manlius following the trace of his victory, came againe to it, and within few daies was maister of it. After this, other cities also which had revolted, and turned to Asdrubal and the Carthaginians, gave hostages, and yielded by composition. And when Manlius had levied off them certaine money for the souldiours pay and come likewise, according to the havour and abilitie or trespasse of each of them, he led his army back to Caraleis: and there having put the galleys on the water, and embarked the souldiers that he had brought with him, he sailed to Rome, and recounted unto the L.L. of the Senate the utter subduing of Sardinia. The money he delivered to the Treasurers, the come to the Asides, and the prisoners unto Fulvius the Pretor.

Much about that time, T. Octavius the Pretor, having sailed from Lilybaeum into Africke, and wasted the territorie of the Carthaginians, as he was bound from thence and set saile for Sardinia, whether Asdrubal as the newes went had lately crossed over from the Baleare Islands, he met with the Armada returning back into Africke: and after a skirmish made upon the sea by his souldiers lightly armed, he tooke there with seven galleys with their ores and maimers: the rest for feare were scattered, as it had bene with a tempest, all over the sea. And it happened about the same time, that Bomilcar with certaine companies of souldiers sent from Carthage for a supply, and fortie Elephants, and good store of victuals, came to Locri. For the surprising and setting upon him on a sodaine, Ap. Claudius leading his armie in hast, and marching to Messina, under a colour of visiting the Province, put over to Locres with the tide. Now was Bomilcar passed alreadie from thence into the Brutians countrie to Hanno, and the men of Locres shut the gates against the Romans. So Appius, after much ado and preparation, having effected nothing, returned back to Messina. In the same summer, Marcellus made many rodes from Nola (which he held with a garison) into the Hirpines countrie, and the Samnites, about Caudium, and made such wast there, with fire and sword, that they in Samnium called into their fellowship the old losses and overthrowes which they had received: whereupon there were sent immediatly from both nations embassadors together, unto Anniball, who in this wise delivered their speech unto him. We have bene enemies, O. Anniball to the people of Rome, first of our selves, and in our owne quarrell, so long as our armour and forces were able to defend us: but after that our hope therein began to faile us, we drew to a side, and took part with king Pyrhus. And when he forooke us once, we accepted of peace for very necessity: wherein we continued for fiftie yeares almost, even untill the time that you entered into Italie. Neither was it your prowess, virtue and fortune, rather than your singular courtesie and benignitie, extended toward our countrey men and fellow citizens (whom being taken prisoners, you released and sent unto us back againe) which hath caused us to entertaine your amitie: in so much, that so long as you remaine our friend, alive and safe, we would not stand in dread of the people of Rome; nor of the very gods themselves (if it be lawfull so to say) were they never so angry against us. Howbeit assuredly, for this summer season, we have bene divers and sundrie times so spoiled and wasted, not only whiles you are alive and safe, but also (which is more) present in place, where you might both heart, in manner, the wailing and weeping of our wives and children, and also see our houses set on a light fire. So it seemeth it was Marcellus and not Anniball, that had the victorie at Cannæ. And the Romans boast and say, that you are good at the first push only, and when

A you have once let flie and launced the javelin (as it were) out of your hands, you are cleane done, and can abide no longer. We warred almost an hundred yeares with the people of Rome, without help either of foreine captaine, or armie of strangers: save that for two yeares only, Pyrhus with the aide of our souldiours, rather increased his owne strength, than by any power of his defended us. But we list not to make vaunt and boast of fortunate successe and brave victories, namely, how we subdued and put under the yoke two Consuls, and two consular armies: nor of other noble exploits which hapned to our joy and honor. And as for the crosses and adversities that befell us during that time, we may report them with lesse griefe and indignation, than those that this day light upon us. Then in those dayes, mightie great Dictators with their Generals of horsemen, two Consuls at once, with their two royall hostes, entered our territories, having sent out beforehand their espials and skouts, and led forth their souldiours to make spoyle, under their colours and ensignes, arranged in good order of battaile, and seconded strongly behinde. Now are we exposed as it were to be a prey of one onely garison, and that but a small one, left for the gard and defence of Nola. For now they overrunne all our confines & borders, not by bands and companies in warlike wise, but like thieves and robbers, more carelessly and negligently, than if they raunged about for their pleasure in the Romane territorie. The only cause is this, because your selfe make no reckning to protect us: and all our owne youth (which if they were at home were able to defend us) serveth under your banner and stander. But I know neither you, nor your armie at all: if I should not be persuaded and beleve that he whom I wot well to have discomfited and put to flight so many Romane armies, were soone able to defeat and suppress these robbers that vagabond our country, stragling without leaders, and without their colours.

C disordredly whither they list, according to the vaine hope of pillage that haleth them here and there; and, as every one gapeth for prizes, which they shall never get. No doubt but if you put forth a few of your Numidians, they will soone fall into their hands: Send but unto us a garison to succour us, you shall quickly displace that other at Nola: in case you judge not us (whom you have thought worthy to be your confederates) now, unworthy to be defended, after you have received us into your protection. Hereto Anniball made this answer againe, and sayd, That the Hirpines and Samnites huddled up all at once together: they declared their calamities and losses, they craved ayd and succour, and they made complaint that they were neither guarded by him, nor regarded of him. Whereas they should have first made declaration of their daunces: after, sued for help: and last of all, if they might not obtaine, then and not afore they should have complained, that they had besought his helping hand in vaine. Howbeit hee promised, that hee would not bring his armie into the territorie, either of the Hirpines or the Samnites, least himselfe also should be chargeable and troublesome unto them, but into the next quarters belonging to the allies of the Romanes: by spoiling and wasting whereof, both he would fill his souldiours hands, and also with the terror thereof, set their enemies farre ynough off from them. And as for the managing of the Romane war, like as the battell of Thrasymenus was more noble than that of Trebia; and the field of Cannæ more memorable, than that of Thrasymenus: even so would he make the memoriall of Cannæ dimme and obscure, in regard of one greater victorie yet, and more renowned than the other. With this answer, and with honourable rewards besides, he dismissed the Embassadors, and gave them their dispatch.

E And leaving a small guard to keepe the hill Tifata, hee marched in person with the rest of his army against Nola. Thither also was Hanno come, out of the countrie of the Brutii, with the supply that he brought from Carthage, and the Elephants. Where, after Anniball had pitched his tents not farre from the towne, and made diligent enquire, he found, that the case was far other, than it was reported by the Embassadors of his associates. For Maxcellus bare not himselfe in any of his actions, so as it might be fully said, that he blindly committed ought to the hazard of fortune, or rashly adventured upon the enemy. For he never went a booting, without his skoutes and espials, without setting strong guards in due places, whereunto he might retire himselfe in safetie: but had a good eye afore him, and a wary regard and heedfull forecast, as if he went to the counter with Anniball in person. And even then at that time, when hee perceived, that the enemy approached and was coming, he kept his forces within the citie, commanding the Senators of Nola, to walke up and downe upon the wals, and to survey all over, & espie what the enemies did, or were about. Amongst whom it happened, that Hanno being come under the very wall, espied Herennius Bursus & Herius Perius, whom he called out to a parle. And when they were were gone forth unto him by the permission and leave of Marcellus, thus he spake unto them by his interpreter. First he highly extolled the vertue and fortune of Anniball, debasing & treading under foot the dignitie and majestie of the people of Rome, growing now old in time, and decaying in force and strength. Which if they were (quoth hee) on both sides equal, as sometimes they were, yet seeing they had good experience, how heave and greivous the government of the Romanes was to all their Allies, & again, how indulgent and gracious Anniball is, even to all the captives of the Italian nation & name, they should with rather to be in league & amitie with the Carthaginians, than with the Romanes. If both Cosse were with their armies at Nola, they were no more able to match with Anniball, than they were at Cannæ: much lesse might one Pretour, with a few raw and new souldiours hold out and keepe Nola against him. And as for the Nolaues themselves, it concerned them much more than it did Anniball, to consider, whether hee should win Nola by force, or enter upon it by surrender & composition. For to be Lord thereof he made no doubt, like as he was maister already of Capua and Nuceria: but what ods and difference there is betwene the state of Capua and of Nuceria, the Nolaues know best themselves, who are seated (as it were) in the midway betwene both. Loth hee was to bode so much unto Nola, what calamities might befall the citie, if it were conquered by assault: rather yet would hee give his word and promise, That if they would deliver Marcellus with his garrison, and yeeld up Nola into Anniball his hand, they should themselves, and none but they, yet downe and capitulate under what conditions they would entertaine alliance and friendship with Anniball. To this motion Herenius Bassus framed his answer in this sort. For many yeeres already there hath been continuall amitie betwene the people of Rome and Nola, and neither of both to this day, hath repented thereof. As for the Nolaues themselves, if they had been disposed to turne with the wind, and to change their faith and allegiance, together with their fortune, they would have done so long before this: for now it was too late to start and alter. If they had minded to yeeld themselves unto Anniball, they would never have sent for a garrison of Romanes: but since they were now come to protect and defend them, they had imparted & communicated all their state with them already, and would take such part, as they, so long as they had an houre to live. This embassage Anniball cleane besides all hope of gaining Nola by treason. Therefore he beleaguered the town on every side, and invested it round about like a garland, to the end, that in one instant he might give the assault on every part of the wals. When Marcellus saw him under the wals, he set his people first in battell aray within the gate, and then with a great noise and tumult he suddenly sallied out. At their first shooke and onser, diverse of the enemies were beaten downe and slaine: but after that, they ran from all parts to battell, and were come together with equall forces, the fight began to be hore and sharpe, and a memorable conflict it had beene; and few like it, but that it rained and poured downe so fast, and with so many stormes and tempests, that it parted both the battells, & staid the fight. So for that day, having with that small skirmish kindled their courages, and set their blood in heat, they retired backe, the Romanes within the citie, and the Carthaginians to their campe. Howbeit, of the Carthaginians there were slaine, upon the first fall, and charge given, not above thirtie, and of the Romanes not one man. This tempestuous shooke of raine lasted all night long, and continued still, & never gave over untill nine of the clocke before noone the next day. And therefore, albeit they were sharpe set, and their fingers itched on both sides to be a fighting, yet for that day they kept within their hold and strength. So the third day Anniball sent out certaine companies into the territorie about Nola, for to loy and fetch in booties: which, so soone as Marcellus understood, he presently set his men in array and entered the field, neither was Anniball for his part behind. Now there was a mile distance, or very neere, betwene the citie and the enemies campe. In this space betwene (for all about Nola is plaine and champion) they encountered and joined battell. They shew that they set up on both sides, as claimed and caused to returne unto the fight already begun, the rearest of those cohorts and bands, which were gone a foraging into the country. The men of Nola likewise came unto the Romanes, and mended their battell, whom Marcellus commended for their forwardnes, & gave them in charge to abide in the reeward, to helpe as occasion served, and to come forth of the skirmish those that were hurt and wounded, and to forbear fight in any case, unless they had a signall and token given them by him. The fight was doubtfull, for both the Generals gave encouragement effectually, and also the souldiours did their best and fought right manfully. Marcellus was earnest with his men to presse hard and charge still upon their enemies, whom they had

A had defeated not three daies agoe, who not many daies past were put to flight, and driven from Cumæ, and who the yeare before were beaten from Nola, under his conduct, by other souldiours, saying. That they were not all there in the field, but many of them gone ranging abroad into the country, for to hale booties, and get prizes. As for them that fought, they were such as were decayed with rioting and following their delights in Capua, such as with wine-bibbing in everie taverne, whoorehunting in everie Stewes and Brothelhouse; all the whole winter, were become enfeebled in bodie, spent, and wasted utterly. As for that lively strength and vigour of theirs, it was cleane gone: those able and lustie bodie were decayed, those courageous hearts abated, wherewith they passed over the Pyrenean mountaynes, and the high cliffes of the Alpes. There remained now nothing but the reliques & shadow of those men to fight, who are scarce able to beare their verie armour, to lift up their armes, and carrie their owne bodie. Adding withall, that Capua was another Cannæ unto Anniball: there died his warlike prowess, there lost he his stillaire discipline; there was the glorious fame of former daies buried; there the hope of future time for ever suppressed and stifled. As Marcellus by reproving these and such like things in his enemies, animated his owne souldiours: so Anniball rebuked his men with more sharpe words and bitter checkes. I know these to bee (quoth hee) the same armes and weapons, the very same ensignes and standards, which I saw and had at Trebia, at Thrasymenus, and last of all at Cannæ. But surely, me thinks, when I went to Capua, there to winter, I carried with me thither, other manner of souldiours than I have brought againe from thence. Have yee in deed so much a do to maintaine fight, with a Roman Lieutenant, leader of one only legion & cohort, whom heretofore two full Consular armies were never able to abide in the field. Shall Marcellus with young and raw souldiours of his owne, seconded only with the aide of the Nolaues, challenge and bid his battaile the second time? Where is that souldiour of mine, that unhorsed C. Flaminius the Consill, and strake off his head? What is become of him that at Cannæ slew C. Paulus? what is the edge of your sword dull, and the point blunt? or are your right hands aslespe and benumbed? or what strange and wonderfull accident is befallen you? Ye that were wont being few in number to vanquish many, are yee now being many in number, hardly able to withstand and abide the violence of a few? Ye spake big, and gave out great brags and proud words, that if any man would lead you, you would winne Rome; that you would, Behold now, a smaller peece of service. Here I would have you prove your strength, and make trial of your valour. Let us see how winne me Nola, a citie situate in the champion, on a plaine, defended neither with sea nor river. Out of this so weakie a citie, will I be ready either to lead you, laden with rich pillage & spoyle, whither soever yee will; or follow you, wher soever yee would have mee. But nothing availed either his cheerefull words, on his cheeking rebukes, to encourage and comfort his hearts. For the Carthaginians being forced on every side to receyve (whiles the Romanes grew more and more animated, not onely through the comfortable speeches of their owne captaine, but also by the Nolaues themselves, who with their lowd shouting in token of their love and affection, enkindled their courages to hore fight) turned their backs, and were driven into their hold. And when the Romanes were desirous to assaile the same, Marcellus recomended them to Nola, with great joy & congratulation even of the Commons thier, who before, were more inclined and affected to the Carthaginians. There were of the enemies slaine that day, above one thousand, sixteen hundred were taken prisoners, sixteen militarie ensignes won, weapons pliant gotten alive, and foure slaine in the conflict. Of Romanes there were not killed all quene a thousand. The morrow after, they spent (upon a truce concluded) in burying the dead that were slaine on both sides. Of the spoyle of the enemies, Marcellus made a great fire, upon a my pronounced, unto Fulcanus. On the third day, twelve hundred of Numidians and Spaniards, came with another (upon some spleene and anger I believe, for hope of more liberall entertainment and commodious gaine), fled from Anniball and turned to Marcellus, whose valiant and faithful service, stood the Romanes in very good stead, often times during that war. After the warre was ended, the Spaniards in Spaine, and the Numidians in Affricke, in reward of their vertue and prowess, were endued with faire lands and large possessions. Anniball sent Hannibal Fabius so soone as he heard that Anniball had taken his way into Apulia, conveyed all the souldiours from Nola and Naples into his campe, which he had pitched above Suessula: and had ving well fortified the hold, and left there a sufficient garrison, to guard the place for that winter time, removed himselfe neerer to Capua, & there encamped: and so wasted the Campaner ritorie with fire and sword, that the Campanes little trusting in their owne forces, were constrained to issue forth of their gates, and fortifie themselves in campe before the citie, in the open plaine. Six thousand they were in all. Their footemen were weak & not for service: their horsemen were farre better and more able: so that oftentimes they charged their enemies with their horse, and provoked them to fight. Among many brave men of armes that the Campanes had, one labellus surnamed Taurca, a citizen of Capua, was the worthiest and best horseman of them all, by many degrees: inso much, as when hee served under the Romanes, Claudius Afellus onely, a citizen of Rome, was able to match him in glorie of good horsemanship, and horse service. This Taurca when he had ridden all about the troups of his enemies, casting his eye every way, to see if hee could espie Claudius Afellus, enquired at length closely, after silence made, where about hee was, & made this challenge unto him, That seeing hee was wont in words to contend with him for valour and prowess, hee should now determine the question by the speare point and dint of sword, and either bee dispoiled of his glorious armoury if hee were overcome, or else gaine the same with the victorie. Which defiance being brought into the campe to Afellus his eares, hee made no more to do, but went presently to the Confull, to know whether hee might with his good leave and licence, out of his ranke fight extraordinarily, with his enemy that had him combat. After leave obtained, hee armed himselfe immediately, mounted on horsebacke, and rode before the enemies corps de guard, effusions calling upon Taurca by name, and bidding him come forth to encounter whensoever hee durst. Now were the Romanes by this time gone forth of the campe in great number to behold this combat: the men of Capua likewise filled not onely the rampier of their hold, but also the walles of the citie to see this fight. When as they had made some goodly flourish afore hand with brave words and stout speeches, to set out the action: they set speare in rest, and put spurres to horse, and jousted together a maine. Afterwards having gotten the libertie of the ground, they dallied one with another, trifling out the time, and making a long peece of worke of it, without giving or taking wound. Then quoth the Campan knight to the Romane, This will bee but a fight of horses, and not of horsemen, unless we ride out of the open plaine ground, here into this hollow way, where having no such scope to prick out at large, we shall soone come to hand gripes, and close together. The word was not so soone spoken, but Claudius turned his horse head, and rode into the foresaid way. But Taurca a stouter champion in word than deed: Oh, take heed of all things (quoth he) how you ride a gelding in a ditch: Which grew afterwards to a by-word used amongst the cuntry people. Claudius after he had rode in and out, up and downe, a long time in the lane, and never met with his enemy returned again into the open plain: & rating the cowardise of his enemy, with great joy and gratulation, rode back as conqueror into the campe. Some Annales and Chronicles do record and adde to this combat of horsemen, a straung and wonderfull thing (no doubt) if it bee true, as by the common opinion it is reputed no lesse: namely, that when Taurca fled back into the citie, Claudius followed hard after him in chase, entered with him at one gate standing open, and rode out cleere at the other unhurt, to the great wonder and astonishment of the enemies. Upon this the standing camps were quiet on both sides: & the host moved backward farther off from the citie, that the men of Capua might sow their grounds: neither did he any harme unto their fields, before the corn was come up & so well grown, that the blade thereof yielded good forage & fodder for the horses, which he gathered & brought into the standing camp and hold of Claudius above Suessula, & there hee built winter harbors for to make his abode. And hee gave order to Claudius the Viz-consull, to keepe still at Nola a competent garrison for defence of the citie, and to charge the rest of the foldiers, & send them to Rome, that they should neither be combatants to their Allies, nor chargeable to the Commonweale. Tib. Gracchus also while hee led his legions from Cumes into Apulia to Luceria, sent M. Valerius the Pretour from thence to Brundisium, with that armie which he had at Luceria, commanding him to keepe the sea coast of the Sallentine cuntry, and to provide for all things necessarie against Philip and the Macedonian warre. In the end of this summer, wherein these acts were achieved, whereof I have written: there came a packet of letters from P. and Cornel. Scipius, importing how great and how fortunate exploits they had performed in Spaine: but there wanted money for pay: and appaerell and victuals to serve both souldiours and mariners. And albeit all these things were away, yet as concerning money,

A money, in the Citie chamber and common treasure were not stored, they would make some shift to raise it of the Spaniards: but for all the rest, needs it must be sent from Rome, for otherwise neither could they keep the army together, nor hold the province in their allegiance. When the letters were read, there was no man there, but acknowledged that they wrote a truth, and demanded that which was reasonable. But they considered withall, what great armies both on land and at sea they maintained, and what a mighty Armie they must prepare & set out anew, in case the Macedonian warre went forward. As for Sicillie and Sardinia, which before the wars began, paid tribute were scarce able to find and keepe the garrisons, that were for the guard of the provinces, and that they were to trust upon their owne revenues and tribute for the maintenance of the charge they were at. But as the number of them that paid rent and conferred tribute, was greatly diminished by so great overthrowes of the annies, both at the poole Thrasymene, and also at Cannae, so those few that remained if they were burdened with many exactions and payments, should be plagued and undone another way, therefore it was concluded, that unlesse the Commonweale maintained not her selfe by her credite and borrowing money, she were not able to be sustained by her owne wealth and riches. So it was agreed, That Fulvius the Pretour must needs assemble all the people together, and lay abroad and declare unto them the necessitie and exigent that the Commonweale was driven unto, and to exhort all them that had enriched themselves and encreased their livings, by renting and taking to ferme the revenues and commodities of the citie, should now doe good to the Commonweale for a time, by which they were grown to that wealth, and undertake the provision at a price, and furnish the armie in Spaine, with all necessities thereto belonging, to bee contented and paid therefore with the first out of the common chest, when it were stored with money. Thus the Pretour made declaration of these matters in the open assemble of the people, and withall determined and set downe a certaine day, whereupon hee minded to put forth the souldiours liveries and appaerell, and come to be provided for the Spanishe armie, and all things else requisite for the mariners. When the day was come, there presented themselves unto him three companies of nineteene men, for to take this bargain. Who made two requests & demands, the one, that for that three yeeres next ensuing, there should bee no other Publicanes, or farmers of the citie: the other, that whatsoever they shipped, the Commonweale would make good, against all force of enemy, or violence of tempest. Both being graunted, they tooke upon them the matter, and for the Commonweale was served, by the money of private persons. This was the demeaure, this was the loving affection to their cuntry, that went through all degrees of men (as it were) after one sort and manner. And like as they undertooke with great courage to serve the armie, so with singular fidelitie they performed every thing, in such sort, as there was nothing at all wanting, no more than if they had been maintained from a rich treasure, as in times past. At what time, as this provision came, the towne of Illiturgi was assailed by Asdruball, Mago, and Amilcar the sonne of Bomilear, because it was revolted unto the Romanes. Amidst these three severall campes of the enemies, the two Scipios passed into the citie of their allies, that made resistance against and with great losse of men, and brought come with them, whereof there was great want: and after they had encouraged and exhorted the townsmen, that with the same resolution they would defend the walls, as they had seene the Romanie armie to fight for them and in their quarell: they led forth their power to give an assault upon the greatest camp, whereof Asdruball was the Generall. Thither also repaired the two capitaines and two armies of the Carthaginians, when they saw that the whole triall of the matter was there to be determined, and so they issued out of their tents & fought. Three score thousand enemies were that day in field, and about 16000 Romanes: and yet the victorie went so cleere with the Romanes, that they slew more of their enemies than they were in number themselves, tooke prisoners more, than three thousand men, and not many under a thousand horse; and withall won 60 militarie ensignes wanting one, and killed 5 Elephants in the battell, and to conclude, were lords that day of three camps. After that the siege was raised from Illiturgi, the Carthaginian armies were led to the assault of the towne Incibili, having their companies made up and supplied againe out of the province, (as being a nation of al others most desirous and eager of war, so there be hope of pillage or good recompence) & at that time especially full of yong & lustie men. Where there was a second field fought with like fortune of both sides as before. There were slaine above thirtene thousand enemies, and more than 3000 taken prisoners, besides two and fortie militarie ensignes, and nine Elephants. Then in manner, all the cities of Spaine, G revolted to the Romanes. And farre greater exploits were that summer performed in Spaine, than in Italie.

Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the foure and twentieth Booke.

Herome, king of the Syracusians (whose grandfather Hiero had bene a friend unto the people of Rome) revolted unto the Carthaginians, and for his crueltye and pride, was by his own people murdered. Titus Sempronius Gracchus the Proconsull, had a fortunate battaile nere Beneventum, against the Carthaginians and Hanno their Generall, through the helpe especially of the bondslaves, whose for their good service, he commaunded to be made free. Claudius Marcellus the Consull, laid siege unto Syracuse in Sicilie, which wholly in manner was fallen away and turned to the Carthaginians. Warre was proclaimed against Philip king of the Macedonians, who in a night skirmish was surprised, discomfited, and put to flight, and with his armie welnere disarmed, escaped into Macedonia. To maner that warre, Valerius the Pretor was slain. This booke containeth also the acts achieved in Spaine by P. and Cn. Scipions against the Carthaginians. Syrachus king of the Numidians, having entred into amitie with the Romanes, fought against M. Juncus king of the Macesians: who stood for the Carthaginians, and being overcome, passed over into Spaine with a most mightie armie unto Scipio, lying over against Gades, where the narrow sea runneth betwene Affricke and Spaine. The Celtiberians also were received into friendship, whose aids the Romanes sent for: and this was the first time that mercenarie souldiours were waged, and served in the Roman warres.

Lanno was not so soone returned out of Campane, into the countrie of the Brutij, but by their helpe and guidance he sollicitated rebellion the Greek cities, which continued the more willingly in league and alliance with the Romanes, because they saw, that the Brutij, whom they both hated and feared, sided with the Carthaginians. And first hee assailed and went in hand with Rhegium, where he spent certaine daies to little or no purpose. In this mean time, the inhabitants of Locri, were busie in carrying away with great haste the corne, wood, and fellow, and all things else, necessarie for the use of man; out of the countrey into the citie; because they would leave nothing for the enemy to prey upon. And daily more & more of them went out of the gates by heapes, so as at last there were no more left in the citie, than those that were compelled to repaire the breaches of the wals and the gates, and to bring into the turrets & bulwarks store of darts and other shot. Against this multitude and confused medley of all ages, sexes, and degrees, ranging over the fields, whereof most were altogether unarmed, Amilcar the Carthaginian, sent out his Cavallerie, giving them direction, and charging them to hurt no person. These horsemen opposed their troups betwene them and home, onely to exclude them out of the citie, when they were scattered one from another in flight. The Generall himselfe in person encamped on a high ground, from whence hee might view the countie and the citie. And gave commaundement to a cohort of the Brutij, to approach the wals, to call forth the principall citizens of Locri to parle, and by making promise of Anniball his friendship, to persuade and exhort them to yeeld up the towne. At the first they gave no credite at all unto the Brutij, whatso-

Aever they said. But afterwards, when they discovered Hanno and the Carthaginians upon the hills, and heard by some few of their owne citizens that were fled backe and escaped, how all the rest of the multitude were fallen within daunger of the enemies, they made answer, that they would conferre and consult thereupon with the bodie of the people. So immediately they were assembled together. The most light headed persons were desirous of a change and new alliance: they also, whose kinsfolke and friends were by the enemy intercepted and kept out of the citie, had their minds engaged and bound sure ynough, as if they had put in hostages: and some few who were well affected inwardly in heart, & liked of constancie and true loialtie, yet durst not be knowne thereof, and shew themselves to stand to it: so as, they all agreed in outward appearance, to surrender themselves to the Carthaginians. And after they had closely conveyed into the haven, and embarked L. Stilius the capitaine of the garrison, and all the Romane souldiours that served under him, to the end, that they might bee transported to Rhegium, they received Amilcar and the Carthaginians into the citie, with this condition; that presently there should be concluded a league, upon equall and indifferent covenants and capitulations betwene them. But the promise in this behalfe (when they had once yeelded themselves) was nothing well performed: whiles Amilcar charged the Locrians, with fraudulent dismissing and letting goe the Romanes: & they againe alleaged for their excuse, that they fled away, and made an escape. The horsemen also followed hard in chase by land; if haply either the tide might cause the ships to stay in the current within the streight, or drive them a land. But those whom they pursued, they could not overtake: marry, other ships they espied, crossing the streights from Messina to Rhegium. Roman souldiours they were, sent from Claudius the Pretor, to lie in garison there, and to keepe the towne. Whereupon they presently departed from Rhegium.

As for the citizens of Locri, they had peace graunted them by expresse order and direction from Anniball upon these conditions: Imprimis, That they might live free under their owne lawes: Item, That both the citie and the haven should remaine still in the hands of the Locrians. The substance of the covenant rested and was established upon these tearmes, That the Carthaginians and Locrians should aid and assist one another mutually, both in peace and warre. So the Carthaginians retired from the streights, notwithstanding the muttering & murmuring of the Brutij, because they had left Rhegium and Locri untouched, which two cities they made full account to have sacked and rised. And therefore they of themselves having levied and put in armes a power of fiftene thousand of their owne youth, marched forward to assaile Croton, a Grecian citie likewise, and seated upon the sea. Assuring themselves, much to better their estate, if they could bee possessed of a port and sea-towne, fenced with strong wals and bulwarks. This onely troubled and perplexed their minds, that they durst not, but send unto the Carthaginians for aid: fearing, lest they might seeme to have entered into action and warre, without regard of the common good of their confederates, if they called them not: and doubting besides, that if the Generall of the Carthaginians should proove againe, rather an arbitratour of peace, than a coadjutour in warre, they should fight in vaine against the libertie of Croton, as they had done before, against the citie of Locri. Whereupon they thought best to send Embassadors unto Anniball for his warrant, and to be secured from him, that if Croton were recovered by the Brutians, it should be subject unto them. Anniball made answer that this matter required consultation of men present with them in place, and therefore he put them over to Hanno, from whom they received no certaine answer to trust unto. For willing they were not, that a noble and rich citie, as it was, should be spoiled: and besides, they were in good hope, that in case the Brutians should assaile it, and the Carthaginians all the while nor scene, either to allow or help them in their enterprise, the citizens would the more willingly revolt unto them. The inhabitants within Croton were not of one mind, and affected alike. For there was one maladie that had infected all the cities of Italie, namely, the disension betwene the Commons and the Nobles. The Senatours inclined to the Romanes, the Commons on the other side tooke part with the Carthaginians. This division within the citie, the Brutij were by a fugitive runaway advertised of in these tearmes: namely, that Aristomachus the ringleader and head of the Commons, minded to betray the citie: that it was a wide vast and desolate towne, taking a great circuit of ground: and all the wals being decayed and in sundry places broken downe, the Senatours and the Commons kept their severall guards and watches in sundrie quarters far asunder. And looke (quoth he) where the Commons ward, there ye may enter at your pleasure. Upon this intelligence and direction given by the fugitive, the Brutij envied the citie round about: and being let in by the Commons, at the first assault were masters of all places, saving the Castle. The Nobles held that peece, foreseeing what might happen, and therefore provided themselves of a sure refuge. Thither fled Aristomachus also, pretending that he ment to deliver the citie to the Carthaginians and not to the Brutij. Now this citie Croton had a wall (before Pyrrhus coming into Italie) twelve miles in compasse; but after it was laid wast by that warre, scarce the one halfe of the towne was inhabited. The river that was wont to run through the mids of the towne, passed now along the walls without those streets where the houses stood thick and well peopled, far from the parts inhabited.

Six miles without the towne there stood a noble temple of Lacinia Inno, more renowned than the citie it selfe, as being honored with great religion and devotion of all the cities and nations there about. A sacred grove there was in that place compassed with a thick wood, of tall Firre trees, having in the mids within it divers pleasant and fruitfull pastures, wherein were fed beasts consecrated unto the goddesse, of all sorts, without any keeper and pastour. And albeit this cattail went forth in the morning by herds and flocks of their owne kinde, severed by themselves, yet at night they used to returne back againe to their owne pennis and stalls, without harme received either by the wait-laying of wilde and ravenous beasts, or by deceitfull fraude of men. Great increase therefore and much commoditie accrued by those cattail, in somuch as thereof was made a massy Colunne or pillar of beaten gold, and consecrated in that place, so as the temple was famous, as well for riches, as holinesse and devotion. And many times it falleth out, that to such notable places there are attributed some strange miracles. For the report goeth, that there standeth an alter in the very porch of the temple, the ashes lying whereupon, no wind was ever knowne to blow away.

But to returne to Croton. The Castle thereof on the one side standeth upon the sea, on the other side it bendeth and looketh toward the land. Defended in times past it was, only by the natural situation of the ground, but afterwards fortified also with a wall; on that part whereas Dionysius the tyrant of Sicilie, having gained the back rocks and cliffes behind, by craft and guile sometime wan it. This Castle at that time supposed to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles seized and kept, notwithstanding the Brutij and their owne commons besieged them. At length the Brutij seeing the Castle imprenable, by all the forces and assaults that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessitie to crave aid of Hanno. Who having assaied to draw and urge the Crotoniates to yeeld, upon these conditions, To suffer a Colonie of the Brutij thither to be brought, & there planted; and that thereby a citie lying so wast & desolate, might be replenished and peopled againe, as in auncient time: could not move and perswade any one of them all, but Aristomachus. For all besides, protested and said, they would dye before they would be intermingled with the Brutij, to change their owne rites and manner of life, their customes, their lawes, and within a while their language also, for others that were strange and foreine. Aristomachus alone, seeing that he could not prevale neither by perswasions to induce them to yeeld, nor find any meanes to betray the Castle like as he had done the towne before, fled away to Hanno. Shortly after, certaine embassadors from Locri, by the licence and permission of Hanno, entered the Castle, and perswaded them to be content for to be translated to Locri, rather than to abide and stand out the extremitie: saying, that they had sent embassadors already to that intent, unto Anniball, and had gotten a graunt at his hands, that they might so do. So they abandoned Croton, and the Crotoniates were brought downe to the sea side and embarked, and the whole multitude departed to Locri.

In Apulia, the very winter season was not quiet betweene the Romanes and Anniball. Sempronius the Consull wintred at Luceria, and Anniball not farre from him in Arpi: and as they could spie opportunitie, or take their vantage, of the one side or the other, there passed some light skirmishes betweene them. But the Romanes had alwaies the better, and every day more than other, became more warie and secured from all traines and deceitfull snares of the enemy.

In Sicilie the Romanes found a great change, and all out of order, by reason that king Hiero was dead, and the crowne translated to his nephew, or sonnes sonne, Hieronymus: being yet a child, not like to use his owne libertie with moderation, and much lesse to sway the kingdome and scepter with discretion. His guardians and friends gladly entertained the protection and government of such a nature, and were readie enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and

A wickednesse. Which king Hiero foreseeing, was willing (by report) in his latter dayes, to have left Syracuse free and at libertie, to the end that so noble a kingdome, acquired & established by good meanes, should not under the lordly dominion of a child, to the great obloquie and shame of the world, be ruinate and come to nought. But his daughters with toooth and naile crossed this of his designement, and made full reckning, that the child should only beare the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly rest in them and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: who were the principall guardians, left to oversee the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not, for an aged man, now fourscore yeares old and ten, so hardly laid at day and night, by the faire speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keepe his mind free, and to applie and convert it to intend private regards, and the publicke consideration of the State. And therefore he left fiftene tutors to oversee and governe the child, whom he besought upon his death-bed, even when he was going out of this world, to mainteine entier and unspotted, the faithfull allegiance to the Romanes, which he had kept and observed inviolate for the space of fiftie yeares: and to set to their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to follow that discipline wherein he had bene nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yeilded up his breath, the guardians came abroad, brought forth the kings last will and testament, and shewed the young Prince in the open assemblie of the people (and welneere fiftene yeares of age he was:) Where some few, such as were bestowed here and there of purpose, within the prease of the assemblie for to shew and shew testimonie of all their joy and good liking, approved with open voyce, and allowed the kings will: whereas all the rest, fared as orphans in a citie bereaved of their king, and (as it were) become fatherlesse, and feared all things that might ensue. The King was interred; and his funerals solemnised, with the love and kinde affection of his people and subjects; more than with any studious care and diligence of his owne friends that were nearest to him. After this, Andronodorus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himselfe; giving out estoones, that Hieronymus was past a child, and able to governe of himselfe as King. Thus by deposing the Protektour-ship, which was commitee to him and many others, he tooke upon him and usurped the power and authoritie of them all. Hard it was even for a right good king and well governed, that should succeed after Hiero, to find favour and win grace among the Syracusians: so heartily they affected and loved king Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if hee had bene willing and desirous, that by his vicious and wicked life, they should have a great misse of his grandfather, and with againe for him; at the very first sight, when hee shewed himselfe abroad in open place, declared unto the world, what difference and great oddes there was. For they who so many yeares together had never seene Hiero, nor his sonne Gelo, either in habit of apparrell, or in any other ornaments and port, differing from all other citizens; now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regall crown & diademe, attended with his guard and traine of armed pensionars; yea and other while, after the manner of Demis the Tyrant, riding forth of his court & pallace; in a chariot drawne with foure white steeds. This proud pomp and stately array was accompanied and suited with semblable qualities and conditions. He contemned and despised all men: he scorned most proudly to give audience to humble suppliants; and sent them away with reprochfull termes & taunts. And not only strangers, but also his very guardians hardly might have access unto him: and to conclude, his lusts and delights whereunto hee gave himselfe, were new and strange: his crueltie that hee exercised outrageous and inhumane. So dread and terrible was hee to all, that some of his Turours, either by making themselves away, or by voluntarie exile were driven to prevent and avoid the danger of cruell torments. Of whom, three onely, who alone had more familiar recourse into the court, to wit, Andronodorus and Zoilus, the sonnes in law of king Hiero, that had married his daughters, and one Trasus, had little or no care given unto them in other matters; but whiles two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Trasus to the Romane alliance: with their arguing, debating and dispute, they otherwhile turned the mind of the young king to hearken & give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conspiracie intended against the life and person of the Tyrant, and the same detected by one Calo, the companion & playfere of Hieronymus, & of the same age: one who ever from his childhood had bene familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his secrets. This revealer of the conspiracie, could appeach and nominate of all the conspiratours onely Theodorus, by whom himselfe was made privie to the treason, and solicited to be a complice therein. The par-tie was apprehended incontinently, and delivered unto Andronodorus to bee tortured. Who at the first without delay, confessed himselfe to be guiltie, but concealed all the rest that were accessories. At the last, when hee had bene torne, mangled, and dismembred, with most dolorous torments, and intollerable for any man to endure: pretending and making semblance, that hee could abide no longer paines; disclosed not for all this, the guiltie persons in deed, but accused the innocent, and said falsely, that Thraso was the first deviser of the whole plot: and unless they had borne themselves, and relied upon so mightie an head, to set them on worke, they would never have attempted so daungerous an enterprise. Hee appeached also some other of the Tyrant his guard and houshold servants and daily waiters: even such as came into his mind during the time of his dolors and paines, & whom amid his grones he imagined to bee such, as whose lives might be best spared, and deaths least lamented. The naming of Thraso especially made the Tyrant to beleve, that the detection founded to a very truth in deed: whereupon the man was immediately led to execution and put to death: & the other innocents, as cleere as himselfe, tasted of the same cup and suffered with him for companie. As for the conspiratours themselves, albeit one of their fellowes was a long while put to bitter and extreme torture, there was not one of them, that either hid his head or made an escape: so assured confidence had they in the resolute constancie and faithfull promise of Theodoris: and such power and strength had Theodoris himselfe, to keep close the secrets committed unto him. Now when Thraso was ones dispatched out the way, who onely was the meane to hold them in, and to bind them to their alliance and allegiance to the Romanes: then forthwith they began openly to encline to rebellion, and sent as Embassadors for the same purpose, two noble young gentlemen, Hipocrates and Epicides unto Anniball. From whom also they were sent backe againe in embassage. These were both borne at Carthage, but descended in blood from the Syracusians by their grandfather, that was from thence banished: and were themselves by the mother side, meer Carthaginians. By entercouise of these two Embassadors, a league was concluded between Anniball and the Tyrant of Syracuse. And Anniball was content that they should abide still as leggers in the Tyrants court.

When Appius Claudius the Pretour and lord Deputie of the province of Sicilie, heard these newes, hee addressed straightwaies embassadors unto Hieronimus: who saying that they were come to renew the alliance which they had with his grandfather, had scornfull audience given them to deliver their message, and were dismissed and sent away by Hieronimus with a frumpe, demanding of them by way of a scoffe, How they had sped at the battaile of Cannæ. For I can hardly beleve (quoth he) that all is true which the embassadors report of that field: and I would gladly know the certaine truth, & thereupon deliberate & take counsell, which side I were best to take. The Roman Embassadors said, they would repaire againe unto him, when he could begin once to give audience with gravitie & in good earnest to their embassage: and so after they had warned and admonished, rather than praised and entreated him, not to change, but to stand to the first covenant and promises, they departed. Then Hieronimus sent his Legates to Carthage, for to confirme the league with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and amitie made with Anniball. In which it was capitulate and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romanes out of Sicilie (which would shortly come to passe, in case they sent thither ships and a power of men) the river Himera, which (as it were) divided the Iland in the mids, should confine and limit, both the Saracusan kingdome, and the dominion of the Carthaginians. After this, being puffed up with the faire flattering speeches of such as were about him, who suggested unto him, to remember & call to mind, that not only king Hiero was his grandfather, but also king Pirrhus by the mother side: hee sent Embassadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to understand, That he demed it right & meet, that all Sicilie wholly should lie unto his dominion: and that the Empire of Italie onely, belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levitie and vainglorious humour, they neither wondred at, as a straunge thing in a giddie brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, so long as they might estrange him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendship of the Romanes. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter confusion. For whiles Hipocrates and Epicides were sent afore with two thousand soldiours, for to sound and sollicite the cities to rebellion, that were held by the garrisons of the Romanes: and himselfe in person entered the countrie of the Leontines, with all the rest of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thousand foot and horse together: certaine conspiratours, who chaunced all to be his owne fouldiours, and bare

A bare armes under him, possessed themselves of a wake house, standing over a narrow lane, through which the king was wont to go down into the market-place of the citie: there, when other stood armed and well appointed, and waiting when the king should passe by, one of the conspiratours (whose name was Indigeminus) had given him in charge, because he was one of the squires of the kings bodie; when the king approached neere unto the doore of the said house, to find some occasion or other; in that streight passage, to stay the troupe and traine that followed behind: And so he effected, indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigeminus lift up his foot, making as though he would loose, and slacke a streight knot of his shoelatchet, which hindered his going, whereby hee staid the companie that followed after, so long, that the king passing by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was assaulted in the while, and received sundrie stabbes and wounds, before they could come to reskue and save him. Hereupon arose an outcrie and tumult, and divers of the guard let sic at Indigeminus, who by this time was ready to oppose himselfe, and to ward all venues: howbeit he was hurt onely in two places, and so escaped. The guard seeing the king there lying dead, fled away as fast as they could. The murderers, some of them betooke themselves into the market-place unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recoverie of their freedom: others repaired to Syracuse, to intercept and prevent the designments of Andronodorus, and other favourites and followers of the late king.

Whiles things stood in these uncerteine and doubtfull reames, Appius Claudius foreseeing warre like to ensue, and that very shortly, addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, certifying them that Sicilie enclined alreadie, and was at hand to side with the people of Carthage, and with Anniball. Himselfe in the meane time, bent all his forces toward the frontiers of the Province and confines of that kingdome, to withstand and hinder all the proceedings and enterprises of the Syracusians.

In the end of that yeare, Q. Fabius by order from the Senate, fortified Puteoli, a towne of merchandise, & which in time of the warres began to be much resorted unto & frequented, and there he placed a garison. From whence as he was in his journey toward Rome against the grand Election of Magistrates, he proclaimed the solemn assembly of the people for that purpose, to be the next Comitiall day, that followed upon his arrivall thither: and so it fell out, that he went along the citie side immediatly upon his journey, and came downe into Mars field before he entered the citie. Vpon which day, when it hapned that the centurie of the younger sort was drawne out first by lot, and had the prerogative, and by their voyces nominated T. Otacilius and M. Aemilius Regillus for Consuls, then Q. Fabius after silence made, rose up, and delivered this or such like speech: If either we had peace in Italie, or warre at leastwaies with those enemies, with whom if we dealt either negligently or unadvisedly, the matter were not much, nor importing great hazard and danger: I would thinke, that whosoever disturbed and crossed your favours and free affections which ye bring hither with you into this solemn place of assembly, to bestow honors and dignities upon whom ye please, had but small or no regard of your libertie and freedom. But since that in this warre and with this enemy, never any Generall of ours faulted in the managing of his affaires, but it cost us deere, and wee had some great foile and overthrow; it becometh you, that with what mind and carefull regard yee enter the field to combate in your armour, in the same yee should come hither into this Mars field in your gownes, and so proceed by your suffrages to elect your Consuls: and that every one of you should thus say to himselfe, I am to nominate a Consul to match with Generall Anniball: No longer since, than this very yeare, when as before Capua, Tullius Taurus, the bravest horseman & Cavalier of all the Campanes defied the Romanes, and challenged them to fight man to man, Acellus Claudius the noblest knight of all the Romanes, and best man at armes, was chosen to encounter him. In times past, against a Gaule that offered combate upon the bridge over Anio, our auncestours sent out Manlius a courageous, resolute, and puissant champion. Neither can I denie, but upon such another occasion, not many yeares after, the like trust was reposed in M. Valerius, who rooke armes likewise against another Gaule that challenged single fight. And even as we are desirous, & wish to have our foot and horsemen both, more valourous and hardie than our enemies, or if that we will not be, at leastwise equall unto them, and able to countermatch them: even so let us be careful to find out a Generall of our own, comparable every way to the cheefe commander of our enemies. And when we have chosen the best warriour and captaine in the whole citie, then presently without any longer delay, being elect and created for one yeare, he shall be sent to match with

Q. Fabius to the people of Rome.

Ianiculum. Whereupon the citie rose up in armes, & when they were come into the Ianicle, they said plainly, that there were none there appeared, but the ordinarie inhabitants of the hill. These prodigious sights, by direction from the Aruspices, the Soothsayers were expiate, & the gods pacified with greater sacrifices, and a solemn procession and supplication was proclaimed unto all the gods that were shrined at Rome, and had their chappels there.

After all complements performed, that belonged to the pacification of the gods, the Consuls proposed unto the Senate concerning State matters, and especially about the managing of the warres. Namely, what forces should be prepared, what numbers of souldiours levied, and where they should be bestowed severally. And agreed it was, That there should be eight new Legions employed in the warres. Whereof the Consuls were to take unto them two a peece, the provinces likewise of Gaule, Sicillie and Sardinia, should be guarded each of them with other twaine. Q. Fabius the Lord Deputie of Apulia, was to have two Legions under his hand, to command the province; and T. Gracchus other two of voluntaries to keepe the countie about Luceria and C. Terentius the Proconsull, to have the charge of one in the Picene countie, and M. C. Celerius another, for the navie about Brundisium: and last of all, twaine were left behind, for the guard and defence of the citie of Rome. For to make out this full number of Legions, sixe of necessity were to be levied new. And the Consuls were appointed with all convenient speed to enroll them: and likewise to provide an Armada that yeare, of 150 gallies, together with those ships which rid in the river, along the coasts of Calabria for the defence of that countie. When the muster was done, and the new shippes haled and shor into sea, Quintus Fabius assembled the Centuries for the Election of Censors; wherein were created, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Enrius Philus.

The rumour still encreased, that Sicillie was out, and up in armes. Whereupon T. Q. Fabius was commanded to goe thither with his fleet. And because there wanted sailers and mariners, the Consuls by vertue of a decree of the Senat, published an Edict, That as many as in the time of L. Aemilius, and C. Flaminius Censors, either themselves or their fathers were affected in the Subsidie booke, from 50000 Asles unto 100000 in goods, or who afterwards grew to that worth, should find one mariner, and six months pay. Item, That who ever were rated above 100000 unto 300000 should be charged with three mariners, & one yeares pay. Item, That who ever were valued in the Censors booke betweene 300000 and 1000000, should allow five mariners. Item, That those above that proportion should set out seven. And every Senator should provide eight mariners, and furnish them with a whole yeares pay. According to this Edict, the mariners were set out well armed and appointed, by their masters, and having with them aforesaid meat, dressed and foddens to serve them thirtie daies, they were embarked. This is the first time that ever the Romane navie was furnished with sailers and mariners, at the proper charges of private citizens.

This extraordinarie preparation more than usuall, terrified the Campanes most of all others, for feare least the Romanes would begin warre that yeare, with laying siege to Capua. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors unto Anniball, requesting him to come neerer unto Capua with his forces. For why at Rome there were new armies levied, for to assaile that citie, & the Romanes were not discontented more with the revolt of any than of them. And for as much as this message was delivered in such hast and feare, Anniball thinking it good to make speed, lest the Romanes prevented him, dislodged and removed from Arpi, and encamped upon L. Fata over L. Fata pua, in the fort, where he kept of old. Then leaving the Numidians and Spaniards behind him, both to guard the campe, and also to defend Capua, he went downe with the rest of his armie to the lake Avernus, pretending in shew there to sacrifice; but in very deed to found and followe Putcoli and the garrison there, for to rebell. Maximus was no sooner advertised that Anniball was departed from Arpi, and in his returne to Campania, but he journeyed night and day, and never staid, until he was come againe, and repaired to his armie. And withall, he gave order and direction unto T. Gracchus, to remove with his power from Luceria, and to draw neerer to Beneventum: likewise unto Q. Fabius the Pretour, (who was the Consull this yeare) to supply the route of Gracchus at Luceria. At the same time the two Pretours took their journey, and went into Sicillie. P. Cornelius, to the armie there on land, and Q. Fabius to keepe the sea coast, and to be Admiral of the navie; and the rest sped them every one into their severall provinces. They all who had their authoritie and government continued, ruled the same counties that they did before.

While

A While Anniball abode at the Lake Avernus, there came unto him from Tarentum, five noble young gentlemen (Romane associates) which had been taken prisoners, some at the poole Thrasymenus, others at Cannæ, whom hee had sent home in the same manner of curtisie, as he had shewed ever to all the allies of the Romans. These gentlemen, in remembrance of his favors and benefits, made report unto him, that they had persuaded and induced a great part of the youth of Tarentum, to entertaine rather the amitie and alliance of Anniball, than of the people of Rome: and for this intent they were sent embassadors from them, to request in their name, that it might please him to come neerer with his forces to Tarentum. For say they, if they might but once see from out of Tarentum his standerd and ensignes, and himselfe neere encamped, the citie would without delay be surrendered up into his hands. For the younger people had the commons at their beck and commandement, and the commons ruled the whole state of Tarentum at their pleasure. Anniball after hee had commended and thanked them, and withall laden them with many faire and great promises; willed them to returne home; to hasten and set forward, and effect these intended designements, saying, that he would be there in good and convenient time. With these hopes the Tarentines tooke their leave, and departed. Anniball himselfe was wonderfully desirous to be maister of Tarentum. He saw it was a noble citie and a wealthie, seated also by the sea side, and a very commodious port, looking and lying toward Macedonia: and well he wist that King Philip (if he should passe over into Italie, seeing the Romanes were possessed of Brundisium) would arrive at this haven. When he had performed the Sacrifice for which he thither came, and (whiles he made his abode there) forsaied all the territorie of Cumes, even as farre as the Cape of the Promontorie Misenum: sodainly he turned his armie and marched to Putcoli, for to surpise and give a camfado to the fort and garison there. There were sixe thousand of them within the towne: and the place not only by naturall situation strong, but also surely fortified by industrie of man. Anniball having stayed there three dayes, and assailed the fort and the garison on every side, seeing hee could not prevail nor effect anything, went forward from thence, and proceeded to the wasting of the territorie of Naples, upon anger, rather than any hope of gaining the citie. The Commons of Nola, who long time were discontented with the Romanes, and at deadly scwd with their owne Senatours, upon his coming into the territorie and confines so neere unto them, began to rise in a commotion. Whereupon, there came Embassadors unto Anniball, requiring him to advance to Nola, upon assured promise, that the towne should be delivered into his hands. But Marcellus, who was sent unto by the Nobles, prevented this their plot and designement: and in one day, he reached to Suessula from Cales, notwithstanding hee made some stay to ferrie over the river Vulturnus. And so the next night he sent into Nola 6000 footmen, and 300 horse, for to aid and defend the Senat. And like as the Consull bestirred himselfe with all speed and diligence, to make Nola sure to him aforesaid, so Anniball contrariwise temporised, being not so readie now to credite the Nolanes; as having twice before given the like attempt, and to no purpose in the end, and therefore hee trifled out the time, and made finall hast.

At the same time also, Q. Fabius the Consull came against Castellum, which was kept by a garison of the Carthaginians, to see if he could surpise it. And to Beneventum at one time (as if they had been so agreed) came on the one side, Hanno from the Brutij, with a great power of foot and horse; and on another side, Gracchus from Luceria: who entered the towne first. From whence, so soone as hee heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the citie, by the river Calores, and there wasted the countie, he himselfe issued, and pitched his tents within a mile of the enemies: where he assembled all his souldiours together, purposing to make a speech unto them. He had with him the legions that consisted most of voluntaries, who alreedy two yeres before, had bene more willing to deserve their freedome in silent maner, than to challenge and demand it with open mouth. Howbeit he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they began to murmure & grumble in the armie when they marched: & to complain in this wise. What shal we never serve in the quality & condition of freemen? Whereupon he had written unto the Senate, and shewed unto them, not so much what they desired, as what they deserved to have: certifying them, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant service: & wanted nothing save onely their freedome, but they might go for true and lawfull soldiours. Whereupon the lords of the Senate had put it unto his discretion, for to do by them what he thought was expedient for the common-weale. Thereupon, before that he should joyne battaile with the ene-mie, hee pronounced these words before them all, and said: That now the time was come, of obtaining and acquiring that libertie, which so long they hoped after. For the next morrow, they were to affront their enemies with banner displayed, and to fight in a plaine and open ground; where without feare of any ambush, the triall might be made with fine force & true valour: Who soever therefore can bring me the head of an enemy, him my pleasure & will is, to make free immediately: and who so loseth ground and reculeth, him will I chasise as a bondslave ought to be punished. Now every man hath his state and condition lying in his owne hands: & of your freedome, not only my selfe will assure you, but for further warrant, yee have the allowance of M. Marcellus the Cos. & generally of all the LL. of the Counsel, whose advise I sought, & who committed unto my hands the ordering of your libertie. And withall, he read the Consuls letters, and the decree of the Senate in that behalfe. Whereat they set up a mightie crye, in token of their assent and approbation, and called for battaile, & earnestly urged to give the signall out of hand. Then Gracchus having pronounced the next day for battaile, dismissed the assembly. The souldiours were joyous, especially such as were to have their freedome in reward of one daies service, and bestowed the rest of that day in making their armour and weapons readie. The morrow after, so soone as the trumpets began to sound: they were the first of all other, that presented themselves before the Generall his pavilion, well appointed and readie to fight: and by the sun-rising Gracchus led forth his men into the field in order of battaile. The enemies for their parts, were nothing behind, but forward to encounter them. They were in number: seventeen thousand of footmen, most of them Brutij and Lucans: of horsemen, twelve hundred: among whom there were very few Italians, the rest were in manner all Numidians and Moors. The fight was sharpe, and continued long, and for four houres it was not scene which side had the better. No one thing else troubled the Romans more, than their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeeme the souldiours libertie. For as any had killed their enemies lustilie, they were faine first, with much ado, to cut off their heads, within the trouble some prease & tumult: & so to loose time: and after that, by reason that their right hands were employed and occupied with holding the same heads, it fell out, that the best souldiours gave over fighting, and the feeble dastards & fearfull cowards only, were to maintain the medley. Which when the Marshals of the field & Colonels reported unto Gracchus, and namely that there was not a souldiour of the enemies standing: that was wounded and hurt any more: but they that lay along were hacked and hewed as it were by butchers: and that his owne souldiours in stead of swords, held their enemies heads in their hands: hee commaunded in all hast, that upon a signall given, they should sling away their heads from them, & charge afresh upon the enemies. For their valor & prowesse (saith he) was well enough scene alredie, and evidently testified, & so long as they were so hardie men, & bare themselves so manfully, they should not need to doubt of their libertie. Then the conflict began to be renewed, and withall, the horsemen charged the enemies: whom the Numidians received with equall valour: inso much as the fight of the cavaleric was as bravely performed, as the other of the Infanterie: wherupon once againe the victorie seemed doubtfull, to which part it would incline: whiles in both hosts, the Generals reproached and debased the adverse part. Gracchus said, that the Brutij and Lucanes were so often vanquished and subdued by the Romane auncestors: and Hanno againe girded at the Romans, calling them bondslaves, and souldiours let loose out of prison and houles of correction. At the last, Gracchus declared alowd and said, They were not to hope at all for their libertie, unlesse that day their enemies were discomfited & put to flight. This one word of his at length set their blood in such an heat, that they raised a fresh shout, & as if they had bin cast again into a new mould, they charged upon the enemies so violently, that they could no longer be resisted & withstood. First, they that fought in the vanguard of the Carthaginians were put out of order; then they about their standards and ensignes: and last of all, the whole battaile was driven backe and reculed. Whereupon they faire turned their backs, and fled so fast one upon another into their campe, in such feare and fright, that not so much, as at the very gates nor upon the rampiar, they staied once, & turned againe to make head: so as the Romans following them hard at heeles into their campe, as it were in one traine pell mell, made a new skirmish even within the rampiar of their enemies. Where the fight was not so comber some, by reason of the streightnesse of the rounge wherein they were pent, but the massacre and execution was as cruell & bloudie. The prisoners also that were among the enemies, in this confused medley and tumult joyned themselves and stucke close together: and having caught up some weapons, helped helped forward the victorie: & either charging upon the backs of the Carthaginians slew them, or else hindered them in their flight and running away. So of that great armie, there were not all out two thousand (and the most part of them horsemen) that escaped with the Generall himself: all the rest were either slain or taken prisoners: and of militarie ensignes were caried away 40. save twaine. Of the victours, there died fast upon two thousand. All the spoyle, but only the prisoners, was granted to the souldiours: The cattell also was reserved, as many as within thirtie daies the right owners could justly make claime unto for their owne. When they were returned laden with booties and pillage into the campe, there were almost 4000. of the voluntarie souldiours, who had fought bravely, and brake not into the campe with the rest: who for feare of punishment seized a little hill not farre from the campe, and kept it for their hold. But the morrow after, being set from thence by the Colonels, they repaired again to the campe, at what time as Gracchus had summoned his souldiours to an assembly: Where, after that the Proconsull, first had rewarded his old souldiours with militarie gifts, according to each one his prowesse and good service in that battaile: then as concerning the voluntaries, he said thus much, That hee had liever they were all commended by him, good and bad one with another, than that one of them that day should tast of any punishment: and therefore hee pronounced them all free in the name of God, to the benefite, happinesse, and felicitie, both of the common-weale, and also of themselves. At which word, they lift up their voyces alowd with exceeding cheerfulness and alacritie: and one while they clipped and embraced one another in their armes, with gratulation and joy: another while againe, they held up their hands toward heaven, wishing and praying at the gods hands, all good blessings for the people of Rome, and for Gracchus especially. Then (quoth Gracchus) Before that I had made you all alike, and to have equall part in the right and priviledge of freedom: I would not set upon any of you, either the marke of a stout and hardie souldiour, or the note of a faint hearted and beastly coward. But now that I have discharged my selfe of the trust committed unto me by the Common-weale, to the end, that all difference betweene prowesse and cowardise, should not be forgotten altogether and perishe: I will take expresse order, that the names of all them, whose conscience accused them of faint fighting, and avoiding the hazard of battaile, and therefore etwile withdrew themselves apart, be brought unto me. And when they are cited and called forth every one by his name, I will compell them to take a corporall oath (quoth hee) that unlesse it be upon sickness; so long as they shall continue in soldierie, they neither eat nor drinke, but standing upon their feet. And this punishment (I am sure) you will willingly take in good part: when yee shall consider better of it, and see that you could not have had an easier note of disgrace and shame, for your false hearts and slender service. Then hee gave the signall to trusse up bag and baggage, and founded the remove, and so dislodged: & thus the souldiours carrying and driving before them their bodies, all the way disporting themselves so merrilie and jocund, returned to Beneventum, as if they had come from some great dinner, upon a solemne and festivall day, and not from fighting a bloudie battaile. All the people of Beneventum, came forth in great number to meet them at the gates, welcomed the souldiours, bad them joy, embraced them, and envited them to their houles, to give them entertainment and lodging. The bours were spread in every mans court-yard, and furnished with store of viands: they willed them to come and make merrie with them, and requested Gracchus to give his souldiours leave to feast and make good cheere. And Gracchus was content, but upon this condition, that they should all ear their meals abroad in the open street. Then all things was brought forth, and set upon the tables, at every mans doore. The voluntaries tooke their repast and refection, either with their caps on their heads, or else covered their crownes with white wooll: some sitting, some standing: waiting and serving one another at the table, and eat their meat: & fed with them together. This was such a worthie sight & solemnitie, that Gracchus after hee was returned to Rome, caused the representation and resemblance of the celebration of this day, to be drawne and portraied in colours, and the picture to remaine in the temple of the goddess Libertie, which his father caused to be built in the mount Aventine, of certaine fines and forfeits, and afterwards there dedicated it.

While these matters thus passed at Beneventum, Anniball having spoiled and harried the territorie about Naples, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Consull understood to be comming, he sent for Pomponius the pro-Pretour, together with that armie which lay encamped above Suessula, & provided to meet with the enemy, minding ding presently to bid him battaile. He sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horsemen in the dead time of the night at a backe gate, that was farthest from the enemye, giving him in charge to cast about closely, and fetch a compassse, and faire and softly to follow the enemye, as he marched: and when he perceived the battaile was begun, then to come forward and set upon him behind on his backe. But whether it were that Nero missed of the way, or having not time ynough, could not put this policie in execution, I know not. In his absence the enemyes joined battaile, wherein (no doubt) the Romans had the better hand. Howbeit, for default that the horsemen were not there in due time, the order of the direction failed, and tooke not effect. And not withstanding that the enemyes gave ground and recoiled, yet Marcellus durst not follow hot tip on them, but sounded the retreat to his own men, being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above 2000 of the enemyes slaine that day, but of Romans under 400. And about the sunneler, Nero who all the day and night past, had tired horse & man, and done no good, and now returned, without so much as a sight of the enemye, was sharply rebuked of the Consul, inasmuch that he gave him this checke to choke him, That it was long of him and none else, that they had not cried quittance with the enemye, for the overthrow and losse received at Cannæ. The day following Marcellus came downe againe into the field, ready to give battell. But Anniball, as one that secretly confessed himselfe to be overcome, held himselfe close, within the strength of his campe. And on the third day, giving over all hope to get Nola, (an enterprise that never succeeded well) he departed in the still time of the night toward Tarentum, upon a better and more assured hope to gaine it by treason.

The civile affaires at Rome were managed with no lesse courage at home, than the warres in the field abroad. For the Censors, who by reason that the citie treasure waxed low, were eased of their care of setting out the publick works of the citie by the great: & having nothing els to do, employed themselves in reformation of mens manners and chastising of vices and enormities, which sprung upon warre: like as mens bodies, which by long and lingering sicknesse growne weake, ever and anon breed new diseases. And first they convented before them those citizens, who after the battail at Cannæ, were (by report) minded & disposed to leave the Commonweale, and to depart out of Italie. The ringleader of them all was L. Cecilius Metellus, who hapned then to be Treasurer of the citie. He, with the rest of that crew, who were culpable in the same crime, were commaunded to make their answer, and plead their causes: but when they were not able to cleare and quit themselves, the Censors charged them openly, that they had given out certaine words, and made speeches against the State, tending to a sedition & conspiracie, for to abandon Italie. Next after them were cited to appeare, those cunning and craftie companions abovesaid, who with their over-subtile interpretation and construing of words, would seeme to avoid their oth: those captives, I meane, who being on their way to Rome, came backe secretly into the campe of Anniball, and tooke themselves thereby freed and discharged, because they had sworne to returne againe. But these and the others afore rehearsed, as many as served upon the citie horses, had their horses taken from them, were displaced out of their tribe, and condemned all to loose their voices, and to serve without cittie pay. Neither were the Censors carefull to correct the Senate, and reforme the degree of the knights onely, but also they proceeded to rase out of the publicke checkroll of the younger citizens, the names of all those, who for foure yeares space had not served in warres, as many, I say of them, as could not justly plead and alleage, either ordinarie immunitie by law, or sicknes for their excuse. And of these, were found guilty above 2000: who were awarded to be Ærarij, & all of them to be removed out of their tribe. And besides this shameful disgrace and note of ignominie awarded by the Censors, there passed an heave decree of the Senate against them, to wit, That all they whome the Censors had thus scored and noted, should bee bound to serve on foot in the warres, and be confined and sent over into Sicillie, to the residue there, of the armie that remained at Cannæ: And no other time of service and warfare was limited unto this sort of souldiours, but until the enemye were driven cleane out of Italie.

Whiles the Censors, as is afore said, upon occasion that the citties stocke was so decayed, gave over and forbore to bargain for the repairing & maintenance of the churches and holy temples, and for the finding and provision of chariot horses for the State, and such like: there resorted unto them a great number of those that were wont at the speare, to take these bargaines at their hands by the great, and for a grosse summe of money: who exhorted the Censors, to deale

A in those matters still, and to set, let, and enter into bargain with them, as if the citie chamber wanted no money: making this offer, that none of them all would demand payment out of the common chest, before the warres were fully ended.

Then repaired unto the Censors, the maisters of those bondmen, whom T. Sempronius had manumitted and set free at Beneventum, saying, that they were sent for by the Triumvirs, out of the office of the Bankers called Mensarij, for to receive againe their monies, according as they priced and valued their slaves: howbeit, they would not, before the warre was finished. And as the hearts of the Commons were thus favourable affected, to sustaine and support the poverie of the treasure house, so the stockes of money also that belonged first to Orphanes, and afterwards to widdowes, began now to be bestowed in the chamber of the citie: and they that presented and brought in those monies, beleaved assuredly, that they could not lay them up more sure and safe, than in the publicke credite & securitie of the citie. And whatsoever out of these stockes was disbursed and defraied, for to buy and provide any thing for the Orphanes or widdowes afore said, the treasurers kept a booke thereof, & noted it down in a register. This kindnes & benevolence of privat persons unto their countrye, extended it selfe from the citie, even as far as to the campe: inasmuch, that neither horseman nor centurion would take their wages, but rebuke and rate them, that could find in their hearts to receive their pay, rearming them no better than mercenaries and hirelings.

Now Q. Fabius the Consull lay in campe before Casilinum, which citie was kept with a garrison of two thousand Campanes, and seven hundred of Anniball his souldiers. They had for their captaine and commaunder, one Statius Metius, sent thither by Cn. Magius Attellanus, who for that yeare was Mediastuticus of Capua. He put the bondslaves and commons in armes, C entermingled one with another, for to enter upon the campe of the Romanes, whiles the Consull was busie in assailing Casilinum. Fabius was nothing ignorant of all these things, and therefore he sent unto Nola to his colleague there, signifying unto him, that there was neede of a second armie to make head against the Campanes, whiles the other was employed about the assault of Casilinum: and telling him besides, that either he must himselfe come in person, leaving a meane garrison behind him at Nola: or els if he might not be spared from thence, for feare of danger from Anniball, he would send for T. Gracchus the Proconsull, from Beneventum. Upon this message, Marcellus having left in Nola a garr. of two thousand souldiers, with the rest of his forces, presented himselfe before Casilinum: upon whose comming, the Campanes, who were ready to set forward, stayed themselves and were quiet. So both Consuls togither jointly began to assault Casilinum: where the Romanes souldiers that rashly came under the walls received much hurt: and Fabius seeing little good done, judged it best to surcease and give over the enterprise, being in service of small consequence, and nath'lesse very dangerous: and to depart from thence, seeing there was business toward of greater importance. But Marcellus contrarywise was of opinion and said, that as there were many things which great warriours were not to attempt: so if they were once taken in hand, and the adventure given, they were not lightly to be given over and laid asides, for as much as in it lay matter of great consequence, for fame and reputation; both wayes and so he prevailed, that the enterprise was not neglected and abandoned. Whereupon, there were mantlets, and all other kinds of fabricks and engines of batterie and assault, bent against the citie: so, as the Campanes besought Fabius, that they might depart to Capua in safetie. And when some few were gone forth, Marcellus possessed himselfe of that gate whereout they went, and then they fell to kill and slay one with another, first about the gate: and after they had rushed once in, they put to like execution those also within the citie. Little there were of the about of the Campanes, that first gate out of the towne, and fled for mercie to Fabius: and they by his gard and safeconduct, arrived at Capua. But see, Casilinum, through the lingering slacknesse of the inhabitants that craved protection, was (by advantage taken of their long parley, and remporising) woon by the enemyes. The captives, so many as were either Campanes or Anniball his souldiours, were sent to Rome, and there clapt up fast in prisons. But the multitude of the towne men, were distributed into sundrie citties adjoining, and there kept in ward.

F At the very same time that the Consuls after their conquest, retired from Casilinum, Gracchus being in the countrie of the Lucanes, and having gathered and enrolled certaine cohorts and companies of souldiours out of those parts, sent them out a forraying, under the conduct of a captaine of Allies, into the territories of the enemyes. Hanniball encountered them as they stragled in scattering wife out of order, and set upon them, and paid his enemies againe with the like dis-featue and losse, or not much lesse, than that which he had received at Beneuentum: and in great hast withdrew himselfe into the country of the Brutij, for feare lest Gracchus should overtake him.

The Confull Marcellus returned back to Nola, from whence he came, and Fabius went forward into Samnium, to spoile and wast the countie, and to recover by force of armes the cities which had revolted. The Samnites about Caudium were piteously and grievously dammed: their villages in all places set on fire, their fields laid wast and destroyed, and great booties both of cattail & people driven away. Sixe townes forced by assault, namely, Compulteria, * Telefia, Cossa, Melæ, Fusulæ, and Orbitanium. In the Lucanes countie, the towne of * Blander and in Apulia the citie * Anca was assaulted. In these townes and cities, there were taken prisoners and slaine 25000 of the enemies: of fugitives and renegate traitours there were recovered 370, whome the Confull sent home againe to Rome, and being thither come, they were all beaten and scourged with rods in the Comitium, and then pitched downe headlong to the earth, from the rock Tarpeia. These exploits were achieved by Q. Fabius, within the compasse of a few dayes. But Marcellus by occasion that he lay sick at Nola, was hindered from performing any feates of armes. The Pretour likewise Q. Fabius, who had the charge and jurisdiction of the province about Luceria, woon by force about the same time the towne Accia, and fortified a standing camp planted before Ardoreæ.

Whiles the Romanes were thus employed about these affaires in divers other places, Anniball was come unto Tarentum, to the exceeding great damage and detriment of all places where he journeyed: but being arived once in the territorie of Tarentum, he began to march and lead his armie more peaceably. There he did no harme at all, made no havock, nor once went out of the high way. And it was evidently seen, that all this was done not upon any modestie that appeared either in souldiour or captaine, but only to win unto him the hearts of the Tarentines.
 But when he approached the walls of the citie, and saw no commotion, nor insurrection from thence upon the discovery of his Vantgard, as he thought he should; he pitched his camp almost a mile from the towne. Now had M. Valerius the Viz-Pretour, who was Admirall of the Fleete at Brundisium, sent T. Valerius his Lieutenant unto Tarentum, thirte dayes before, that Anniball shewed himselfe before the walls. He had mustred and enrolled the floure of the Nobilitie, and so bestowed at every gate, and about the walls where neede required, good gards for defence: with such vigilant diligence both day and night, that he gave no opportunitie and advantage either to the enemies to adventure any assault, or to the doubtfull and untrustie friends to practise any treason. So Anniball, having spent there certaine dayes in vaine, and seeing none of them who repaired unto him at the lake * Avernus, either to come themselves, or to send messenger or letters: and perceiving now that he had rashly and foolishly followed vaine promises, and so was deluded; dislodged, and removed from thence. And even then also he spared the ter-ritorie of Tarentum, and did no hurt at all: and albeir his feined and counterfeit lenitie and mildnesse hitherto tooke no effect: yet he hoped still thereby to corrupt their faithfull allegiance to the Romanes: and so he went to Salapia. And (by reason that now midsummer was past, and he liked well of that place for a winter harbour) he conveyed thither all the come from out of the territorie of Metapontum and Heraclea. Then he sent out the Numidijs and Moores, to fetch booties and prizes from out of the Salentine countie, and all the woods and chafes next unto Apulia, from whence they drave of other cattail small stee: but of horses especially they brought away great numbers, of which there were foure thousand divided amongst the horsemen to be handled, broken; and made gentle.

* Lacus Tiberinus.

The Romanes seeing there was like to be war in Sicilie, & the same not lightly to be regarded; and that the death of the tyrant there, rather gave the Saracossians good captains, than wrought any change in their minds, or alteration in the cause: assigned unto M. Marcellus, one of the Confulls, that province to governe. Presently upon the murder of Hieronymus first the souldiours in the Leontine countie, began to mutine and make an uprise; and boldly spake and said: That the kings death should be expiate, and his obsequies solemnized with sacrificing the blood of conspiratours. But afterwards, when they heard often iterated the sweet name of libertie & free-dome restored unto them: and that there was good hope that the souldiours should have a largesse dealt amongst them out of the kings treasure; and be under the command of capitaines of better

A better qualitie, and having besides all this, a bederoll reheated unto them of the Tyrant his crueltie and foule facts, and of more filthie and lothsome lusts; their affections were so altered, that they suffered the bodie of their king to lie above ground unburies, whom a little before, they so greatly desired and wished for. Now as concerning the conspiratours, whiles the rest of them remained behind to assure and possesse themselves of the armie, Theodorus and Sosis tooke the kings horses and rode post, as hard as ever they could, to Syracusa, for to surprise upon a suddain all his followers & favourites (who knew nothing of that which was done) & fall upon them unawares: but they were prevented not onely by the fame (which above all other things in such cases is most swift) but also by a courier one of the kings servants. Whereupon Andronodorus had seized before hand of that part of the citie which is called the Iland, together with the castle, and all other places that hee could come at, which were thought of any good importance; and B. them he fortified with good gards: Theodorus and Sosis being entred within the citie at * Hexapyllos after the sunne setting, in the twy-light and shutting in of the evening: and shewing the kings rei-all robes all embued with blood, & the ornament & attire likewise of his head, he passed through * Tibica, & called aloud unto the people to fight all at once for their libertie, and to arme themselves, and willed them to repaire unto * Acradina. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others stood in their entries and porches, divers looked out at the windowes from within their houses, and asked what the matter might be? Every place shone with torch and cresset-light, and was filled with sundrie garboiles and hurlyburlys. As many as were in armes gathered together in the open places of the citie: those that were unarmed, tooke downe off the temple of C. Iup, Olympius, the spoiles of the Gaules and the Illyrians, which the people off Rome had given as a present to king Hiero, and which he set aloft for a memoriall: praying unto Iupiter that hee would vouchsafe them this gracious favour, as to bestow those sacred weapons & harness upon them; that meant to arme themselves therewith, for the defence of their countie, for the maintenance of the churches & shrines of the gods, and for the recoverie of their libertie. This multitude also joined with the Corps de gards, that in the principall quarters of the citie, were bestowed in places convenient. But Andronodorus amongst other places that he fortified, made sure also with strong gards of armed men: the publike garners of the citie within the Iland. There was a place enclosed round about with foure square stone, and built strongly like a fortress; this was possessed by the youth that had bene appointed for to guard and defend that quarter: and they D. sent messengers into the Acradina, to signifie that the garners & the corne were kept by them to the behoofe of the Senate. And on the morrow at the breake of day, the whole people, as well armed as unarmed, assembled together in Acradina, within the pallace. And there before the altar of Concordia, which in that place stood erected, one of the principall and chiefe citizens, named Polyneus, made an oration unto them all, with franknesse of speech enough, tending unto libertie, and yet seasoned with modestie and moderation, in this wise. Men (qd. he) that have experience of servitude and other indignities, fall to abhorre the same, and their stomackes rise against them as known evils. But as for civill discord, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with it, the citizens of Saracoss have heard their fathers tell, and not seen and tasted themselves. That yee have bene so readie to take armes and weapons in hand, I commend you for it: but I would
 E. can you more thanke, if yee used them not, unlesse ye be driven thereto by extreame necessitie.
 For the present, I hold it good, & my counsell is, that embassadours be sent unto Andronodorus, to intimate unto him, yea and to require and charge him, to submit himselfe unto the Senat and people, and by them to be ordered: to set open the gates of the Iland, to put away from about him his guard, and deliver up the castle and garrison. But in case hee intend under the pretence of being guardian or protectour to the kingdome of another, thereby to usurpe it to his own use, he must be given to understand, by mine advise, that we will seek to recover our libertie out of the hands of Andronodorus, more fiercely & forcibly than from Hieronymus. And so presently upon this assembly, embassadours were sent. Then the Senate went together & sat in counsell: for as during the raigne of Hiero, there was a set and ordinarie publike counsell of State: so after his death F. unto that day, the Senatours were neither called together, nor their advise taken or sought in any matter. When the embassadours were come unto Andronodorus, & had delivered their message, hee was himselfe (verily) for his owne part, moved with the generall consent of the citizens; but especially when hee considered, that among other quarters of the citie possessed by the adversetide, that one part also of the Iland, which was the strongest, was betrayed (as it were) & held out against him. But when the Embassadors called still upon him to come forth, his wife Demirata, daughter of king Hiero, puffed up still with the proud mind & haughtie stomach of a prince, and full of the vaine humour and spirit of a woman, put him effoones in mind of a saying; that » Demis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth, namely, That a man should not ride on horsebacke » to be depofed from royall dignitie and estate of tyrannie, but be led faire and softly a foot-pace, » and go to that, as a beere to the stake. An easie matter (quoth she) it is for one to yeeld and forgo » the poffeffion of high place and honor, and a thing that may be done in the turning of an hand, » whensoever one will: but to compaffe and attaine thereto, is a right hard matter, and of all o» ther most difficult. You were best therefore to borrow some refpite of time of the Embassadors, » for to take farther deliberation of this maine point, and in the mean while, to use the advantage » thereof, to fend for the souldiours out of the Leontine countrie: unto whom no doubt, if you » would promiffe a reward out of the Princes treasure, you shall belord of all. This perilous un» happie counsell of a woman, Andronodorus neither despised and rejected altogether, nor yet pre-» fently accepted and embraced: fuppofing it a better and safer course, if hee meant to aspire un» to high dignitie and great puiffance, for the present to temporize and give place unto the ne» ceffitie of the time. And therefore hee willed them to carrie backe unto the Senate. this answer » from him, That hee submitted himfelfe, and would be ordered and fet downe by the Senate and » the people. The morrow after, fo soone as it was daylight, hee caused the gates of the Ifland to » be fet open, & shewed himfelfe in the market place of Acradina: where hee afcended up unto the » altar of Concord, from which the day before, Polyneus had made a fpeech unto the people. Hee » began his oration with an excufe of his late comming and long stay behind, and craved pardon » therefor: alleading that hee had kept the gates fhut, not becaufe he meant to feparate his own » affairs from the State, & not to take fuch part as the citie tooke but when fwords were once drawn, » hee feared, what would be the end and iffue of murders & massacres, & whether men would flay » their hands, when there was affurance of libertie effected, (as being contented with the death on» ly of the Tyrant) or whither, as many as either in blood and kindred, or in affinitie and alliance, or » in other offices or fervice, were toward the K. & his court, fhould be touched culpable in the fault » of another, and fo like wife have their throats cut. For after that (quoth hee) I understood once, » that they who had delivered and fet free their countrie, were minded and willing to fave & pre» ferve it, thus enfranchifed; and that there was confulting on all hands indifferently, for the good » of the state, I made no longer doubt of the matter, but to yeeld both mine owne perfon, and alfo » all that ever was under my hand (as committed unto me upon trust and fidelitie) unto my native » countrie: now that he, who put all into my hand, is through his own follie & outrage overthrowne » and brought to confufion. Then turning to the murderers of the tyrant, and by name calling » unto Theodorus and Sofis. A noble and memorable peece of fervice yee have already done, (quoth » he) but trust me truly, your glorie in this behalfe is begun onely, and not thoroughly finished and » performed: nay, a great daunger is yet behind, unleffe yee fee to the generall concord and uni-» tie of all parts, that the common libertie of the citie, turne not into pride and infolencie be» yond all meafure.

After his fpeech ended, hee laid downe the keyes of the gates, and of the kings treasure, at their feet. And fo for that day, when the people were difmiffed from the affembly, with joy and mirth, they went in proceffion and fupplication with their wives and children, round about all the Churches and chappels of their gods. The day following, the folemne Election was held for the creation of Pretours. And first, before all others, Andronodorus was chosen, and the rest for the most part, the very murderers of the Tyrant. They elected alfo two that were abfent, to wit, Sopater and Deomenes. Who being advertifed of all matters that paffed at Syracufe, delivered up the kings treasure which lay in the Leontines countrie, and was now brought unto Syracufe, into the hands of the Treafurers; who for the fame purpofe were created. Likewise that which was in the Ifland, and in Acradina, was committed over unto their custodie. That part alfo of the wall which devided the Ifland from the rest of the citie, and was fuppofed too ftrong a bar betwene, was by common confent caft downe and rafed. And as their minds were thus affected and encliened to procure and mainteine libertie, fo all other matters forted futable, and followed after accordingly.

 faine have had concealed, and therefore flew the messenger that brought newes thereof) being

Andronodorus

A forfaken of the souldiours, returned to Syracufe; fuppofing for the present, that to bee the safest course they could take. Where, becaufe they would grow into neceffity, nor be noted to feek for fome opportunitie and occasion of change and alteration in the State, first they prefented themfelves before the Pretours & Governours of the citie; and fo by their mediation, they had acceffe to the Senate. They gave out, that they had been fent from Anniball unto Hieronymus as unto a friend and confederate, and had yielded obedience unto him, as they were willed by their owne Generall and Commander. Now their defire was, to returne againe unto Anniball. But for as much as they might not travell in fafetic, for the Roimane forces, that raged all over Sicilie, they craved a convoy and fufficient guard to conduct them, as farre as to Locri in Sicilie; affuring them, that by this small courtefie and defart of theirs, they fhould reape great thanks of Anniball, and come into high favour with him. The fute was foon obtained. For defirous they were, that thofe Cavaliers that ufed to lead the king, and were expert and skilfull besides in war, and therewith needie and audacious, fhould bee fent away: but they made not fo good fpeed to put this their defire in execution, as they fhould have done. For in the mean feafon, thofe young and juftie martiall men, and fuch as ever had conversed with the souldiours, went up and downe one while to them; another while to the fugitive ftraungers, that were revolted; (who for the most part were failers and fea men that came from the Romanes) yea, and forted themfelves with the baselt and moft abject perfons of the Commoners, fpredding tales, and whifpering into their eares, fundrie fufpitious matters of crime againft the Senatours and great men of the Nobilitie, faying, that they plotted and practifed clofely under hand, nothing elfe, but that Syracufe under a colour of reconciliation and accord, fhould be reduced to the obedience of the Romanes; and then, the fide and faction, and fome few with them, that are of counfell to renew the association, might bee lords; and tyrannize over the rest. By this meanes there flocked multitudes, every day more than other, to Syracufe: whose eares were tickled, and itched still to heare fuch fumnif-fes, and were apt ynough to give credite thereto. And they gave not onely Hippocrates and Epicides; but Andronodorus alfo good hope of an alteration; and a new world. For he (being at length overcome with the importunate fuggeltions of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to ufurpe and take upon him the rule of the State, whiles all things were troubled, and in a confufed medley, upon their new and unknowne libertie; whiles the souldiours were prefented in their way, to bee dealt withall, and dayly mainteined and fed out of the kings efchequer; and whiles thofe captaines fent from Anniball, by reafon of their acquaintance with the souldiours, were prefent to fet forward, and further his designements) first therefore acquainted Themiftius, who had married Gelo his daughter, with his complor; and after a few daies (full unadvifedly) imparted his mind alfo, unto one Aristo, an Actor of Tragedies, whom he ufed aforetime to make privie unto his other fecrets. This Aristo was well borne, and defended of a worfhipfull houfe, a man in good place and of honeft reputation: and his profeflion (for among the Greekes it is reputed no matter of fhame, to play either in Tragedies or Comedies) was no blot either to his birth, or difgrace to his calling: and therefore as one who made more reckning of his dutie to his country, than of private friendfhip, bewrayed and dif-clofed all the treason unto the Pretors. Who finding by good proofes and certaine evidences that this was ho forged and counterfet information, after confultation had with the auncients of the counfell, by their warrant and direktion, fet a gard of armed men about the dore of the Senate houfe, and fo foon as Themiftius and Andronodorus were entred in place, flew them outright. And when there began fome uprore upon this fact, which in fhew seemed very horrible and heinous (efpecially to all the rest that knew not the caufe) at length they appeafed the tumult, and caufed fentence, and brought the enformer into the counsell houfe, that had detected the intended treason: who declared all things orderly in particular: namely, that this confpira-cie was devised & fprung first from the mariage of Harmonia, the daughter of Gelo, who was wedded unto Themiftius: that divers auxiliarie souldiers of Africanes and Spaniards, were appointed and provided to mafacre the Pretours, and other principall citizens: that their goods were F promifed unto the murderers to be ranfaked and rifled: that befides, there was a band of mercenarie souldiours (fuch as were wont to be at a beck, and readie to execute the commaunde-ment of Andronodorus) fet in a readineffe, to feize the Ifland againe, and keepe it to his ufe. And when hee had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumftances, what the practifes were, and by whom they were to be performed and executed, & shewed before their eyes moft plainly, the

the whole conspiracie: and namely, what persons and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole bodie of the Senate were likewise verily persuaded, that they had deserved such an end, and were as justly murdered as Hieronymus. But without the counsell-house done, the confused multitude, composed of all sorts of people, who were doubtfull of the matter, & knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatened before the earre, and porch of the Senate, yet at the sight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and soone huffed, so as with great silence they followed the whole bodie of the Commons to the publicke place of assemble, unto whom Sopater, by order from the Senate, and his fellow Pretors, was commaunded to make an Oracion.

*Sopater his speech to the people of

Hee began formally to inveigh against Andronodorus and Themistius, (as they that accuse men at the barre) and ripped up their former life past, charging them with all the wicked deeds and impious facts, committed since the death of Hiero. For what (quoth he) did Hieronymus say, what could he doe of himselfe, so long as he was but a child and suckling, and scarcely come all the while he lived, to have any haire on his face? His officers and guardians, were they that ruled all, and managed the kingdome at their pleasures, but so, as the blame and heaviest load lay upon him. Who if they had perished either before Hieronymus, or at leastwise together with him, they had been but well enough served. But they, who long ago had deserved to die, and for whom the gallows had already groned, ceased not still, after the death of the tyrant, to devise & plot new mischiefs, one in the necke of another. At the first, openly in the sight of the world, Andronodorus by shutting the gates of the Island, entered by way of inheritance upon the kingdome, and fought to seize in his owne right, as immediat heire apparent, upon those things that hee held under the prince, only during his nonage. Afterwards, being betrayed by them that were in the Island, and besieged round about by the whole citie (which was possessed fully of the Acradina) seeing, that in vaine he had attempted to be king by a pert and open force, he sought meanes now to aspire thereto secretly, and by cunning sleights. Neither could hee bee so much as reclaimed and wooed, by any favours and honors done unto him: who being himselfe a traitor to the free dome of the state, was notwithstanding advanced to be Pretour, among other redeemers of the libertie of their countrie. But no marvel it was, (quoth he) that these men were of this haughtie spirit, and longed to bee Kings; for they had to their wives two princely dames, the daughters, one of king Hiero, and the other of his sonne Gelo.

At these words, the people from all parts of the assemble, began to crie out with one voice, that neither of them both were worthie to live, nor any one besides of the kings stocke & lineage ought to remaine upon the face of the earth. See the nature and disposition of the multitude, whether they serve basely, or rule proudly. Libertie that is the meane betwene, they have neither the skill to despise with reason, or the grace to entertaine in measure. Now, there wanted not (ye may be sure, as at all times else) readie instruments and firebrands, to helpe forward, and kindle more anger, such as seeing the Commoners distempred already, and bloudily minded of themselves, put them forward to murder and massacre. As it appeared then. For immediately, as the Pretors put up a bill, that all the kings stocke should be rooted out, and the whole line utterly extinguished: before in manner that it was all red out and published, it passed cleare, and was graintied. And presently there were sent certaine persons from the Pretours, that murdered Demaratus and Harmonia the daughters of king Hiero and Gelo, the two wives of Andronodorus and Themistius. Now there was another daughter of Hiero, named Heraclea, wife to Sosippus, who having been sent as Embassador from Hieronymus, to king Ptolomeus, chose a life in voluntarie exile, & lived not with his wife. She having an inkling given her aforehand, and knowing that the murderers were coming also toward her, tooke her two daughters, virgines: and together, with their haire loose hanging downe their shoulders, and in other most poore array and rusfull habit, able to have moved pittie and compassion, they were fled into a privat Oratorie or chappell unto their house-gods, to save themselves. The mother seeing the murderers, fell to entreating them most pittieously, and recommended unto them the late remembrance of her father Hiero, and her brother Gelo: Beseeching them not to suffer her (an innocent and guiltlesse person) to fare the worse, and be punished upon hatred that was borne unto her nephew Hieronymus. As for me (quoth she) I reaped no good by his reigne and kingdome, unless it were the banishment and absence of my husband: and as by the life of Hieronymus, my fortune was not so good as my sisters; so after hee was murdered and dead, my cause is not so bad, nor like unto hers. Moreover, over and besides, in case Andronodorus had effected his designements, my sister should have been a Queene, and reigned together with her husband: but as for me, I must have bene a subject and servant with the rest. Again, if there were any messenger sent unto Sosippus, to report the death of Hieronymus, and the restitution of Saracose to libertie: who can make doubt, but that forthwith he would be embarked and take the seas, and returne againe into his countrie? But how much are men put besides their hope, and deceived of their expectation? And who would ever have thought, to have seene in a freed state his wife and children in danger to lose their lives? For wherein do we hinder the common libertie, or the course of lawes? What danger can come to any person from us, one desolate lone woman and in manner a widow, and two yong maidens, living as orphans fatherlesse? And if it be said againe, that there was in deed no feare of hurt to be imagined from us; but only the kings bloud and kindred was odious in the eyes of the people: Then quoth she, let us be sent away farre from Saracose and Scellie, and confined over to Alexandria, the wife to her husband, the daughters to their owne father. But when they would neither give care to her words, nor incline their hearts to pittie and compassion: then, because she would not spend longer time in vaine (for now she saw some of them drawing their swords forth) she gave over all intreating for her selfe, and besought them instantly to be good yet, to the yong silly girles, & spare their lives, unto whom being of that age, even the very enemies in their heart of anger forbore to offer violence: and that seeing they were to be revenged of tyrants, they would not play the tyrants themselves, and commit that wickednesse, which they seemed to hate in others. Amid these words the murderers (sent from the Pretors) pulled her forth of the inward and most secret place of the chappell, and cut her throte: and when they had so done, they assayed and fell upon the maidens, besprent with the bloud of their mother: who for sorrow of heart and feare together, being past themselves and out of their wits, and as it were in a furious fit of frenzie, ranne against them, and gate out of the chappell: minding, if they could have escaped forth and recovered the streete, to set the whole citie on an upreare. And so they shifted for themselves poore wretches, by running too and fro within the house, (which was not large and spacious) that for a good while they escaped amongst the thickest of so many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reaches, and caught no hurt: yea and when they had caught hold of them, notwithstanding they were to struggle with so many hands, and those so strong, yet they wound away from them all: untill at length after they had received many a wound, & filled every place with bloud, they fainted & sunke down, & yielded up their innocent spirits. This murder, no doubt, was of it selfe piteous; but much more lamentable, by occasion of a present accident. For straight after, came a messenger with expresse commandement, to spare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a sodaine the hearts of the people relented, and enclined to mercie. But when they heard that there was so quick dispatch made of execution, that neither they had time to bethinke themselves and repent, nor space to coole upon their heat, they fell from pittie and compassion, into an extreme fit of anger and choler. The multitude thereupon began to mutter and murmure, and called to have an election of Pretours in the roume of Andronodorus and Themistius (for they were both of them Pretours:) which new election was not like to fall out in the end to the good liking and contentment of the other Pretours in place. So a day was set downe, and proclaimed for this election. At which time, it happened that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the assembly nominated Epicides: and then another from thence named Hippocrates. After which, the same voyces came thick and threefold still, so as it seemed the multitude would whole goe that way. The people there assembled, were a confused sort intermingled as well of a number of souldiers, as of a companie of citizens and commoners: yea and many of them were strangers fugitives, shuffled among, such as rather than their life, desired a generall change and alteration. The Pretours at first dissimuled all, and would seeme to take no knowledge thereof: but thought it best to put off the matter to a farther day: yet overcome at last with the common accord and consent of the people: and fearing withall a mutinie and sedition, pronounced and declared the men aforesaid, for Pretours. Neither would they, at first hand so soone as they were created, set that abroach which was in their mind & desire to effect: notwithstanding they were displeased and discontented much, both for that there had bene ambassadors dispatched unto Appius Claudius, about a truce for ten dayes: and also when it was obtained, that there were others addressed, to treat for the renewing of the aunient league with the Romanes.

The Oratour Apollonides, to the people of Syracuse.

At the same time (Ap. Claudius) the Roman General lay at Murgantia with an Armada of 100 galleies, waiting there to heare what was the event of the troubles which arose upon the murder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceede upon this their new and unwonted libertie. And much about those dayes, when as the Saracusan Embassadors were sent from Appius, unto Marcellus now comming into Sicilia, Marcellus himselfe after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end: and therefore sent other embassadors also to Saracuse, personally to debate and confesse in the presence of the Pretours concerning the renewing of the league aforesaid. But by that time, they found not the citie in the same quiettune and peaceable state. For Hippocrates and Epicides, after newes came that the Carthaginian navie was arived and rid at anchor under the bay of Porto Lango, another while of the fugitive traitours, many false surmises against their brethren in office, and namely, that they went about to betray Saracuse to the Romanes. But Appius began to keepe his Armada at anchor in the very mouth of the river, listening to know what hart and hope they of the contrary faction had, to effect that which they intended. Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those flanders and lewd suggestions: in so much as at the first, the multitude ran to the water side in a great hurrey and tumultuous manner to hinder their landing, if haply they attempted it. In this trouble some confusion of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meete together to deliberate what was best to be done. In which assembly, whiles some drew one way, other haied and pulled another way, and were at the point to mutine and grow to a sedition, Apollonides one of the principall and chiefe citizens made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the publicke peace, and thus he said. Never was there any citie neerer, either to hope of assured safetie, or to feare of utter destruction, than this of ours at this present. For if all would goe one way together, and with one accord either incline to the

Romanes, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were not a citie under the cope of heaven, whose state were more happie and fortunate than ours. But in case we be distracted, and the Commonweale go divers waies, there would not be more bitter and cruell warre betwene the Saracusan and the Romanes, than among the Saracusan themselves: when within one and the same walls, there should be banding one against another, and each side have their forces, their armor, and their captaines of their owne. And therefore we ought of all hands to endeavor what we can, that all may be of one mind and draw in the same line. As for the maine point now in question, Whether societic and alliance be the better and more commodious, the Romanes or the Carthaginians, is a matter of far lesse moment & importance than to be consulted and studied long upon. Howbeit, in choosing our friends and allies, we are to be directed by the authoritie and act of Hiero, rather than of Hieronymus: and to preserve that amitie which we have tried for 50 yeares in much felicitie, above a friendship for the present unknowne, and sometime heretofore found unfaithfull. It maketh somewhat also, to resolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and alliance to the Carthaginians, we neede not presently go to warre with them: but with the Romanes we must out of hand make accompt either of peace, or els of hot warres. This speech of his, the lesse that it favoured of factious partialitie and affection, the more autoritie and sway it caried with it. And besides the deliberation of the Pretours and choise Senators, the advice also of the martiall men was taken. And therefore the captaines of all their owne ensignes and companies, yea and the great commanders of the auxiliarie forces of their allies were willed to sit in counsell together with them. When the matter had bene often debated, and much contention and hot words passed betwene, at the last, because there appeared no colourable reason or cause to make warre with the Romanes, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their embassadors, there should be others also from them sent to ratifie and confirme the thing.

There passed not many daies between, when out of the Leontines countrie there arrived certaine Oratours, to crave helpe and succour for the gard and defence of their marches. This embassage seemed to come very fity and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the citie of the unruly and disordered multitude, and likewise to send out of the way, their chieftaines and ringleaders. So Hippocrates the Pretour was commaunded to lead thither the fugitive strangers. Many also of the mercenarie fouldiours, that were waged to helpe them in their warres, accompanied them: so as in all, the number amounted to foure thousand. This expedition and journey contented rented greatly as well the senders and setters of it out, as also the parties themselves that were sent forth. For these of the one side had a good occasion and opportunitie now offered them, to contrive a change in the state (the onely thing that so long they had desired) and those of the other, were right glad, that the sinke (as it were) of the citie was now well scoured & voided away. But this was like the palliative cure of a fore, & a lightning for the present of a sick bodie: whereby it might soone after by relapse fall backe, as it were, into a recidive, and a worse disease and more dangerous than the other. For Hippocrates began at first to make rodes by stealth into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and there to waite and spoyle afterward when Appius had sent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his confederates, hee charged with his whole power upon that guard that was opposed against him, and slew many of them. Whereof when Marcellus was advertised, hee dispatched embassadors incontinently to Saracuse, to charge them with the breach of peace: and to give them to understand, that there would never bee wanting some occasion or other of quarrell and warre, unless Hippocrates and Epicides were removed, and sent farre enough out of the way, not onely from Saracuse, but also quite out of Sicilia. Epicides for feare least if hee remained present in the citie, he might be charged & brought in question, for the fault and trespass of his brother absent, or be wanting for his part, in the raising of new warre, went himselfe also in person into the Leontines countrie: and seeing them there forward enough of themselves, and provoked already against the Romanes, began also to alienate & turne their harts from Saracuse. For in these termes he suggested & informed against the Saracusan: namely, how they had capitulated with the Romanes, that all the cities & nations which were under the kings, should be subject unto them, and within their jurisdiction: so as now they cannot be content (quoth hee) with their libertie, unless they rule also like lords & kings. I would advise and counsell you therefore, to send word unto them and give them to understand, that the Leontines likewise deeme it good reason, that they should themselves be free: in regard either that the tyrant was killed within the ground of their citie, or because the first alarme for libertie began there. For they leaving and abandoning the captaines there that followed the kings, ran at once from thence to Saracuse. And therefore they are (saith hee) to rale that foresaid article out of the instrument of the covenants, or not to accept at all of peace with that condition. Soon were the multitude persuaded hereunto. And therefore when the embassadors of the Saracusan came to the Leontines, both to make complaint for killing of the Romans Corps de guard, & also to commaund peremptorily, that Hippocrates & Epicides should depart either to Locri, or to what other place they would rather chuse, so they went their waies & voided clean out of Sicilia: they returned unto them this stout answer againe, that neither the Saracusan had any commission and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romanes in their name, neither would they bee tied and obliged to any confederacie made by others than their owne selves. This answer the Saracusan made report of to the Romanes, and said plainly, that the Leontines were not under their jurisdiction, to be ordered and censured by them: and therefore, any thing comprised in the league with them notwithstanding, the Romanes might warre against them without breach of any covenant: and in that warre they would not for their parts, faile them; but doe their best: upon condition, that when they were once subdued, they might be reduced againe unto their obedience, according to the covenant comprehended in the league. Whereupon Marcellus with his whole power went forth against the Leontines, and sent Jug. Appius also, to assault them on the other side: and so hote were his fouldiours in this service, and bare themselves so resolute, for anger that the guard was slaine, during the time that there was truce of peace betwene, that at the very first assault they woon the citie. Hippocrates and Epicides, after they saw the walls skaled, and the gates of the citie broken open, besought themselves for their safetie, with some few into the castle, from whence by night they made a fearefull escape, and fled to Hieropolis, a citie in the same countrie, and there they hid themselves. As the Saracusan marched from home with a power of eight thousand armed men, and were come forward as far as to the river Mylas, they met with a messenger, who told them that the citie Leontium was forced. They reported other newes besides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that townsmen & fouldiours indifferently without respect were put to the sword: that hee though verily, there was not left one alive of fourtene yeares of age and upward; that the citie was put to the sacke, and all the rich mens goods were given away. At this so fearefull and horrible newes, the armie staid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled bled, their leaders Sofis and Diomenes, consulted what to do. This lowd lie, arose not upon nothing, but was occasioned by mistaking of a matter. For there were scourged and belicaded of fugitive traitours, to the number of two thousand. But of Leontines and other souldiours, there was not one hurt, after the cittie was lost. And every man had all his owne goods, restored unto him againe: saving that onely which in the first hurlyburly of a cittie newly won, hapned to miscarie & perith. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontines, complaining & grieving that their fellow souldiours were so betraied & murdered, nor yet to abide there still, for to expect and heare more certeine tidings. The Pretours perceiving their minds disposed to revolt, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in case the captaines and heads of their furie and follie were once rid out of the way, led the armie to Megara: and went themselves in person with a few horsemen toward Herbelus, hoping to gaine the cittie by treason, whiles they all there were affrighted. But seeing that enterprise would not prevaile, they minded to use forcible meanes. The morrow after, they dislodged and raised their camp from Megara, purposing with all their forces, to assaile Herbelus. Hippocrates & Epicides supposing this to be the only way for them, although at the first sight not the safest, (considering all hope besides was cut off) namely to put themselves into the hands of the souldiours, who were for the most part acquainted with them, & besides, upon the brute of the execution and massacre of their fellow souldiours, thoroughly chafed, went out to meet the armie. The foremost ensignes in the forefront, hapned to consist of those six hundred Cretensians, who in the warres of Hieronymus had served under them, and received a favour and benefit at Anniball his hands. For being taken prisoners at Thrasymenus, among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romanes, they were set at large and sent away without ransom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epicides knew by their colours, habite, and fashion of their armour, they held out branches of olives and other veiles and tokens of suppliants, beseeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to vouchsafe to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Saracofians: by whom they should soon be yeckled unto the people of Rome, for to be murdered and cut in peeces. At this, they all cried aloud with one voice, & willed them to be of good cheere, for they should fare no worse than their owne selves. Vpon this communication the ensignes staid, and the armie stood still and marched not forward: but the general captaines wist not as yet what the cause might be of this stay. After the rumour was spread that Hippocrates and Epicides were come, and that all the host throughout by a generall applause seemed to like well of their comming: the Pretours incontinently set spurs to horse, and rode forward apace to the forefront of the vanguard, demanding of the Cretensians, what manner and fashion this was of theirs: and how they durst be so bold, as to parle and talke with enemies: and without license of their Pretours, to enter in them within their companies. And herewith they gave commandement, that Hippocrates should bee apprehended & bound sure with chaines. At which word the Cretensians set up such a crie, and the rest so answered it againe, with the like, that it was well scene, in case they had proceeded forward as they began, they should have incurred themselves no small danger. And thus in great perplexitie and feare of their owne lives, they commaunded to turne ensignes, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came; and dispatched messengers presently to Saracofe, to signifie in what tearmes they stood. Hippocrates seeing the souldiours given to be suspicious and readie to beleeve every thing, devised a cunning shift besides, in this manner. After he had sent out certeine of the Cretensians to beset the waies betweene them and Saracofe, he pretended that they had intercepted some letters from thence, which hee read unto the souldiours, and were in deed framed and indited by himselfe. The report of the letters ran in this forme. The Pretours of Saracofe to M. Marcellus their friend, greeting.

After these salutations and commendations premised, as the manner is, it followed written thus:

„ You have done well and orderly, in sparing none at all of the Leontines. But all other mercenarie souldiours besides, are in the same predicament: neither will Saracofe be ever in quiet, so long as any forraigne aide be either in the cittie or in your armie. And therefore our advice and counsel is, that you would endeavour to get them into your hands, who with our Pretours are encamped before Megara, and by execution of them to deliver and set Syracusa free in the end.

The contents of these letters were not so soone read, but with such an outcrie & alarme they ran to their weapons on all hands, that the Pretours amid this garboile, were faine to ride away as fast as they could gallop, toward Syracusa. But although they were fled, the mutinie neverthelesse continued

A continued and was not appeased: for the souldiours fell upon the Syracufians that were in the camp amongst them, and they had all drunke of the same cup, and not one escaped, but that Epicides and Hippocrates came betweene and opposed themselves against the multitude in this their furious rage, not upon any pittifull compassion that was in them, or regard of common humanities, but because they would not cut themselves from all hope of returne, and besides, they were not onely desirous to have the souldiours themselves affectionate unto them and faithfull, and withall in sted of hostages: but also purposed, by this so great desert, first to gain and win unto them the kinsfolke and friends of those souldiours, and afterwards to oblige and bind them fast, by so good a pawne and gage, remaining still among them. And having good experience, with how small a puffe and gale of wind, the common people turneth every way, they soborned a souldiour, one of them who was besieged within the cittie of Leontium, to carrie newes to Syracusa, sitting with those false tidings that were reported at the river Mylus, yea, and to aver the same confidently upon his owne knowledge, and tell things that were doubtfull, as if they were most certain, and by himselfe scene and knowne: thereby to stire up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not onely credited of the common multitude, but also being brought into the Countsell house, he greatly moved the Senate: insomuch, as some of them, more light of beleefe than others, gave it out openly and said, That it was happie, that the avarice and crueltie of the Romanes was thus discovered among the Leontines. And God blesse us from them here. For if they set foot once within Syracusa, they would commit the like outrages, yea, and worse too, a great deale, & more horrible; as they should find there greater matter to work upon, & to satisfie their covetous and greedie appetite to the full. Whereupon they agreed in generall, to shut the gates and to stand upon their guard, and defend the cittie. But they all feared not alike, nor hated the same persons. For the marriall men, in a manner every one, and a great part of the common people abhorred the name of the Romanes: the Pretours, and some few of the principall citizens, albeit they were in the huffe, and possessed with the false report aforesaid, yet they had more regard to provide for a mischief that was more imminent and nere, and readie presently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates & Epicides were come before Hexapylus. Within the cittie, the kinsfolke and friends of those citizens which were in the armie, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themselves to set the gates open, and agreed to have the common countie of them all, to be defended against the violence of the Romanes. Now, when one onely wicket of Hexapylus was opened, and they readie to enter in thereat, the Pretours came upon them in the manner. And first they commaunded by word of mouth, and threatened them; after that, by vertue of their place and authoritie, they seemed to fright and terrifie them: and last of all, seeing nothing could prevaile, forgetting their owne dignitie and majestie of their talling, they fell to pray & intreat them, not to betray their countie to those who aforesime were the instruments and supports of the Tyrant, and now the corrupters of the armie. But so deafe eare gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fit unto the Pretours, that they within, as well as without, set their hands to, by all forcible meanes to burst downe the gates, and so when they were all broken open, the armie was let in safe, and received within the Hexapylus. The Pretours fled for refuge with the youth and strength of the citizens unto Acradina. The mercenaries, the fugitives, and all the souldiours that were left in Syracusa (of them who served the king) joined to the armie, and augmented their forces. And so Acradina also was upon the first assault won. All the Pretours, but those that escaped by flight, and saved themselves in the midst of this hurly, were slaine: and the night coming upon them, staid the massacre. The day following, all bondslaves were called to receive the cap, and made freeth: the prisons were set open, and the prisoners let goe at large. And this confused rable and multitude of all sorts, created Hippocrates and Epicides Pretours. And thus Syracusa, having for a short time libertie, shining favourably upon it, fell backe againe into her old servitude.

When these tidings came to the Romanes, they incontinently they dislodged and removed the camp from Leontium, and marched directly toward Saracofe. It hapned the same time that the embassadors that from Zippus by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galacee of five banks of oares, but another galley of foure banks which was sent before, was not so soone entred into the mouth of the harbour, but it was taken, and the embassadors hardly, and with much ado escaped in the other. And now the world there was growne red this passage, that no laves of peace, nor so much as the very laws of arms were observed, but broken cleane at what time as the Romane armie lay in campe a mile and an halfe from the citie, at Olympium, the temple of Jupiter. For when it was thought meet to send Embassadors from thence, Hippocrates and Epicides with their followers encountered them without the gate, and charged them upon their petrill not to enter the citie. The Romane Oratour alleadged and said, That he came not to proclaime warre against the Syracusians, but to bring aid and helpe, as well unto those, who having escaped out of the middest of the slaughter fled unto the Romane campe, as also unto them, who being kept under with fear, endure bondage and thraldome more miserable than banishment, yea and death it selfe. Neither will the Romanes (saith hee) put up that shamefull and cruell murder of their allies without due revenge. And therefore, if those persons who were fled for succour unto them, may returne home safely into their countrie: if the authors of that massacre above said, be delivered into their hands: and if the Syracusians may enjoy againe their libertie, together with their lawes, there shall not need any hostilitie or warre. But in case these conditions bee not performed, they would persecute with fire and sword, all such as shall hinder and stand against the same, whosoever.

To this, Epicides framed his words in this wise. If (saith hee) yee had any message and commission, to parle with my brother and mee, wee would returne you an answer accordingly. In the meane while, yee were best be gone for this time, and returne againe when the citie and state of Syracuse shall be under their governance, unto whom yee were sent. As for war, if the Romanes thinke it good to deale that way, they shall find and know by experience, trie when they would, that it is one thing to assaile Syracuse, & another to set upon Leontium. And so leaving the Embassadors, he made the gates fast against them.

From this time forward, the Romanes laid siege unto Syracuse, and began to beleaguer it both by sea and land at once. On the land side at Hexapylus, by water at Acradina; upon the walls whereof the sea beateh. And like as they wan the citie of the Leontines, by terrifying them at the first assault, and therefore distrusted not, but that they should force and enter this also, one side or other, being so large and vast as it was, not compact, but built so scattering: one part sage afunder from another, they approached with all their fabrickes, engines, and ordinance of batterie against the walls. Which enterprife of theirs, so resolutely begun, and so hotely and forcible followed, had sped well and taken effect, if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse, Archimedes was hee, a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation, & beholding the skie with the planners, and other starres therein fixed: but a more wonderfull engineer, for devising and framing of artillerie, ordinance, fabrickes, and instruments of warre, whereby he would with very little ado and at ease, checke and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficultie had prepared for to give the assault. This cunning artificer and admirable workman, had planted engines of all sorts, upon the curtaine of the wall, which stood on certaine hills, and those not of even heighth: and having for the most part, high places that yielded hard access, and some other low againe, whereunto men might come on even and plaine ground, hee fitted and furnished every place accordingly. Now Marcellus from out of his galleies, of five ranks of oares, assaulted the wall of Acradina, which (as is above said) is washed and dashed upon, with the sea. And from the other galleies, the archers, slingers, yea and the light armed darters (called Velites) whose javelins are of that fashion, that they be unhandsome to be launched backe againe (by those that have not the cast and skil of it) so assailed the defendants, that they hardly suffered any one to stand upon the wals without hurt and danger. These I say, kept their galleies far distant from the wall, because archers and darters had need of some space and compass to lunge and let drive their shot. But unto the galleies of five course of oares, there were adjoined other two of either side: for which purpose the oares within were taken away, that they might close labourd to starboard, and so be coupled one unto the other. And thus being rowed as one entire gallee, by the helpe of the utmost oares without forth, they carried upon them platformes of timber framed with floures and lofts of planks, and other engines and instruments within them to batter and shake the wals. Against this artillerie from the galleies, Archimedes bestowed and disposed upon the walls counter-engines of sundrie sizes, some greater, some smaller. Against those galleies that were furthest off, he weighed and discharged stones of exceeding maine weight, and those that were neerer, he annoyed with lighter bullets, but those hee shot far thicker upon them. And last of all, to the end, that his owne citizens might without taking harme, make a counter-batterie against the enemies, and so annoy them, he caused certaine barbacanes or loop-holes,

A almost a cubit deep, to be pierced through the wals, & to stand thick from the foot thereof, to the parapet, and all to flank the enemy, through which ouvertures they within shot closely against the enemies, some arrows out of bowes, some quarrels out of scorpions and brakes, of meane and in different bignesse. And against those galleies, which approached more close and neer under the wals (because they would be within the shot, and that they within might earie and levell over them) he devised a crane or swiue to be planted aloft upon the wals, having at the one end, which hung over the sea, a drag or grappling hooke of yron like an hand, fastened thereto with a strong chaine: which tooke hold upon the proo of a gallee, and when the heavie counterpoise of lead at the other end, weighed it downe to the ground, and therewith drew with it the proo up on high, whiles it hung thus aloft in the aire, the gallee stood in a manner, endlong upon the poupe. And then the swiue being let go againe all at once sodainly with a sway, dashed the gallee, tumbling (as it were) downe from the top of the wall, with such a swinge and violence against the water (to the exceeding feare of the mariners) that if it had fallen directly downeright upon the keele, yet needs it must have received good store of water into it. Thus all their provision for assault by the sea side, was deluded and made void: and then they turned their whole forces from thence, to give assault by land. But even that part of the wall likewise, was as well furnished with all manner of engines & ordinance, provided at the great charge of Hiero, and by his careful forecast for many yeeres together: but devised & framed by the artificial cunning and skil only of Archimedes. Besides, the naturall situation of the ground was a great helpe: for that the rocke, upon which the foundations of the wall stand, is for the most part so steepe and bending forward, that not only the shot levelled out of any engine, but also whatsoever was but rolled & tumbled down, with the very own weight & poise, came with a great force and violence upon the enemy. Which foresaid cause, made the assailants to have difficult climbing up, and as unstedfast footing & keeping of their hold: Whereupon they went to counsell. And considering well, that all their attempts and enterprises were thus deluded & mocked by the enemy: it was thought good to give over assault, and only by long and continuall siege, to cut them off from all vituals both by land and sea. In the mean while Marcellus with one third part (welneere) of the armie, went forth in expedition, to recover againe those cities, which taking occasion upon these troubles, were revolted to the Carthaginians. And he gained Pelorus & Herbecus, which yielded on their own accord. As for Megara, which he woon by assault, he rased it downe to the ground, and sacked it, to the fearefull example of all the rest, and especially of the Saracensians.

And much about that time, Himilco also, who had a long time rid in the Bay of the Cape Pachynus with his Armada, disbarked & set a land at Heraclea (which they call Minoa) 25000 footmen, 3000 horsemen, & 12 Elephants. He had not all this power of men when he lay with his fleet under Pachinus. For after that Hippocrates had taken & held the possession of Saracofe, he went to Carthage: where, being sent unto both by embassadors from Hippocrates, & also by letters from Annibal (who moved him & made remonstrances, That now the time was come to recover Sicilie againe with much honor & glorie: and being himselfe there present in person no bad solicitor by word of mouth to further & follow the cause) he easily perswaded the Carthaginians & prevailed that as great a power both of horse & foot as might possibly be raised, should passe over into Sicilie. Being arrived at Heraclea, within few daies after Agrigentum was delivered up into his hands. And all other cities, which had banded & taken part with the Carthaginians, were put in so good hope to drive the Romans out of Sicilie: that even they at last who were besieged within Saracofe, took hart unto them; & were so in their ruffe, that supposing part of their forces sufficient enough to defend their citie, they parted between them the charge & managing of the whole war in this manner: That Epicides should remaine behind for the guard and defence of the citie, and Hippocrates ioyned with Himilco, and warre jointly against the Romanes. Hee with 10000 foot, and 50 horse, set out by night: and passed betweene the Corps de guard, where none at all warded, and encamped about the citie Acerræ. As they were fortifying their campe, Marcellus came upon them as hee retired backe from Agrigentum, possessed now by the adverse part: whether he had made great hast, but in vaine, in hope to prevent his enemies, and get thither afore: but little thought he (and nothing lesse) than in his returne from thence, at that time and in that place, to meete with an armie of Saracensians that should make head against him. Howbeit, for feare of Himilco and the Carthaginians, whom he knew to be abroad, and with whom he was not able to make his part good with that power which he had about him, he marched as circumspectly

spectly as he could, having his eye on every side, and led his army in good order of battaile against all occurrences whatsoever might happen by the way. And so as good hap was, than gave full forecast and diligence, which he was provided with against the Carthaginians, served him in very good steed against the Sicilians. Finding them therefore busie in pitching their tents, without order, and skattered asunder, and most of them unarmed, he environed soone all the Infanterie that they had, and put them to the sword. But the Cavallerie after a slight skirmish begun, fled with their leader Hippocrates to Acrae. Marcellus after he had by this fight refreshed, and kept in the Sicilians, who were at hand to fall away: and revolt unto the Romanes, returned to Saracofe: and after some few dayes, Himilco joynted with Hippocrates, and encamped about eight miles from thence, upon the river Anatis.

Likewise about the same time, or very neere, it hapned that 55 war-ships of the Carthaginians, under the conduct of Bomilcar, Admirall of the Armada, put into the great haven of Saracofe out of the deepe and maine sea: and also the Romanes fleet of thirtie gallies, with five ranks of oars, arrived at Panormus, and landed the first legion there: and thus the warre was turned, and diverted from Italie. So wholly seemed both nations, as well Romanes as Carthaginians, amused upon nothing now but Sicilie. Himilco making full account to prey upon the Romanes legion which was set a land at Panormus, as they should come to Saracofe, missed of the right way to meete with them: for he marched and led his power far within land higher in the country, but the legion coasted along by the sea side, accompanied as it were with the fleet which flanked them: and came to Pachinus unto Appius Claudius, who with part of his forces went out to meet them on the way. But the Carthaginians made no long stay about Saracofe. For Bomilcar having small trust and confidence in his ships, considering that the Romanes were comming toward him with a fleet, and were twice as many in number: and withall seeing, that by sojourning there, he did no other good but with his companie empoverish and eat out his friends, spread and halved up saile, and with a mery wind passed over into Africa. Himilco also, who had dogged and followed after Marcellus in vaine as far as Saracofe, to espie some good opportunitie and vantage to bid him battaile, before he joynted with a greater power: seeing that he was hereof disappointed, and the enemy lying about Saracofe safe and secure, as well in regard of their fortifications, as their forces: because he would not spend any longer time to no purpose in sitting there still, to looke upon their allies how they were besieged, he dislodged and removed from thence: attending, wheresoever there were any hope and likelihood of revolt from the Romanes, thither to come with his armie, and shew himselfe in person, to encourage and animate by his presence, those that favoured his part. And first he recovered Murgantia, where the Romanes garrison was betrayed by the inhabitants, and delivered unto his hands. Into which citie the Romanes had conveyed great store of corne, victuall, and provision of all sorts. Vpon this revolt, other cities also tooke hart unto them, and the Romanes garrisons were either thrust and driven out of the castles and fortress, or els were treacherously betrayed, surprised, and destroyed.

The citie Enna, seated upon an high hill, and on every side inaccessible, as it was by naturall situation of the ground imprenable, so it had a strong garrison within the castle, and a capitaine of that garrison, one, that was not so easy to be compassed and over-raught by deceitfull traines. His name was Pinarius, a witty man, & hardie withall, who reposed more trust in his owne diligence to prevent, that he might not possibly be deceived, than in the truth and faith of the Sicilians. And at this time more than ever before, he stood upon his gard, and tooke heedfull care of himselfe and his charge, by occasion that he heard of so many treacheries & treasons, so many revolts of cities, and massacres of garrisons: and therefore as well by day as night, he looked that the castle was well provided and furnished of good watch and ward continually, and the souldiers never departed from their armor nor their appointed place. Which when the chiefe citizens of Enna perceived, who already had covenanted with Himilco, and promised to betray the fort and the garrison: and saw that the Romanes capitaine was so wary, that he lay not open unto the opportunitie of any fraudulent and guilefull course, they resolved by a pect and open meanes to effect this their designed enterprise. They alleged therefore unto Pinarius, that the citie and castle both, ought to be in their power since that they entred into league and amitie with the Romanes as freemen, and were not yeilded as slaves to be kept in duresse and prison. Reason would therefore, and meete it was (as they thought) that all the keyes of the gates were delivered unto them. With good and trustie allies, their owne faith and truth is the surest bond: And no doubt, the

A people and Senate of Rome would give them greater thanke, and esteeme more deere of them, if so be they of themselves, not by constraint but of willing mind, would abide and continue in their sound allegiance and fast friendship. Pinarius made answer againe, That he was by his generall placed there, capitaine of the garrison: at his hands he received the keyes of the gates, and the Constableship of the castle, and the same to hold and keepe neither at his owne will, nor at the pleasure of the men of Enna; but at his disposition, who lealed him his commission. Now for a capitaine to abandon his fort (quoth he) is a capitall crime among the Romanes, by vertue of a law, which our fathers themselves have confirmed, even by the exemplary punishment & death of their owne children, who have transgressed the same. And seeing the Constable Marcellus is not far off, ye may if it please you, send your embassadours unto him, of whom you may be certified, under whose power, commandement, and government I am. I tush, say they, we will never send unto him. But if words and reasons may not prevaile, we will worke some other meanes to recover our libertie againe. Then quoth Pinarius to them, If ye thinke much to addresse your messengers to the Constable, yet do me this favour, as to call a common counsell of the people for my sake, that I may know, whether these demands proceede from some few, or from the whole bodie of the citie. So it was accorded and agreed, that a generall assemblie should be proclaimed against the morrow. Then Pinarius after that he was departed from this parlie, returned into the fortress, and calling his souldiers together, spake unto them in this wise. I suppose, ye have heard already (my souldiers) in what sort the Romanes garrisons have these dayes past, bene betrayed and murdered by the Sicilians. That treacherie hitherto ye have avoided & escaped; first & principally through the goodnesse of the gods: next and immediately by your owne valour and prowess, and by continuall watch & ward standing in your armor both day & night. And I would to God ye might passe as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choise, either to endure & suffer some horrible mischiefe, or to execute and commit a fearefull example of crueltie. This intended treason of theirs, hath bene carried and conveyed closely and cautelously all this while, & seeing they cannot as yet meet with any advantage to surpris us, they would seem now openly and without dissimulation, to demand for to have all the keyes of the gates under their hands. Which we should not so soon part with & render unto them, but presently Enna would turne to the Carthaginians, and more cruelly should we heere be murdered and hewen in peeces, than the garrison was at Murgantia. Much a do I had to obtaine of them respite of this one night, to take further counsell: that I might advertise you of the present danger, wherein both I and you stand. To morrow morning by day light, they purpose to hold a solemne assembly of the people, and to make a speech unto them, to accuse me, and to stirre them up against you. And to morrow is the day, that the citie Enna shall overflow either with the blood of you, or of the inhabitants. And be ye well assured, that as ye shall loose all that you have, if they surpris you: so in case you prevent them & begin the fray, there shall no perill at all betide you. Looke who first laich hand on his sword & draweth it, he shall carie away the victorie cleere. Therefore ye must beethere, prest in your armour, and attentive to expect a signall from me. I my selfe will be present in the assembly, and with parling and debating, temporise and draw out the time, untill ye be all in readinesse and every thing in order. And so soone as I shall give you a signe with my gowne, then let me heare you set up an outcrie, then let me see you fall upon the multitude: down with them and spare not, and put them all to the sword. See in any case there be not one of them escape your hands and remaine a live; from whom ye may feare any harme, either by fraud or force. And now I beseech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proserpina; and all other gods in heaven above, or in hell beneath, who inhabit this citie, these holy lakes and sacred groves, wherein ye are honoured, and worshipped, to vouchsafe to be propice and favourable unto us; in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treacherie intended against us, and not to offer mischiefe unto other: and not otherwise. I would use more words unto you my friends and souldiours, for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deale with men in armes: but since they are naked, unarmed, & unwarned, you shall kill and sleie them at your pleasure, and satisfie your selves with their blood. And to the end that you need not feare any harme from Himilco and the Carthaginians, loe the Constable himselfe lieth encamped neere at hand. After this exhortation, they were dismissed, to take their resfection and rest. The next day, they were bestowed in sundrie parts of the citie; some to beset all the streets, others to stop the passages and the waies against the townsmen, that they might not escape. But the most of them, them stood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing suspected, as being used heretofore to behold and see the assemblies of the people. The Roman captain Publius, was by the magistrates brought forth & presented before the people, where hee pleaded; That it lay not in his hands, but in the power and authoritie of the Consull, to dispose of that which they demanded; and he iterated for the most part, the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began gently, some few by litle and litle; afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver up the keys; and so consequently all with one voice charged and commanded him so to do: and when hee seemed to make some stay & deferre the matter, they menaced & threatened fiercely, yea, and seemed as if they would no longer forbear, but proceed to extreme violence. Then the capaine made a signe with his robe, according to the former agreement, & with that, the soldiers who had their eyes upon him, waiting wistly for the signall, and were ready for execution, set up a lowd crie & ran: some from aloft upon the multitude assembled over against them; others stood thicke at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, & opposed themselves against them. Thus the men of Enna, shut up & penned within the theatre, were massacred & lay tumbled one upon other, not they onely that were killed, but such also as fled one over anothers head: the sound fell upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heapes. Then there was running from thence sundrie waies, & as if the citie had bin taken upon assault by the enemy, there was nothing but murdering & flying away in every place. And as hore & furious were the soldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged worthily & justly to be killed) as if like danger presented unto them, or holler raised in (set battle), had provoked them thereto. Thus Enna was held still for the Romanes, by this means: were the deed simply ill, or by circumstance needful & necessarie; Marcellus mistook not of the fact, and granted the pillage of the citizens of Enna to the soldiers: supposing that the Sicilians thoroughly frightened by this fearfull example, would betray no more garisons. The calamitie & hard fortune of this citie, (standing as it did, in the very hart of Sicilie) was in one day divulged and noised throughout the Island, from one end to the other. And otherwise, a famous & renowned town it was, either for the natural situation so exceeding strong; or because all places in it, were accounted sacred & holy, in remembrance of Proserpina, who in times past left her footing & traces there, at what time as the was stolen away & ravished by Pluto. Nowe was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this cursed & detestable massacre, had defiled & polluted not onely the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereupon even they likewise, who stood but doubtfull and indifferent before, fell now away from the Romanes, and turned to the Carthaginians.

Then Hippocrates retired to Murgantia, and Himilco to Agrigentum: who were sent for, by the conspiratours and traitors within Enna, and approached with their forces, but to no purpose. Marcellus returned to the Léontines countie: and after hee had brought into the campe corne and other victuals, and left there a mean guard, hee presented himselfe to the siege that lay before Saracose. And when hee had sent Appius Claudius to Rome to sue for the Consullship, hee committed the charge in his roume of the armada there, and the old leaguer unto T. Quintius Crispinus. Himselfe erected and fortified his wint'ring harbours five myles from Exapylos, at a place which men call Leontia. And these were the affairs of Sicilie unto the beginning of winter.

In the same summer, the warre began likewise with king Philip, which long before had bene suspected. For there came Embassadours from Oricum to M. Valerius the Pretor, Admirall of the fleet, for the defence of Brundisium, and the sea coast therabout, of Calabria, & made report that Philip first assaied to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred & twentie light gallies, or foists with two ranks of oars against the streame: and afterwards, seeing hee could not effect his purpose so speedily as hee hoped, privily by night hee approached with his armie to Oricum: and that the citie, situate upon a plaine, neither strongly fenced with walls, nor well manned with souldiours, ne yet furnished with armour and munition, was at the first assault surprised and woon. And as they recounted these newes, so, they besought him to grant aid and succour: and to make head against this undoubted enemy of the Romanes, either by land, or forces at sea, and to chase him away from them, who for no other reason were by him failed, but because they were neer neighbors to Italie. M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to T. Valerius his Lieutenant generall, with a fleet of ships well rigged, furnished, and appointed; and having embarked these souldiours (which the gallies for war would not receive) in the merchants ships of burden, arrived at Oricum on the second day after, and finding that the

A kept with a small and slight garrison, which Philip when he departed from thence, had left there, recovered it without much resistance. Thither repaired unto him Embassadours from Apollonia, who brought word that they were besieged, because they refused to revolve from the Romanes: and were not able to hold out any longer against the forcible attempts of the Macedonians, unless a garrison of Romanes were sent unto them. Hee promised to effect whatsoever they desired, and so shipped a thousand elect and choise souldiours in gallies, & sent them to the mouth of the river, under the conduct of a capaine of Allies Nevius Crispus, an industrious man & an expert souldiour. He having landed his men, and sent the gallies backe to Oricum (from whence hee came) to the rest of the armada, conducted his souldiours higher in the countie, farre from the river side, by a way that was not beset nor held by the kings forces: and in the night season, unware to all the enemies, entred the citie. The day following they rested, only the captain tooke

B a survey of the youth & able men of Apollonia, of their armor & the munitions & forces of the citie. When hee had scene and perused all, thereupon hee was well appaied and encouraged to fight, and wit hall, hee had learned by the escoutes and spies, how trechlesse, ydle, and negligent the enemies were without. So at midnight hee went forth of the citie without any noise, and entered the campe of the enemies so carelessly guarded as it was, and lying so open: that by credible report, there were above one thousand men gotten within the trench & rampier, before that any one was ware thereof, and if they had held their hands & not fallen to killing, they might have passed on still even as farre as to the kings pavilion. But by reason that they slew the warders next the gates, the enemies were raised: whereupon, they were all so frightened and terrified, that

C not onely there was never a souldiour tooke weapon in hand, and went about to repulse the enemy out of the campe, but even the king himselfe, halfe naked as he was, and newly awakened out of his sleepe, clad in simple appaerell, scarce decent for a common souldiour, much lesse ywis for a king, was faine to run toward the river side to his ships. Thither also the other multitude fled disordered in heapes. There were not many under three thousand, either slaine or taken prisoners in the campe. Yet there were more by oddes of the enemies taken, than killed. In the rising of the campe, the Apollonians met with Catapults and Balists, and other engines, provided for the assault of the citie, which they conveyed all to Apollonia, to serve for defence of their walls against the like occasion of needfull service. All the boodie besides of the campe was graunted unto the Romanes.

D Tidings hereof being come to Oricum, M. Valerius presently set forth the Armada as far as to the mouth of the river, that the king might not flee away and escape by sea with his ships, whereupon Philip distrustful of his power as well by sea as shore, and doubting he was not able to match the Romanes, drew up some of his ships to land, set fire upon the rest, and so by land went into Macedonie, with a great part of his souldiours disarmed and spoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Oricum with M. Valerius.

The same yeere in Spaine the affairs went variably on both sides. For before that the Romanes passed over the river Iberus, Mago & Asdruball defeated a mightie host of Spaniards, so as, all the fatter part of Spaine had fallen from the Romanes, but that P. Cornelius made hast to transport his armie over Iberus, and came in good time to settle the wavering and doubtfull minds of the E allies. At the first the Romanes encamped at Castum Alunt, a place memorable for the death of great Amilcar. The castle was well fortified and thither afore, they had conveyed corne. But because all those quarters thereabout were full of enemies, and sundrie times, their Cavallic had charged the Roman footmen, and gone cleere away without any harme, whereby there had ben slain at times upon a 2000 of them, which either made small halt away, & staid behind, or straggled loosely over the fields: the Romanes departed from thence, neerer unto places of more securitie & peace, and fortified themselves in campe upon the mount of Alunt. Thither came Cn. Scipio with all his forces, and likewise Asdruball the sonne of Gisco, the third captaine of the Carthaginians with a full armie. And they all encamped beyond the water, over against the fort of the Romanes above said. P. Scipio, accompanied with certaine light armed souldiours, was gone out closely to discover and take view of the places thereabout, howbeit not so covertly, but hee was espied by the enemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a shrewd foile in the open plaine champaign, but that hee tooke a little hill thereby for his vantage. Where hee was environned and beset round about: but by the coming of his brother Cneus, he was delivered out of that danger.

Castulo,

Castulo, a famous and strong citie in Spaine, and so nere linked in affinitie to the Carthaginians, that Anniball from thence married his wife, raunged to the Romanes. The Carthaginians came against Illiturgum, and began to assault it, because a garison of the Romanes lay there: and like they were to be mailters of the towne, by occasion especially of a great dearth and scarcitie of victuals within. But Cn. Scipio for to relieve his friends and the garison, went out with a legion lightly appointed without cariages, and marching betwene the two camps of the enemies, skirmished with them, slew many of them, and entred the citie. The morrow after, he sallied out, joyined in fight with the enemy, and sped as well: so as in both battailes there were slaine of them, above twelve thousand in the place, more than ten thousand taken prisoners, and 36 militarie ensignes caried away. Thus the siege brake up at Illiturgum. After this, the Carthaginians began to lay siege unto Bigerra (a citie also confederate with the Romanes.) But Cn. Scipio at his coming raised that siege without any conflict. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward against Munda, and the Romanes followed them thither streight after. There they encountered together, and fought a set battaile with banners displayed, for the space welneere of foure houres. And as the Romanes bare themselves bravely, and had gotten the better, and were at point of the victorie, the retreat was sounded, by occasion that Cn. Scipio was hurt fore in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the souldiers about him were greatly afraid, that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not bene for that stay and hinderance, the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have bene forced. For not only the souldiers, but the Elephants also were driven already so farre as the trench, and even there upon the very banke, 39 of them were sticked with darts and pikes. In this battaile likewise, were killed (by report) twelve thousand men, almost three thousand taken prisoners, and 57 militarie ensignes woon. Then the Carthaginians retred back to the citie Aurinx, and the Romanes followed upon them, because they would give them no time to rest and breath themselves after their fright. Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battaile the second time, and got the victorie cleere: but fewer of the enemies were slaine by the one halfe than afore, because there were not so many in number left to fight. But (as they are a nation given naturally to renew warre, and to be ever fighting, and can not give over) they soone repaired and made up all their forces. For Asdruball had sent his brother Mago, to levie and gather new souldiours: whereupon they tooke fresh hart againe to try another field. These, being for the most part other souldiours (new come) fought as it were in revenge, and to uphold that side which in few dayes space had so often taken the foyle, and demeaned themselves as courageously as they before, and sped as untowardly. For there were slaine of them above eight thousand, not many under one thousand taken captives, with militarie ensignes 58. In rifling of them, there was found very much spoile of the Gauls, as rings of gould, carkanets, colars, and bracelets great store. Over and besides, two great lords or princes of the Gauls, whose names were Manicapus and Civismarus, were slaine outright in that conflict. Eight Elephants taken alive, and three killed.

Now when as the affaires in Spaine went thus fortunately with the Romanes, they began at length for very shame to thinke of Saguntum, a towne that was the cause of all these warres, and had now five yeares already bene in the hands and possession of the enemy. Whereupon by force of armes they recovered it, drave out of the towne the garison of the Carthaginians, and restored it againe to the auncient inhabitants, as many as remained alive, and had escaped these broiles of warre. As for the Turdetanes, who were the occasion of the warres betwene the Saguntines and the Carthaginians, they subdued them, and brought them under their subjection, sold them in port sale, and destroyed their citie utterly. These were the atchievances in Spaine during the time that Q. Fabius and M. Claudius were Consuls.

At Rome, when the new Tribunes of the commons were once entred into their office, presently L. Metellus one of the Tribunes aforesaid, arrested the Censors P. Furius, and M. Atilius, peremptory to make their apparence and answer before the people. These Censors had taken from him being Treasurer the year before, his horse of service allowed him by the citie, called & displaced him out of his Tribe, deprived him of libertie to give his voice, & made him Aerarius, and all, for being a partie with them at Cannæ, who, conspired to abandon Italic. But by the meanes and mediation of the other nine Tribunes, they were discharged: for they would not suffer, that the Censors should come to their answer while they were in office. And the death of one of them, namely P. Furius, was the cause that they could not accomplish the fessing & numbring

A bring of the citizens. And then M. Atilius surrendered up his Magistracie. Qu. Fabius Max. held the solemne assembly and parliament of the people for the election of Consuls, wherein were created Q. Fabius Max. the Consul his sonne, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, both absent. For Pretours, there were elected M. Atilius, and with him, they who at that time were Ædiles of the chaire, to wit, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and M. Aemylus Lepidus.

This yeare, as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-plays first set out by the Ædiles of the chaire, and continued foure dayes. This Ædile Tuditanus above named was he, who at Cannæ (when all besides him for feare were astonied, in that wofull calamitie) brake forcibly through the mids of the enemies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Consull had finished the Election, then the new Consuls Elect were sent for, to repaire into Rome; and they entred their Magistracie. Then they assembled the Senate for to consult and take order for the warre, for the provinces as well their owne, as those that were under the Pretours: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of commaund. So the provinces and armies were divided in this wise: The warre with Anniball, wherefoever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Coss with the charge of one armie, which Sempronius himselfe had before under his conduct: and of another, commaunded by Fabius the Consull. And those were two legions. M. Aemylus the Pretour, whose lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the foreiners, had committed his auctoritie unto his Colleague Atilius, the Pretour of the citizens of Rome, that he might governe the province about Luceria, and those two legions, over which Q. Fabius now Consull, had the commaund, while he was Pretour. To Sempronius the Pretor, befell the province of Ariminum. To Cn. Fulvius was allotted Suessula, with two legions likewise: so as, Fulvius should have the leading of the legions of citizens, and Tuditanus receive his from M. Pomponius. The government of the forein provinces continued still in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sicilie, so farre as the dominion of king Hiero extended: and Centulus the Viz-Pretour, had the charge of the old province. T. Otacilius was high Admirall of the navie, without any new supply or augmentation of forces. M. Valerius was employed in Greece and Macedonie, with one legion, and the armada which he had before. Q. Mutius was L. Deputie in Sardinia, having under him the old armie, consisting of two legions. And C. Terentius had the administration of the affaires in Picenum, with that one legion which long time he had bene D captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon, that there should be mustred and enrolled two new legions of citizens, and twentie thousand men besides levied of allies and associates. With these captaines and these forces aforesaid, they provided for the defence and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many warres at once, either in hand already, or suspected shortly. The Consuls having enrolled two legions of citizens, and chosen a supplie to make out the rest, before that they set foote out of the citie, procured the pacification of the gods, for the fearefull & prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blasted and smitten with lightning from heaven: and likewise the temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Other vaine objects and illusions also of the eyes and eares, which men imagined they saw and heard, were beleevied for truthe. Namely, there appeared in the river of Tarracina certain resemblances and shewes of gallies, whereas in deece there were none such. And in the temple of Iup. Vicilinus, which standeth in the territorie of Cossa, there was heard, forsooth, rustling of armour: and the river of Amitemus seemed to run with blood. When satisfaction was made for these strange signes, the gods pleased, and all well againe, according to the direction set downe by the Priests and Prelates, then the Consuls set forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucania, and Fabius into Apulia. Where, if it fell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the camp at Suessula, as Lieutenant & assistant unto his sonne. And when Fabius the younger went forth to meete him, and his sergeants or huiffers marching afore, said not a word to Fabius the father, nor put him aside to give way, for very reverence of his person. (such a majestic he caried) the old man rode forward, and passed by eleven of the said Lictors with their bundles of rods. Then the Consull commaunded the Serjeant that was next himselfe to do his office: and with that, the said huiffier called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horseback: and at last, as he set foot a ground: I did all this but to try quoth he, my sonne, whether you knew well that you were a Consull or no.

There came that night secretly to the Consull while the camp lay there, one Cassius Attinius an an Arpinate, with his three bondslaves, promising, that if hee might have a good reward for his service, he would betray Arpos into his hands. Fabius then proposed this matter unto his counsell, to be debated off. Some were of opinion, that Altinus was to be whipped and put to death, fugitive renegade and false knave as he was: a common enemy, and a dangerous to either part, and playing with both hands, like a double-hearted hypocrite. Who first, after the overthrow at Cannæ (as if hee might turne with the wheele of fortune, and goe from his woord and faithfull promise, and change ever as the chancheth) raunged himselfe unto Anniball; and by his example, drew with him Arpos to revolt and rebell: now, after that he seeth the Roman estate to rise again, and hold up head (and that, beyond his hope, and contrary to his desires) he would play the villain and turne-coat againe, and come with a new practise of a more shamefull treason than before: as if trecherie and falshood were of the nature and qualitie of a judgement passed in Septenvirall court: and as if he might be allowed to carrie two faces under a hood, & alter every houre. Faithlesse friend, that he is, not to be trusted, and slipperie enemy, not to be regarded. A good deed it were, that together with that same traitour of Falerij, and the other of king Pyrrhus, hee made a third, and were punished accordingly for exemplarie justice, to teach all rogues and renegates hereafter, how they run from their lords and maisters. On the other side, old Fabius (the Consuls father) replied againe and said, That men nowadaies had forgotten how to make difference of factions, and in the very heat and midst of warres, reasoned and gave their opinion and censure of every thing and person, as in a free time of open peace: when as indeed, wee are to thinke, consider, and deliberate of this point, that (if possible it might bee) no more of our allies revolt from the people of Rome, rather than invite and incite them thereto: and after one is started aside, and upon repentance returned againe to the auncient amitie, to fall a reviling and rebuking of him, and bitterly to say, that he deserveth to be made an example to all others. For if it may be lawfull for one to turne from the Romanes, and held unlawfull to returne againe unto the Romanes, no man need doubt, but shortly the Romane Empire will bee forsaken of all her confederates and allies, and we shall see within a while all the cities in Italie linked and confedered in fast league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth hee) I am not the man, that thinketh Altinus worthe to be trusted in any thing for all this, but I would take a meane course and middle way betweene both extremities. My opinion is therefore, that for the present he should be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commaunded to ward, & to have the libertie of a prisoner, and only be kept forthcomming in some confederat & trustie citie, not far from the campe, during the time of the warre. And when the warre is once finished and ended, then I hold it good to deliberate and consult, whither that his former revolt hath deserved more punishment, than this his present returne meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of old Fabius, and gave their assent. So he was bound with chaines, and both himselfe and his companie delivered over and put in custodie, & a good round summe of gold, which he then had brought with him, was by commandement reserved for his use. At Cales he made his abode: where all the day time he used to walk at libertie, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kept him close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his home was, they of his own house began first to misse him, and seeke for him: afterwards, when it was noised throughout the whole citie, that he was out of the way, and could not be found: the same hereof caused a tumult, for the losse of a principall person as hee was, thus revolted to the enemy. And for feare of an alteration in the State, presently the newes thereof was sent to Anniball. Who was nothing offended thereat, both because long afore he had the partie himselfe in jealousie and suspicion, as one neither fish nor flesh, a man of no credit, and hardly to be trusted; and also for that he found a good occasion and quartrell to seize upon the goods of so rich and substantiall a citizen, and to make sale thereof. But to the end, that the world might thinke, that hee was more angrie against his person, than greedie of his substance, he joined with crueltie, a grave course also of judicall severitie, that the one might serve as a fuile to give lustre to the other. For having sent for his wife & children into the campe, first he examined them straitly, for to know whether he was fled, and what store of silver and gold he had left behind him at home in his house: and when he had learned ynough of them touching every particular, and as much as he desired, he burnt them quick to ashes.

Fabius being departed from Suesula, purposed the first thing that hee did, to assaile Arpi. Where he lay encamped a mile from the town: and after hee had well viewed by night approach, the situation of the citie, and considered the wall, looke where hee saw it was most strong and and sure, and therefore guarded most slightly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hottest assault. And when he had sufficiently provided & got together all ordinance and engines, requisite for the batterie of cities, he made choise of the most hardie and valiant Centurions of the whole armie, and set over them certaine Tribunes and marshals, valourous and doubtie good men, and appointed unto them a regiment of fixe hundred souldiours (for so many he thought sufficient for the present service) with direction and commaundement, that when the trumpet sounded the reliefe of the fourth watch, they should bring skaling ladders to that place aforesaid. Now there stood a gate low and narrow, answering to a street not much used and frequented, by reason that quarter of the citie was not inhabited, but stood void. That gate hee gave them order first to scale and climbe over, and then to goe forward on the wall, & from within-forth to breake downe the barres, and levell the said gate, and when they were maisters of that quarter of the citie, then to wind the home, & give signall to the rest of the forces for to approach and come hard to the towne, saying, That he would have all things in readinesse, and in good order. This direction was performed accordingly with great diligence, & that which was thought and feared, would have been a hinderance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which helped them most, that they were not descried. And that was a smoking shower of raine that began after midnight, which caused the warders and watchmen to quit their standings, forsake the Sentinels, and to flie into the houses for covert. The first noise of the storme pouring downe with such force, made, that the rumbling of the souldiours could not bee heard, as they were breaking downe the gate; and as it grew after to raine more softly, and so kept still at one, it sounded gently and sweetly in their eares, untill it brought a good many of them fast asleepe.

Now after they had seized the gate, the marshals gave order, That the Cornettiers should be bestowed in that void street aforesaid, distant equally asunder, and to wind their hornes, for to waken and raise the Consull. Which being done, according as it was before agreed, the Consull commaunded the standards and ensignes to be brought forth, and somewhat before day light, entered at the said broken gate into the citie. With that, the enemies at length began to rouse themselves, for now the shower and storme was past, and the day approached. There was a garrison in the citie at hand of five thousand of Anniball his souldiours, armed and well appointed: and the Arpines of themselves were 3000 strong. Those the Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a forlorne hope, and opposed them against the enemy, for feare of some trecherous prank that they might play behind their backs. First they began to arraigne themselves to fight in the darke, blind, and narrow lanes. For the Romanes had filled and taken up not onely all the streets, but also the houses that were next the gate, to the end, they might not be gauled with shot, and wounded from aloft. Some Arpines and Romanes fell at length to meet, to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another, and so began to commune and talke together. The Romanes asked what the Arpines meant to rebell; for what offence and harme given of the Romanes, and for what desert & benefit received from the Carthaginians, should they (being naturall Italians) maintaine warre, for Aliens, straungers, and barbarous nations, against the Romanes their old friends and auncient allies; and so to bring Italie in subjection to Affricke, to do homage and fealtie, yea and to become tributarie, and to pay pension unto it? The Arpines excused and cleared themselves, saying that they (simple men, and ignorant of all things) were bought and sold by their great rulers and principall citizens, and lived in manner as captives and slaves under the commaund of some few persons, that might do all. Vpon this beginning, more & more of them grew to parling and conference. At length the Pretour of Arpi himselfe, was by his own people and citizens brought and presented before the Consull: where, after faithfull promise passed, betweene the ensignes & the battailes; the Arpines immediatly bent their forces on the Romanes side against the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewise (who were not many under one thousand men) after they had capitulate and agreed with the Romane Consull, nothing but this one article, That the garison of the Carthaginians might be sent forth & passe away safe without harme: came with their colours to the Consull. Then all the gates were set open for the Carthaginians to depart: and being sent away upon safe conduct, without any harme at all or dammage unto Anniball, arrived at Salapia. Thus Arpi was restored againe to the Romans, without the losse and detriment of any one man, but one onely old traitour and new fugitive revolt. The Spaniards were appointed to have double allowance of victuals: and they performed good, faithfull, and valiant service many times after to the Commonweale.

When

When one of the Consul was in Apulia, and the other in Lucania, one hundred and twelve men of armes, Gentlemen of the nobilitie of Capua, having license graunted by the magistrates to go out of the citie, pretending to make a rode into the enemies countrie, and to fetch in booties and prizes, came directly to the Romanes campe, lying about Sueffula. And meeting with the Corps de guard, declared who they were, & that they would parle with the lord Deputie. Now Cn. Fulvius was the Generall and commaunder of the armie there: who being advertised and certified heereof, gave order that ten onely of all that number, should bee brought before him unarmed. When he had heard their suite and demanda, which was nothing else, but that when Capua was recovered by the Romanes, they might have their goods restored unto them: he received them all into his protection. The other Pretour also Sempronius Tuditanus, woon by force the towne Cliternum: where there were taken prisoners above seven thousand men: and a good H deale of copper and silver coine gained besides. At Rome there chanced a fearfull and pittifull fire, which continued two nights & one whole day. All between Salinae & the gate Carmentalis, together with the Aequimelum and the street Iugarium, were burned downe and made even with the ground. Likewise without the gate the fire spred far all about, and in the temples of Fortuna and Dame Matuta, and Sper, consumed much, aswell hallowed as prophane.

The same yeare, when all things prospered well & had good successe in Spain, P. and Cn. both Scipioni having recovered many associates & those of ancient league, that came in again to him and yielded themselves; and besides, gained some new confederates: conceived good hope, and tooke heart to proceed farther even into Affricke.

Syphax king of the Numidians, on a suddaine fell out with the Carthaginians, and became I their professed enemy. Vnto him the Scipioni addrest three Centurians as Embassadors, to treat with him about a league and alliance: and to promise withall, that if he went on still to trouble and molest the Carthaginians, by making warre upon them, hee should do an high favor to the Senate and people of Rome: and that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place, hee should be well requited for that kindeesse, and receiue at their hands a double recompence with thanks. This embassage pleased the barbarous king right well. And after he had conferred & reasoned with the Embassadors, concerning militarie affairs, and the knowledge of warfare: and heard those old and experienced soldiers talke of war, hee soone found his own wants, & how unskillfull himselfe was in many points & feats of armes, in comparison of that methodicall and orderly discipline, whereof they had discoursed. The first thing then, that he re- K quested at their hands, was this: that as they were good friends and faithfull allies, two of them only would go back with their embassie unto their generals, and that the third might remain with him, to read unto him a lecture in the militarie science of warfare. Saying, that the nation of the Numidians, were raw and altogether unskillfull in footmens service, & onely nimble and practised in fight on horseback. So (quoth he) from the first beginning of our nation have our ancestors used to warre: and so have we from our childhood bene enured to fight. Mary, an enemy I have, trusting and presuming much upon his Infanterie, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all kind of service. Footmen I am able to set out as well as another: for why? my realme is populous, & yeeldeth abundance of men: but altogether ignorant wee are, how to fit them with armour, how to manhandle them, how to order and set them in battaile array: inso much as all L my people in battell go to it pell mell, and are as a multitude huddled and thrumpled together at a venture, without skil, without discretion and adviement. The Embassadors answered and said, that for the present, they would do according to his will and pleasure: but withall, they had his faithfull promise and word of a Prince, that hee should immediately send backe their companion again, in case their Generals approved not their deed in that behalfe. Q. Statorius his name was, that staid behind with the king. So Syphax sent by the two Romans, his answer to the fore-said embassage, into Spaine: and besides, with them other Numidians, Embassadors of his down, to receiue farther assurance and securitie from the Romane Generals: unto whom hee gave in charge, that forthwith they should sollicite, persuade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliarie souldiours unto the Carthaginians, and served in any campe, citie, or garrison M town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statorius for his part, having mustered a great multitude of serviceable young men; chose forth and enrolled a power of footmen, to serve in the kings warres: and when hee had sorted them into bands and companies, and ordred them in battaile array, as neere as possibly hee could, to the manner of the Romanes: he trained

A trained them in their running to follow their colors: he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewise he accustomed them to travaile & do worke: & so acquainted them with other militarie orders and exercises, that within short time, the king reposed as good confidence, and was as mightie in his new Infanterie, as in his old cavallerie: and in a set pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with banner displayed, and give him the foile in a full battaile. The comming of the kings Embassadors into Spaine, was to the Romanes also a matter of great consequence and importance: for upon the rumour and fame that went thereof, the Numidians began to fall away apace, and to come thicke unto the Romanes. Thus were the Romanes joynd in amitie and friendship with king Syphax.

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance, they addrest immediately B their embassadors to Gala, who reigned in another part of Numidia, over a nation called Matsyla. This Gala had a sonne named Masanisa, of seventeen yeares of age, but a youth of such towardnesse, and so forward in vertue, that even then hee made good and apparant shew, that he would another day enlarge his dominion, and make a more flourishing and mightie kingdome, < than his father should leave it unto him. These Embassadors declared unto Gala, that for as much < as Syphax had entred league, and was banded with the Romanes, to the end that by their alliance < and societie, he might be more mightie and puissant against other kings & nations of Affricke: < it were also better for him and much more commodious, to joyne with the Carthaginians in all < convenient speed: before that either Syphax passed over into Spaine, or the Romanes into Af- < ricke: And Syphax (say they) may soone be defeated and overthrown now, while that hee hath < C gained naught yet, but the bare name of the Romane league. Gala was soone persuaded to send a power of men, especially at the earnest instance of his son, who was very desirous of that war, and to have the manning thereof. He with the helpe of the Carthaginian legions, vanquished Syphax, & gave him a great overthrow. So as at that field there were slain by report, in one day thirtie thousand. Syphax himselfe in person, with some few Numidian horsemen fled backe to the Maurisians, that inhabit the farthest coasts, hard upon the Ocean over-against Gades. But the Barbarous people at the fame of his comming so resorted in great numbers to him out of all parts, that in a short space, hee was able to arme a mightie host. And before he could with them crosse over into Spaine, which was divided from Affricke, with a narrow arme of the sea, Masinissa was come with his victorious armie: who in that place, of himselfe, without any help or aid D of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax battaile, to his great honour and singular glorie. In Spaine no memorable exploit was achieved, but that the Romane Generals allured and drew to them the able and serviceable manhood of the Celtiberians, for the same hire and stipend, that they bargained for with the Carthaginians: and sent from thence above three hundred Spaniards of the noblest parentage into Italie, to sollicite their countymen who served under Anniball as auxiliaries, to follow them and take part with the Romanes. This onely, touching the affaires of Spaine that yeare, is a thing worthie to be noted and remem-bred, That the Romans never waged soldiour to serve in their war before that time, when the Celtiberians began to be their mercenaries, and first received pay.

THE XXV. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the five and twentieth Booke.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, was made Ædile, before he was of lawfull yeares. Anniball wonn the citie Tarentum (all but the castle, into which the Roman garrison was retired) by meanes of certain young Tarentine gentlemen, who had made semblance, that they went by night a hunting. The solempne plaies in the honour of Apollo, were now first instituted, upon occasion of certaine propheticall verses of M. artius, wherein the overthrow at Cannæ had been foretold. Q. Fulvius and App. Claudius Consull, fought fortimally against Hanno, a Duke or captain of the Carthaginians. T. Sempronius Gracchus the Treasurall, was by a Lucane (his host that gave him entertenement) trined into the danger of an ambush, and slaine by Mago. Centenius Penula, who had served in the warres as a Centurion, having made suit unto the Senate, to have the leading of an armie, and promised, if this petition were granted, to win the victorie of Anniball, and to vanquish him, tooke the charge of eight thousand footmen, and gave battaile to Anniball: but hee was slaine himselfe, and his whole armie defeated and put to the sword. Cn. Fulvius the Pretour fought unfortunately against Anniball, and lost the field: in which fight there died sixteene thousand men. Himselfe, with two hundred horsemen fled and escaped. Capua was besieged by Q. Fulvius and App. Claudius the Consuls. Claudius M. artius in the third year of the siege, won Syracuse, and bare himselfe in that service like a worthie and noble knight. In that tumult and hurlyburly when the citie was newly taken, Archimedes, whilst he was busily occupied about certaine Geometrical figures and forms that he had drawne in the dust, was killed. The two Scipions, Pub. and Cornel. after many and so worthie exploits performed fortunately in Spaine, came to a wofull and beavie end, being themselves slaine there, with the losse whereof their whole armies, in the eight yeares after that they went into Spaine. And the maine possession of that province had bene quite lost, but for the singular manhood and industrie of L. M. artius a knight of Rome, who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies, so encouraged them, that by their valiant service two severall encamped holds of the enemies were wonn, seven and thirtie thousand of the enemies slaine, and eightene hundred taken prisoners, and a great rich bootie obtained. Whereupon he was called Capitaine M. artius.

Whiles these affaires thus passed in Affricke and in Spaine, Anniball employed the summer season in the territorie of Tarentum, in hope by treason to be maister of the citie of the Tarentines. In which meane while, certaine base cities of the Salentines, and townes of no importance revolted unto him. And at the same time, of those 12 States of the Brutii, which the yeare before had turned, & banded with the Carthaginians, the Consentines and Thurines were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewise, but for L. Pomponius Vientianus, captain of the allies: who after he had made certaine rodes into the countrey of the Brutii, and sped his hand well with many booties, tooke upon him the countenance of a sufficient Colonell, and was no lesse reputed: and having gathered a power of men, suddainly in hast without good adviement, fought with Hanno. In which conflict, a mightie multitude of his men were either slaine or taken prisoners. But, as good hap was, they were but a disordered unruly rable of rusticall clownes and bond-slaves: and the least losse of all other, was the capitaine himselfe, who amongst the rest was taken captive: a man as then, the authour of a rash and foole-hardie fight, and had bene a foretime a Publi-

A Publicane or farmer of the citie revenues, and alwaies (through his naughtie practises and cunning fetches and shifts wherein he was become skilfull) a disloyall person, and dangerous both to the publicke State, and also to those privat companies and societies, with whom he had commerce and dealing. Sempronius the Consull, lying in the Lucanes countrie, made many light skirmishes, but not any one worth remembrance, and woon certaine poore townes, and of small regard, belonging unto the Lucanes.

The longer that this warre continued lingering, whilst prosperous successe and advetse mishap interchangeably wrought much varietie and alteration, as well in the inward minds of men, as in their outward state & fortune; such religious zeale and superstition (& the same for the most part in forein ceremonies) had so seized & possessed the citie, that either the men or gods therof, were sodainly all at once become clean altered, and transfigured. In so much as now the Roman rites & holy observations were contemned, not only in secret and within dores at home in their privat houses, but abroad also in the open streets, yea and in the common place and Capitoll: where there stocket alwayes a sort of women, that neither offered sacrifice and oblations, nor said their prayers, and did their devotions according to the use and custome of their native countrie and citie. Certaine od priests and chaplaines, yea and dotting wiseards and blind prophets, had inveigled the minds and consciences of men: whose number was the greater by reason first of the rurall people and paissants of the countrie, who for neede and povertie, and for feare together, were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by reason of the long warres, and many invasions and rodes that laid all wast, and so retired into the citie; afterwards by the easy occupation and readie meanes of gaine which they found by the error of others, whom they soone seduced and abused: which trade they used and practised openly, as if it had bene a lawfull art and misterie. At the first, divers good and honest persons began secretly to grieve and be offended herewith, yea and to mutter and utter their griefes in private: but afterwards in proceesse of time, the matter was presented before the LL. of the counsell, and brake forth to open complaint in publick places. The Ædiles and Triumvirs capitall were blamed much, and sharply rebuked of the Senate, for not redressing these disorders: and when they went in hand, to rid the common place of this multitude, and to cast down, overturne and fling away the preparation and provison for their sacrifices and oblations, they had like to have bene misused and mischieved by the people. When this maladic and misorder seemed now to be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meaner and inferior Magistrate, M. Aemilius, Pretor of the citie for the time being, received commission by order from the Senate, to see that the people were eased and delivered from this new religion and superstition. He not only red unto them in a publicke assembly the decree of the Senate in that behalfe, but also made proclamation, Imprimis, that whosoever had any bookes of prophecies or prayers, or treatises written of this art and science of sacrifices, should bring in all those books and writings unto him before the Kalends of Aprill next ensuing. Item, that no person should sacrifice either in publick place, or sacred Church, after any new forme or forein rites and traditions. And in that yeare, there dyed certaine publick Priests, to wit, L. Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-prelate, or high Priest: and C. Papyrius Maffo, the sonne of Caius, a Bishop. Also P. Furius Philus an Augur, and C. Papyrius Maffo the sonne of Lucius, a Decemvir, deputed for holy mysteries. In place of Lentulus and of Papyrius, were M. Cornelius Cethegus, and Cn. Servilius Cepio substituted high-priest and bishop. For Augur, there was created L. Quintus Flaminius: and L. Cornelius Lentulus was chosen Decemvir over sacred ceremonies and divine service.

Now the time drew neere of the solempne election of new Consuls: but because it was not thought good to call the old away, (busied as they were in the warres) T. Sempronius one of the Consuls, nominated for Dictator, to hold that election aforesaid, C. Claudius Cento, who named for his Generall of the Cavallerie Q. Fulvius Flaccus. This Dictatour, the first comitial day following, created for Consuls Q. Fulvius Flaccus abovenamed, his Generall of horsemen, and App. Claudius Pulcher, who in his Pretourship had the jurisdiction and government of the province of Sicillie. Then were the Pretours elected, Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nero, M. Janius Syllanus, and P. Cornelius Sulla. When the Election was ended, the Dictatour resigned up his place.

That yeare was Ædile Curule, together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, whose surname afterwards was Africanus. When he stood and made suite for the Ædileship, and the Tribunes of the Commons were against him, objecting that he was not eligible: and capable of that office, for that he was not of lawfull age to be a competitor, and to put in for it: If (quoth he) all the Quirites and citizens of Rome will choofe me Ædile, I have yeares enough on my back. Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his suite, there was such running and labouring on all hands to the Tribes for their voices, that the Tribunes sodainly surceaied their purpose to hinder him. And this was the largesse and donative that the Ædiles bestowed. The Roman Games were, according to the wealth of that time, exhibited and set out with great state and magnificence, and continued one day longer than ordinary: and for every street thoroughout the citie, was allowed a * Congius of oyle. L. Villius Tappulus, and M. Fundanus Fundulus Ædiles of the Commons, accused certaine dames and wives of the citie before the people, of dishonest and incontinent life: and some of them being condemned, they forced into banishment. The Games called Plæbej, were renewed for two dayes: and by occasion of these games, a solemne feast or dinner was kept for the honor of Jupiter.

Then Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time entered the Consulship, together with Appius Claudius: and the Pretours cast lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot, to have the jurisdiction both of citizens and strangers, which before was executed by twaine. To Cn. Fulvius Flaccus fell Apulia: to C. Claudius Nero, was allotted Suessula: and M. Junius Syllanus his hap was to have the rule of the Tuscānes. The Consuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to warre with Anniball, and to have under their commaund two legions apiece: and that one of them should receive his legions of Q. Fabius, the Cof. of the former yeare: and the other take his, at the hands of Fulvius Centimalus. As for the Pretours, Fulvius Flaccus had commission for the conduct of the legions at Luceria, which served under Aemilius Pretour there: and Nero Claudius was to have the leading of those that were under the hand of C. Terentius in Picenum: and that they should provide themselves of supply to make up the full number of the companies. M. Junius had the charge of the legions of citizens mustred the yeare before to serve in Tuscāne: T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus continued still in the government of their provinces, the one of Lucania, the other of Gallia, and kept their owne forces. Likewise P. Lentulus governed the old province in Sicilie: M. Marcellus was L. Deputie of Saracose, and so far as the realme and dominion of King Hiero reached. T. Octavius Admirall of the navie. Greece was governed still by M. Valerius. Sardinia by Q. Mutius Sævolus. Spaine by P. and Cornelius Scipiones. To the old armies before, there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Coff. So as in all, the whole forces for that yeare amounted to 23 legions.

When the Consuls should muster the souldiours, they were hindered by occasion of a lewd pranke played by one M. Posthumius Pyrgensis, to the great trouble & disquiet of the state & publicke peace. This Posthumius was by his vocation and calling a publican, who many yeares together for craftie and deceitfull dealing, for avarice and covetousnesse, had not his fellow in all the citie, but it were L. Pomponius Vientianus againe; the same man, whom the yeare before, as hee forraied the territories of the Lucans rashly & unadvisedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hanno had taken prisoner. These two (for as much as it was covenanted & indented before, that the transporting of those things which were for the provision of the armies beyond sea, should be warranted by the citie against all danger of tempest; and that all damage & losse of goods that way miscarrying, should not lie upon the shoulders of the Publicanes, who had undertaken by great, to serve the armies, but be made good againe out of the common chest & treasure:) these Publicans (I say) not only gave false information of certain shipwracks, but also if they brought word at any time truly of some ships that were perished, they were such onely as were lost by their owne fraud and deceit, and not cast away by chaunce or violence of weather. For they would freight and charge certaine old vessels and shaken bothomes, with some few wares of small or no worth at all, and suffer them to sinke for the nonce in the deepe sea, and save the mariners and failers, with small pinnases and cockbotes prepared aforehand for the purpose: and when they had done, lie shamefully and say, that they had lost merchandise and commodities in those ships of sundrie sorts, and of great value. These cunning parts of theirs had bene the yeare past revealed and notified to M. Aemilius the Pretour, and the Senate by him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Senate devised for the chastisement of the offender: because the L.L. of the Counsell in no case would offend the companie and societie of these publicans and farmers, in such a time especially, when there was some need of them. Then the

A the common people tooke the matter into their owne hands, for to proceed with more severitie against these lewd and fraudulent practises. At length, two of the Trib. of the Com. Sp. and Lucius, both Carvilij, arose up and shewed themselves. For seeing how odious and infamous an indignitie this was, and not to be suffered, they brought M. Posthumius in question, and laid an action & set a fine upon his head, of two hundred thousand * Asses. When the day of trial was come, whither the fine aforesaid should stand and be paid, or taken off and remitted; and that the commons were assembled in so great number, that the great court-yard of the Capitol would scarcely hold the multitude: the defendant spake for himselfe and pleaded at large. But the onely hope that hee seemed to have was this, in case G. Servilius Casca a Trib. of the Com. a friend and neere kinsman of Posthumius, would by vertue of his place come betweene & stop the course of law for proceeding farther, before that the tribes & wards were called forth, to go together and to give their voices. The two Tribunes abovenamed, having brought forth the witnesses to depose, & their depositions being taken, commanded the people to void & make way: And the lotterie casket or fossier was brought forth to cast lots, in what tribes the Latines should give their voices. All this while the Publicanes were earnest with Casca, to dissolve the assembly by one means or other, and put off the court for that day. The common people on the other side, called on hard, and gaineaied it. And as it fell out, Casca sat formost in one of the points and corners of the assembly. Hee wist not what to do, his mind was so perplexed for shame of the one side, if he did not helpe his friend and kinsman, and for feare on the ether side, because hee saw the people so eagerly bent. The Publicanes seeing small hope of helpe in him, with full intent to make some stirre, and to trouble the court, put forward forcibly and advanced themselves through a void way, seized upon an high place, and between the Tribunes & the people, rushed in upon them; and fell to quarrell and braule both with the people of the one side, and also with the Tribunes on the other: insomuch as they were like to go together by the eares. Whereupon Fulvius the Consul; See ye not (quoth hee to the Tribunes) how basely yee are accounted of, and made of no better reckoning among them, than private persons? See ye not a riot & mutinie toward, unlesse yee make haft and breake up the assembly? So the commons were dismissed, and a Senate called: Where the Consuls made relation unto the Lords of the Counsell, & complained how the solemne Session and Court of the Commons, was by the audacious violence of the Publicanes disturbed: That Court (I say) wherein M. Furius Camillus, upon whose exile ensued the destruction of the citie, suffered himselfe to bee condemned by ungratefull citizen: wherein the Decemvirs afore him, by vertue of whose good lawes, the citie is governed, and wee live at this day: and wherein many principall citizens afterwards, have bene content to be set down and judged by the people. Moreover, how Posthumius Pyrgensis by force wrested from the commons, the libertie of their voices and suffrages: subverted and made void the judicall Session of the commons: curbed the Tribunes and had no regard of them: came as it were in warlike manner against the people of Rome: and gat for their vantage the higher ground, to keepe the Tribunes from comming unto the commons: & to stop the tribes for being called to scrutinie and to give their voices: and nothing else it was that kept men from committing a fray, and shedding bloud, but the patience of the magistrats themselves in that for the present, they gave place to the furious rage and malapart saucinesse of a few: and for his will and pleasure brake up the assembly, before they could go together about the matter they were met for: (which the defendant himselfe with force and armes was readie to stop & hinder for going forward) because they might have no occasion given them to quarrell, which was the onely thing that they sought for. When this matter with all the circumstances was thoroughly skanned of, and the best men there had spoken their minds, and given their opinion according to the outragiousnesse and indignitie of the thing: and therupon the Senate decreed, that this violence tended to the breach of common peace, and the hazard of the state (a most dangerous precedent to bee suffered) then without more ado, the two Carvilij Tribunes of the Com. laid aside cleane all debating about the penall fine aforesaid, and indicted Posthumius of a capitall crime: and commaunded him to be attached by a principall Sergeant, and to be led to prison, unlesse hee put in good sureties for his appearance to answer the cause, such as would be bound for him bodie for bodie. Posthumius put in baile: and made default at his day. Then the Tribunes called the Commons together, preferred a bil unto them, which they granted to passe as an act in this forme: That if M. Posthumius came not forth and made apparance before the * Calends of May, and being cited and called that day, answered served not to his name, and no lawfull excuse alleaged for his absence, they judged him to be a banished man, and therefore awarded his goods to be sold in portsale, and himselfe to bee excommunicate, and interdicted the use of water and of fire: and to loose the benefit of a citizen for ever. This done, they began also to endite all those, one after another, of a capitall crime, who were his abettors, and the movers and stirrers of a sedition and commotion of the people, and to call for personall pledges. At the first they committed as many of them as could find no such sureties: and afterwards, those also that were sufficient to put in baile. For the avoiding of which daunger, most of them departed into voluntarie exile. This was the end of the Publicanes fraudulent dealing: and this was the issue of their audacious enterprise, in defence and maintenance of their guile and deceit.

After this, a solemne Court was called for the creation of the Arch-prelat, and M. Cornelius Cethegus newly elected Prelat, was the President of this election. Three competitors there were, who sued for that Prelacie; & strived earnestly one against the other: namely Q. Fulvius Flaccus, Consul for the time being, who also had before bene twice Consul, & Censor besides; also T. Manius Porquatus, a man of great reputation, for that he had bin likewise dignified with a double Consulship, and one Censureship; and last of all, P. Licinius Crassus, who as yet, was to sue for the Edileship: howbeit, this young man in that sute and contention was superiour, and carried it away from those grave, ancient and honourable persons. Before him, for the space of an hundred and twentie yeares, there had not bene created any one, the highest priest, (save only P. Cornelius Calpurnius) but had fit before in the yvorie chaire and borne office of state. The Consul had much ado, to go through with the levie, & to enroll the full legion of soldiours, by reason that the small number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furnish out the new legions of citizens, and also to supply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not suffer them to give over their enterprise which they were about, but agreed that there should be chosen two Ternions of Triumvirs: the one sort of them to be sent out, within the compasse of fiftie miles every way from Rome, the other to go farther, with commission, to take good view and survey, both within that precinct and without, in all through-fares and market townes: in boroughs and places of frequent assemblies; of all persons of free condition that they could see on: and so many as they thought able men of bodie to beare armes, although they were not come to the lawfull age for service, to prest them for soldiours. Also it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the commons, if they so pleased, should put up a bill, that all under severenteene yeares of age, who had bound themselves by militarie oath, should have as good pay, as if they had bene enrolled souldiours at severenteene yeares or upward. By vertue of this decree, the two Ternions aforesaid of the Triumvirs being chosen, made diligent search, and visited all the countie over for free borne men accordingly.

At the same time letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicilie, concerning the demands of those souldiours who served under P. Lentulus, and they were read in the Senate house. That armie consisted of the residue which remained after the field lost at Cannæ, and was confined into Italie (as hath bene said afore) with this condition, not to returne back into Italie before the Punicke warre should be ended. These souldiours obtained licence of Lentulus to send as embassadors unto Marcellus (where he lay in winter harbour) the principall men of armes, such as served on horses allowed by the citie, the chiefe centurions also, and the bravest souldiours and choise floure of the legions. One of these in the name of the rest, having libertie graunted for to speake, made his oration in this wise. We had come to you into Italie, o M. Marcellus when you were Consul, immediately upon that decree made against us (which if it were not unjust and unreasonable, yet surely it was heaveie and rigorous enough:) but that we hoped to be sent into this province (so generally troubled and out of order by the death of the KK.) there to be employed in some dangerous and cruell warre against the Sicilians and Carthaginians both at once: and so with our bloudshed and grievous wounds to make satisfaction for our trespasses unto the Magistrates and rulers of Rome. Like as in our fathers dayes, they which were taken prisoners by king Pyrrhus before Heraclea, made amends for their fault by their good service against the same Pyrrhus. And yet, I can not see, [my LL. of the Senate] for what ill desert of our parts, ye either have bene displeased aforesaid, or are offended at this present with us. For me thinks, I see both Consuls, and the whole bodie of the Senate of Rome, when I behold your face, o Marcellus: whom if we had had to our Consul at Cannæ, it would have gone better both one of the Em-bassadors of the Carthaginians

to M. Marcellus.

A with the Common-weale, and with our selves, then it did. For I beseech you, suffer us now, before I make mone, and complaine of our hard state and condition, to purge our selves of that crime for which we are blamed. Set case, that neither the wrath of the gods, nor destinie and fatal necessity (upon the law and decree whereof dependeth the immutable order and infallible course and consequence of all things in the world) was the cause that we were defeated and overthrowne at Cannæ, but our owne selves, and our default was the occasion: let us see then, whose fault it was, the souldiours, or the Generals? For mine owne part, I remember I am a souldier, and of my Captaine and Generall I will never speake but well; of him especially, unto whom I know the Senate rendred thanks, for that he despaired not of the common-wealth; and whose government ever since his flight and running away, hath bene proroged from yeare to yeare, and who hath had the conduct of armies continually. Neither will I say ought of the rest likewise, who escaped that unfortunate foile and diffature, I meane our militarie tribunes and Colonels, who (as we here say) sue for dignities, beare honourable offices in citie, yea and rule whole Provinces as LL. Presidents in foreign parts. Is it so indeede my LL? do ye so easily pardon and forgive your own selves & children? and deale ye so hardly, so rigorously and cruelly, against us base abject persons, and vile wretches? And was it no shame and dishonor imputed to the Consul and other great personages of the citie to flie, when there was no other hope; and were the poore souldiers sent by you into the field with this intention, to be all killed up, & none to escape? At the battaile of Allia, the whole armie in a manner fled away: Also at the straights of Caudium (to say nothing of other shamefull foiles of our armies) the host yielded up their armour to the enemy, before they joined battell, and fought one stroke. Yet, so far off it was, that those armies sustained any infamie & shameful reproch therefore, that both the citie of Rome was recovered againe by the means of those regiments which fled from Allia to Veij: and also the Caudine legions which returned to Rome naked, were sent againe into Samnium well armed: who subdued & brought under the yoke of subjection, the very same enemies, who had taken such pride and joy in that dishonour and ignominie of theirs. And now, for the armie before Cannæ, is any man able to come forth and charge them justly, that either they fled, or for cowardly fear behaved themselves unseemely, and not like souldiours? Where were slaine in field above fiftie thousand men: from whence the Consul fled with fiftie horsemen, and no more: and of which companie there is not one remaineth alive, but whom the enemy, wearie with killing, spared and left. I remember, at what time as the prisoners taken there, were denied money to pay for their ransom, then every man commended and praised us, for saving and reserving our selves against another day, to be employed in the service of the Commonweale: for returning unto Venusia to the Consul, and for making a good shew of a complet armie. But now, in worse case are wee, than in our fathers dayes, captives have bene that were taken prisoners. For they onely had their armor and weapons changed for worse, their rancke in the battell shifted, their place in the campe where they should quarter, altered: which notwithstanding, they recovered againe all at once, by performing their good devoir to their countie, and winning a victorie in one fortunate battell. Not one of them was ever confined (as it were) to a place of exile: none put beside hope to be discharged from soldierie by serving out his full time: and to bee briefe, they were set to fight with some enemy or other, where they might once for all, either loose their life, or end their dishonour. And wee, against whom nothing can be objected at all, unlesse it be this, that wee were the cause, and none but wee, that some citizen of Rome might bee said to remaine alive of all those that were at the battell of Cannæ: we I say, are sent farre ynough off, not onely from our native countrey, and Italie, but also from all enemies: where we waxe old in exile, to the end, that we should have no hope, no occasion and opportunitie to wipe away and cancel our disgrace, to mitigate and pacifie the anger of our fellow citizens, and finally to die with honour. But it is neither end of shame, nor reward of vertue and valour, that we desire and crave: but only that we might be permitted to make proofe of our courage, and shew our prowesse. Paines and perils wee seeke for, and to be employed in dangerous adventures, like hardie men and brave souldiers. Two yeares already there hath bene sharpe and hot warre in Sicilie. Some citie the Carthaginians woon by force, other some the Romanes tooke likewise by assault. Whole regiments of foote, many troupes and cornets of horse encounter together, and assaile one another. At Saracose there are great enterprises and wortheie feats of armes, both by sea and land. The shouts of them that fight, the very clattering and ringing againe of their armour and weapons, wee can heare where we are, and we sit still like idle luskies, and doe nothing, as if we had neither hands nor weapons to fight with. T. Sempronius the Confull, with legions of bondslaves, hath bidden battell to the enemies, and fought with them in plaine field so oft, that they are well recompensed for their labour with gaining their freedome first, and then the Burgeoisie of the citie. Let us yet, in place & qualitye at leastwise, of bondslaves taken up and bought for money against these warres, fight with those enemies, as well as they have done, and by our fight trie, whether we can regain our enlargement and libertie. Will you your selfe, O Marcellus, make triall of us, and of our valour, by sea, by land, in pitched field, and battell ranged, or in giving assault and winning of walled townes? Put us to it, and spare not. The hardest adventures, the most painful and dangerous enterprises, are they which we require most gladly: that we may have that betimes, and at once, which we should have come unto at Cannæ: seeing that all the time we have lived since, hath been destined to our ignominie and disgrace.

At these words they fell downe prostrate at Marcellus his feet. Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himselfe, nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfie their request. Howbeit, write to the Senate he would: and according as the LL. should give advise and direction, so he would do and not faile. These letters (as I said before) were brought to the Consuls, and by them red in the Senate house. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senate passed this decree: That as concerning those souldiours, who had forsaken their fellows fighting before Cannæ, the Senate saw no reason, why they should be put in trust any more with the affaires of the Common-wealth: but if M. Claudius the Proconsul thought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient, and to stand with his owne credit, and the safetie of the State. Provided alwayes, that not one of them be dispensed with, and freed from service or charge of souldierie: nor rewarded with any militarie gift in testimonie and token of his valour: ne yet reduced home againe into Italie, so long as the enemye made abode there.

After this, the Pretour for the citie, by vertue of a decree from the Senate, and an act of the Commons, assembled the people together. In which Session were created five Commissioners called Quinqueviri, for the reedifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewise two other fraternities of Triumvirs, the one for taking an inventarie of all sacred things, and to signe and note all offerings and oblations: the other for reedifying the temples of Fortune and dame Matuta, within the gate Carmentalis, and likewise of Spes without the gate, which the yeare past were consumed by fire. Great and fearefull tempests hapned this yeare. On the Albane mount it rained stones continually for two dayes. Many places were blasted and smitten with lightning from heaven, and namely two chappels in the Capitoll, and the rampier about the camp and fort above Suessula in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels stricken sturke dead. The wall and certaine turrets thereon at Cumes, not only smitten, but also shaken downe and overthrowne with lightnings and thunderbolts. At Reate there was scene an huge stone to flie to and fro in the aire. The sunne also appeared more red than it useth to be, and like to blood. In regard of these prodigious sights, there was a solemne Procession and supplication all one day: and the Consuls for certaine dayes together, attended onely upon divine service of the gods: and the Novendiall sacrifices were devoutly celebrated nine dayes together.

Now whereas a long time alreadie both Anniball hoped, and the Romanes also suspected that the Tarentines would revolt: there fell out betwene, an occurrence and outward accident, which hastned it the rather. There was one Phileas a Tarentine, who having abode long at Rome under colour of an embassador leger, a busie headed man, and of an unquiet spirit, one that of all things could not away with rest and peace, in which so long as he lived he thought every day a yeare, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein, found meanes to haue access unto the hostages of the Tarentines. Kept they were in the Close belonging to the temple of Liberty, with the lesse attendance and carefull eye, because it was expedient and good neither for themselves, nor for their citie, to make an escape, & deceive the Romanes. These hostages he had oftentimes solicited and perswaded by much talke and many reasons, and at length having bribed and corrupted two sextaines and wardens of the said temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in safe custodie: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, and directed them how to passe secretly, he fled himselfe and they together. By day breake the next morning they were missed, and their escape was noyed throughout the citie:

A citie. Whereupon, men were sent out after them from all parts, to fetch them in againe: who having overtaken them at Tarracina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: where in the Comitium, they were, by the consent of the people, beate with rods, and then throwne downe headlong from the cliffe Tarpeia.

The cruell rigor of this punishment, caused much anger, and provoked two of the noblest and most famous Grecian cities in Italie to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also in private particularly: according as any man was either in blood joyned, or in alliance and friendship linked to them who were thus foully and shamefully put to death. Amongst whom there were about thirteene noble gentlemen of Tarentum, conspired together, and the chiefe of them were Nico and Philomenes. These conspiratours before they would stirre and enter into any action, thought best to speake and confer with Anniball first: and so having gone forth of the citie, under a pretence as if they went to the chase a hunting, by night they came unto him. But when they drew neere unto the camp, the rest hid themselves within a wood neere unto the high way: Nico and Philomenes only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves) were brought before Anniball. Who when they had delivered unto him their complor, and upon what occasions they entred into that designement, they were highly commended, and promised great rewards, and willed and charged by him, that to the intent they might beare their countrymen in hand, how they ever went out of the citie to fetch in some booties, they should drive afore them into the citie, certaine cattails of the Carthaginians, which were put out to pasture and feeding: and herewith gave them his word to do it safely, and without any impeachment & resistance whensoever. Thus these yong gentlemen were scene to bring in good store of cattails: and as they were knowne to make this adventure the second time and oftner still, men marvelled the lesse at the matter, & suspected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Anniball, they covenanted with him upon his faithfull promise in these termes, Imprimis, for the Tarentines themselves, to enjoy freely their lands and goods, and live under their owne lawes. Item, to pay no pension nor tribute unto Anniball, nor be forced to receive a garison against their wils. And last of all, to betray the garison souldiours of the Romanes, and all their fortresses and places of strength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When these conditions and capitulations were agreed upon, then Philomenes used much oiter to go forth and come in againe in the night: and as he was knowne to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exercise, he had his hounds following him hard at his heeles, and all other furniture about him fit for huntsmen: and lightly ever he tooke some wild beast or other with his hounds, or els got something from the enemye, that of purpose lay readie for his hands: and alwayes as he brought home ought with him, he would bestow it either upon the captaine of the Romane garison, or deale it among the warders of the gates. And they all verily beleaved and were persuaded, that his going out and in thus, most by night, was only for feare of the enemies. Now, when he had used this so accustomedly, that he had made it an ordinary practise, in so much, that at what time of the night so ever he had but once lured or whistled, the gate was straight set open for him: then Anniball thought it time, to put the plot abovesaid in execution. Three dayes journey he was off. Where because he would have men the lesse mervaile, why he kept a standing camp so long stil in one place, he feigned and made himselfe sick. The Romanes also, that lay in garison at Tarentum, gave over to suspect his long abode and leaguering there. But after that he was determined and resolved to advance toward Tarentum, he picked out ten thousand foote and horsemen together, whom he supposed for nimble bodied, swift footmanship, and lightnesse of armour, to be most meete for expedition: and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his ensignes. And having sent our afore-hand fourescore Numidian light horses, he commaunded them, to ride about and scoure all the waies on every side, and to cast their eye to espye and discover all the coasts, that no countrey people a far off might descrie and view the armie on foote, but they should be scene: and withall, to bring in, as many as were gone before, and kill all them they met & encountered: to the end that the passants there inhabiting, might thinke they were theeves and robbers, rather than the vancurriers and foreriders of an armie. Himselfe in person marching with great speed and celeritie, pitched his camp almost 15 miles from Tarentum. Neither would he there be knowne unto his men of his purpose, nor tell them whither they should go: onely he called his souldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not suffer anyone to turne aside, nor in the march go out of his ranke or file: & above all things, to be readie for to receive their charge and commaundment from their captaines, and do nothing without their warrant and commission. As for himselfe, hee would when he saw his time, let them know his mind, & what the service was that he would have done. And about the same very houre and instant, newes came as farre as Tarentum, that some few Numidian horsemen forraied the countrey, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At which tidings, the captaine of the Romane garrison was no more moved, nor made any other hast, but only gave order, that some of the horsemen the next morning by day light should ride forth, to keepe the enemy from farther excursions. In the meane time, they that had this charge, bare themselves so carelessly in providing themselves to execute that which they were commaunded, that contrariwise, they tooke those outrodes of the Numidians for a good argument, That Anniball with his armie was not dislodged, but abode still in leaguer where hee lay first. Anniball when it was once darke and dead night, began to set forward. Philomenes was there readie to be his guide, loden with his game hunted as his manner was. The rest of his conspiracie waited their time to execute their several charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordred betwene them afore, that Philomenes comming in at the usuall little wicket, with his venison that he had hunted, should bring in with him some armed men: and Anniball on another part, come to the gate called Temenis, which looked toward the East, and stood on the land side of the citie, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nooke. When Anniball approached the said gate, hee made a fire, in token that hee was come (as it was devised betwene them before) and it flamed forth and gave a shining light. The like did Nico againe. Then the fires on both sides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Anniball in great and still silence, led his armie close to the gate. Nico came suddainely at unawares upon the watchmen fast asleepe, killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Anniball entred with his regiment of footmen, and commanded the cavallerie to stay behind, to the end they might have libertie of open ground to ride, whithersoever there was need, and as occasion required. Now by this time, Philomenes also was come neere to that little gate on the other side, where he used to make his egress and ingresse to and fro. And when he had raised the watchman with his voice so well knowne, and with his whistle wherewith now he was familiarly acquainted, and said withall, that hee was troubled with tugging and lugging of a foule & heave beast: therewith the wicket was set open. Two lustie fellows there were carrying in the wild bore between them, and he himselfe followed with one of the huntsmen, lightly & nimble appointed, & whiles the watchman his eye was upon the two porters that carried the beast, wondering at the bignesse of the bore, and tooke no heed to himselfe, Nicomenes thrust him through with his bore-speare. Then there entred in after them, about thirtie men armed, who killed the rest of the watch, and brake downe the great gates withall: and immediatly there entred the companies with banner displayed: and so, forth from thence they were conducted and brought to the market place, without making any noise, and there joyned themselves to Anniball. Then Anniball divided two thousand Gauls into three regiments, whom hee sent into sundrie parts of the citie: and gave order to the Tarentines and the Affricanes, to get possession of the most principall & populous places of the citie; and when the crie and shout was once up, to kill all the Romanes wheresoever, and to spare the townsmen. But to the end that this might be orderly done, hee gave direction to the young Gentlemen aforesaid of Tarentum, that so soone as they espied a farre off, any of their owne citizens and countriemen, they should bid them be quiet and still, to hold their peace, to be of good cheere and feare nothing. By which time, they began to set up a shout and crie, as men use to do in a citie taken by assault: but what the matter should be, no man of the towne or garrison could certainly tell. For the Tarentine inhabitants supposed verily, that the Romane souldiours of the garrison were risen up to sacke the citie: the Romanes on the other side, thought that the townsmen mutined, and they were in doubt of some traiterous practise. The Captaine himselfe awakened and raised at the first tumult, escaped to the key, where he tooke a small barge or whirrie-bote, & fled to the castle. The trumpet also that sounded from the Theatre, made the greater terror: for it was both a Roman trumpet, provided aforehand for the purpose by those traitors, and a Grecian blew it, one who had no skill; & so it was doubtful, both who he was that sounded, and who they were that he gave signall unto. When day appeared, and the Romanes saw the armour of the Carthaginians and Gauls, then they wist well in what doore the wind was, and how the world went: and the Greekes seeing the Romanes lying along every where slaine, were soon ware

Aware that the citie was taken by Anniball. But after it was broad day light, and that the Romanes who remained unkilld, were fled into the castle, and the noise and hurlyburly began by little and little to slake and give over: then Anniball commaunded the Tarentines to be called to a generall assembly, and to present themselves without armes. When they were all come together, but onely those who with the Romanes were fled for companie into the castle, there to abide such fortune as they; Anniball spake kindly unto the Tarentines, gave them good & friendly words, rehearsed with great protestation what favors he had shewed to all their citizens, whom hee had taken prisoners either at Thrasymenus, or at Cannae: and withall, after he had bitterly inveighed against the lordly and proud rule of the Romans, he commaunded every man to repaire home to his own house, and set his own name upon his doore: for that, so many houses as had not the name written upon them of the master thereof, he would presently upon sound of trumpet, commaund to be rifled. Over & besides, that if any one should happen to write his own name, and set it on the doore or lodging-house of a Romane (for he saw divers of their houses empty) he would take him for an enemy, and deale with him accordingly. After this speech ended, and the assembly dissolved, when the doores were marked with their titles and inscriptions aforesaid, wherby the houses of friends & enemies were known distinctly one from another: the signall was given by sound of trumpet: & then there was running every where from all parts, to ransake the lodgings of the Romans. And some pretie sprinkling of pillage they met withall. The next day after, he advanced against the castle to assault it, which after he saw imprenable & not possible to be won, either by forcible assault, or by artificiall devises of fabricks & engines, by reason that both the sea came to it, wherewith the greater part thereof was compassed, in maner of a demie Iland, and also fortified besides on another part with exceeding high and steepe rockes: and withall, fenced from the citie with a strong wall and deepe ditch: therefore, because hee would neither let nor hinder himselfe from atchieving greater affaires, whiles he was carefully busied onely about defending the Tarentines, nor yet leave them without a strong guard, for feare least the Romanes from out of the castle, might at their pleasure come upon them, hee determined to raise a rampier for a partition betwene the castle and the citie, for their defence against the said garrison. And he was not out of hope, but that when the Romans should offer to issue forth to hinder the said worke, they might also be fought withall: and in case they adventured rashly to run on, and engage themselves too far, they might be cut off in their heate, & the forces of the garrison might be so diminished and abated by some great slaughter & execution, that the Tarentines of themselves should be able with ease to defend their citie against them. The said worke was not so soone begun, but the Romanes all of a suddaine, set open the castle gate, sallied forth and charged upon the pioners as they were labouring about their bulwarke. The guard that attended for the defence of the workemen, and stood before their worke, fell off and suffered themselves to be put backe, to the end that the enemies upon their first successe, should be more adventurous: supposing that the further they gave ground, the more of the other would follow after and chase them. Which being perceived, the Carthaginians whom Anniball had kept close for this purpose, and had in readinesse very well appointed, rose out of all parts, and made head againe. Neither were the Romanes able to abide their forcible violence. And sic they could not in multitudes, by occasion that the straightnesse of the place would give no leave: and besides, many things lay in their way: partly the work that was begun, & partly other provision of stufte brought for the same, which mightily hindred and impeached them. Most of them fell headlong into the trench: and to be short, more perished in their flight, than were killed in the fight. After this, the fortification went in hand againe, and none durst venture to hinder it. So he cast a mightie deep ditch, and rayed an high rampier within it. Also behind it, a pretie distance off, he went in hand to build a mure or wall to it, in the very same quarter; that they might be able even without any guard at all, or strength of men, to defend themselves against the Romanes. Howbeit, he left them an indifferent band of souldiours, which might withall help out somewhat in making of the wall. Himselfe then departed with the rest of his armie as farre as the river Galeus (five miles off from the citie) and there encamped. From which standing camp, he came back once againe to survey the worke: and finding that it went better forward than he looked for, he began to conceive some good hope that the citadell also might be won by assault. For why, it was not defended surely by situation on high ground, as others are, but seated on a plaine, and divided from the citie, by a wall only and a ditch. Now when as it began to be assailed with fabricks, and ar-tillerie devised of all sorts, there hapned a new supply to be sent from Metapontum to aid the garrison: whereby the Romanes tooke hart unto them, in so much as in the night time of a sodain, and before they were looked for, they set upon the fabricks and ordinance of the enemies planted thereupon: some they cast downe and overthrew, others they fired and consumed. And there an end of Anniball his assault of the castle from that side.

The onely hope behind now, was in continuall siege: and yet that hope promised no great effect, because they that held the castle, had the sea free at their command, all that side, whereas the said fort (standing as it were in an halfe Island) overlooketh the mouth of the haven: and the citie contrariwise, was wholly secluded from all entercourse of passage & commodities comming in by sea, and liker were they that besieged the fortresse, to feele the want and scarcitie of victuals, than those that were besieged within it. Then Anniball, after he had called together the principall citizens of Tarentum, laid open unto them all, the present difficulties, saying, That he neither saw any way to win by force the castle so strong and fortified as it was, nor had any hope at all to gaine it by siege, so long as the enemies were lords of the sea. But if they had ships once, whereby they might hinder and stay the comming in of their victuals and other commodities, the enemies immediately would either quit the peece, or yeeld themselves. The Tarentines held well with that, and approved the devise. But (say they) he that giveth us that counsell, must also affoord us meanes to effect the same. For the Carthaginian ships, if they were sent for, and set out of Sicilie, might well doe the feat: mary, as for our own which lie shut up as it were, within a litle creek and bay, considering, that the enemy keepeth the mouth and entrie of the haven, how is it possible that they should get out from their harbour into the open sea, and passe without daunger? Passe (quoth he?) Passe they shall, make no doubt of that. Many things, I tell you, considered in their owne nature are combersome and difficult, but by pollicie and wit of man are easily welded and wrought with a sleight. Yee have a cittie here seated upon a plaine and champaine ground, the waies answering to every side of it, are even, large, and broad ynough, yea, and open to all quarters. I will chuse that way which crosseth the midst of the cittie, and passeth along to the haven and the sea, and so will carrie and transport the ships upon waines, with no great adoe and trouble. And so, both the sea shall bee ours cleare, which now the enemies keepe, and also wee shall besiege the castle round, as well by sea as by land: nay, more than that, within short time wee shall either enter it, being abandoned of the enemies, or else bee maisters both of it and them together.

These words not onely put them in good hope, that the enterprife would be effected, but also set them in a wonderfull good conceit & admiration of the captain himselfe. Then out of hand, all the waines and carts were taken up from all places as many as could bee had, and were put together, and coupled one to another. Divers cranes and other instruments were set to, for to draw up the ships to land, the way made plaine and levell, that the carts might go more easily, & passe away with lesse trouble & more expedition. After this they got together draught oxen, cartjades and other labouring beasts, yea, and men also for to draw: and thus the worke was lustily begun, in so much, as within few daies, the fleet well rigged, appointed, and dressed, was brought about the castle, and rid at anker even in the avenue and entrie of the haven. In these tearmes stood Tarentum, when Anniball left it, and returned backe to his wintering harbours. But authours write diversly of this revolt of Tarentum, whither it happened the yeare past, or at this present. But the greater number of them, and those that lived neerer to that time, when the remembrance of these matters was fresh, affirme that it was this very yeare.

At Rome, the Consuls and Pretours both remained still, untill the *fifth day before the Calends of May, by occasion of the Latine holydaies, upon which day, when they had performed a solemne sacrifice, with all complements thereto belonging, on the Albane hill, they departed every one to his severall charge and province. After this, there crept into the minds of men a new scrupulositie of conscience upon certaine propheticall verses of one Martius, a noble & famous prophet in times past. Now, by reason that in the yeare before, there was diligent search and inquisition made, for such bookes of Fortune, according to a decree graunted out of the Senate, those verses came to light, and to the hands of M. Aemilius Pretour of the cittie, who sat upon that commission. And he immediately gave them to Sulla the new Pretour. Of two prophetes of Martius, the one, which afterwards caried the greater authoritie with it, by reason of the event that happened so right, and declared it so evidently, caused the other also, whereof the time was not

A not yet come, to be of credite and beleevd. The former contained a Prediction of the overthrow at Cannæ, in these or such like words:

*From Trojane line, O Romane once descended, Flie Cannæ river, neere to Cannæ towne: Least strangers borne, who have thy death intended,
Force thee to fight on Diomedes his downe.
But warning mine, thou wilt not rest upon, Yntill with blood thou first doe fill the plaine;
And then to sea from fruitfull land, anon Thy men shall downe the streame by thousands slaine.
Thy flesh must bait the fish in Ocean deepe,
And lure the fowles that flie from high to pray,
And feed wild beasts, on earth below that keepe.
Marke well my words, love thus me taught to say.*

And they who had been souldiors, and served in those warres, knew as perfectly Diomedes his plaines, and the river *Cannæ, as they did the very defeiture it selfe, and losse at Cannæ. Then was the other prophesie likewise read, which was the darker of the twaine: not onely because future things are more uncertaine, than those which are past already; but also by reason of the kind of writing, which was more obscure and intricate, in these tearmes:

*If enemies yee would expell, if botch and plague fore Sent from a farre, ye would drive forth, and vexed be no more.
To Phæbus (Romane) I advise, ye vow from yeare to yeare To set forth plaies in solemne wise, with mirth and merrie cheare.
From publicke stocke, the people must part of the charge disburse:
The rest shall ye, for you and yours, defray with private purse.
The soveraine Pretour must procure these games to be perform'd, Who sits in place, mens pleas to heare, and see all wrongs reform'd.
Then shall the ten Decemvirs hight, the Greekish rites observe,
In slaying beasts for sacrifice, and nothing from them swerve.
If all be done accordingly, your ioy shall aye increase,
Your State shall daily grow in wealth, and fruits of blessed peace.
For god Apollo will you save, he will your foes destroy.
Who at their pleasure wast your fields, and worke you much annoy.*

For the explanation and expiation both, of this prophesie, they tooke one whole day. And the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should peruse and looke into the bookes of Sibylla, about the exhibiting of those said games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewise of the sacrifices. And when all was perused, and relation made before the Senate: the Lords made an Act, and set downe an order, First, to vow and set forth solemne pastimes accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished, to allow the Pretour twelve thousand Askes, toward the expenses of the divine service, and two greater beasts for sacrifice. There passed also another Act of the Senate, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service, and sacrifice after the observance and rites of the Grecians; and offer upon the altar these beasts, to wit, an Oxe with guilded hornes, and two white female goats, with guilded hornes likewise, for Don Apollo: and a cow with hornes, in like manner guilded, for Dame Latona. The Pretour, when hee was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commaundement, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnities, should contribute money, for an offering to Apollo, every man according to his abilitie, and as he might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinare Games & plaies, exhibited for to obtaine victorie, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people stood to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrones of the citie went in procession, & made supplications. Every mans dore was set open, and they feasted and made good cheare generally through the citie in the open street; and a high holliday this was, solemnized with all kind of ceremonies that could be devised.

But to returne againe to Anniball, who was about Tarentum; and both Consuls remaining in Samnium, but readie, as it seemed, to besiege Capua: it fell out, that the Campanes already were distressed with hunger and famine, (a calamitie that usually followeth long and continuall siege), and the reason was, because the armies of the Romanes had impeached and hindred their feednesse. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Anniball, beseeching him, that he would take order for graine to be brought into Capua, from all parts neere adjoining, before that the Consuls were come abroad with their legions into their territorie, and all the waies beset, and passages stopped by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Anniball gave direction to Hanno, that he should remove out of the countie of the Brutii, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour so, that the Campanes might bee provided of sufficient store of corne. Then Hanno dislodged anone, and departed with all his power out of the *Brutians countie, purposing to avoid the leaguer of his enemies, and namely the Consuls, who lay in Samnium: and when he approached neere to *Beneventum, hee pitched his tents three miles from the citie it selfe, upon a high ground. After which, he commaunded, that the corne should be brought to him into his campe, out of all the associate and confederate cities thereabout, into which it had been caried in the summer afore; & allowed a good guard for the safe convoy thereof. After this, he sent a messenger to Capua, to give them notice, upon what day they should attend, and be in readinesse to receive their corne; and against the time, provide out of the countie for the carriage, carts, waines, and draught-beasts, and packehorses of all sorts. But the Campanes, like as they caried themselves in all things else, idlie and negligently, so in this they were very slacke and retchlesse: for they sent little above fortie carres, and some few beasts for carriage besides. For which they had a checke given them, and were rebuked by Hanno; because that hunger, which causeth the very dumbe beast to bestire it selfe and make hard shifts, was not able to pricke them forward to be more carefull about their owne businesse. So there was a farther day appointed for to fetch their corne, and to come more furnished and better provided for carriage. All this being reported to the men of Beneventum, with the circumstances and particulars, as it was, they addressed with all speed ten Embassadors to the Romane Consuls, encamped then about Bovianum. Upon which intelligence given of the affaires at Capua, they tooke order, and agreed betweene themselves, that one of them should conduct an armie into Campania. And Fulvius, who undertooke that charge, marched by night to Beneventum, and put himselfe within the walls of the towne. And there he was advertised by them that dwelt neer hand, that Hanno was gone out with part of his forces, for to purvey corne; that there were 2000 carts come, with a rude and disorderly multitude besides of people, without armor; that all that they did was in hurie, in hast, and great feare; and finally, that the camp was out of forme and fashion, and all good militarie order cleane gone, by reason of a rable and multitude of countie clownes, come out of those quarters, and entermingled amongst them. The Consull, I say, being enformed for certain by credible persons, of these things, gave his souldiours warning to make readie against the next night ensuing, nothing but their ensignes & weapons, for that they were to charge upon the campe of the Carthaginians. And so they set forward at the releefe of the fourth watch, leaving their packes and trusses with all their bag and baggage behind them at Beneventum: and presenting themselves before the campe, somewhat before day, they put them into such a bodily feare, and so terrified them, that if it had beene pitched upon a plaine ground, no doubt, it had been woon at the first assault. But the height of the place, and their rampiers and fortifications besides, which could not possible bee entered upon, without climbing upon the steepe hill with much difficultie, were a defence unto it. By day light there was a lustie assault given, and a hot skirmish begun, but the Carthaginians not onely defended and kept their rampier, but also (as having the vantage of the ground) they chased and thrust the enemies backe, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeit, resolute hardinesse overcame all hardnesse and difficulties whatsoever. For in diverse places at once they advanced as farr as the banckes and trenches; but it cost bloudie blowes first, and the death of many a souldiour. The Consull therefore calling

A calling the Coronels and Marshals together, said, it were not amisse to give over that rash and headie attempt, and, as he thought, it were the safer course, for that day to retire the armie to Beneventum, and on the morrow to encampe themselves afront the enemy; to the end, that neither the Campanes might get forth, nor Hanno returne and enter into the towne againe. And that this might bee the sooner effected, and with a great deale more ease, hee would send for his Colleague also with his armie, and both of them jointly bend their forces that way. But these devises of the capitaine generall were soone dashed. For as he was about to found the retreat, the souldiers with a loud voyce cried out, that they could not away with such faint capitaines; they scorned to be commaunded in so cold and slothfull service; they would none of that: and so put the Consull out of his henn. It hapned, that next unto the gate entering into the enemies campe, there served a cohort or companie of the Peligni, led by Capitaine Vibius, who caught the banner out of the bearer his hand, and flung it over the rampier, and with that, fell to cursing himselfe and his companie both, wishing a plague light upon him and them to, if the enemies went away with that banner: and therewith led himselfe the way, and brake first through the trench, and over the pallisado into their campe. Now by this time the Peligni fought within the rampier: and then Valerius Flaccus a Coronell of the third legion, from another side fell to upbraid the Romanes, and hit him in the teeth with their beastly cowardise, for suffering their allies to have the honor of entering & taking the camp. Whereupon T. Pedanius (a centurion of the regiment called Principes, and serving in the first place thereof) took likewise an ensigne from him that caried it, and withall, Now shall, quoth he, this ensigne, and this Centinere (meaning himselfe) presently be within the rampier of the enemies: let me see who dare follow, and save it from being taken by the enemy. At first, his owne band and companie followed him hard at heeles, as he clambred to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewise. By this time, the Consull also seeing his souldiers climbing over the rampier, changed his purpose, & was of a cleane other mind: and from calling & reclaiming his souldiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, shewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardie and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole legion of citizens besides. They all therefore set to, and every man did his best: and notwithstanding there was many a dart driven and javelin launced, notwithstanding the enemies opposed their armour and bodies full against them, yet they never stinted to assay every place, as well high as low, untill they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be sure) but yet even they that bled untill they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, caried this mind and strove withall, to dye yet within the rampier of their enemies. Thus in the turning of an hand the campe was woon, as easily as if it had been pitched upon a plaine and even ground, and not fortified at all with trench & rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that medly and confusion of pell mell within the camp. Slaine there were of enemies more than sixe thousand, and above seven thousand taken prisoners, together with the Campanian purveyors for corne, and all the provision of waines, carts, and labouring beasts. Besides, another huge bootie was taken, which Hanno when he went a foraging all abroad, had raised out of the countie of the associates of the people of Rome. Then the Consull after he had cast downe all the fortifications of the campe, returned from thence to Beneventum. And there both the Consuls together (for Ap. Claudius also thither came after a few dayes) made sale of all the prises and pillage, and divided the same. Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedanius a principall centurion of the third legion, by whose forward and singular good service, the campe of the enemies was forced, were rewarded especially above the rest. Hanno then together with some few forragers whom by chance he had with him, returned from Cominium Ceritum (whether the newes came of the losse of the camp) into the Brutians countie, more like one that fled in rout, then marched in warlike order.

The Campanes also having heard, as well of their owne losses as of their allies, sent embassadors unto Anniball, to certifie him, That both the Consuls were at Beneventum, that the warre was within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a step from the very gates and walls of the citie: and unlesse he made good hast to succour and reskew them, Capua would sooner come under the obedience and subjection of the enemies, than Arpi did. And he was not to make such a reckning of all Tarentum (much lesse then of the castle alone) as in regard thereof to leave Capua undefended, and yeeld it to the people of Rome, Capua I say, which he was wont to compare and make equall with the citie of Rome. Anniball promised that he would take care for the good estate of the Campanes: and for the present he sent two thousand horsemen with the embassadors, as a guard to keepe the country and territorie from invasion and spoile.

The Romanes in this meane time, among other their affaires, neglected not the safetie of the castle of Tarentum, and the garison there besieged. For C. Servilius, Lieutenant, by order and authoritie of the Senate, was sent by P. Cornelius the Pretour into Hetruria, to purvey for come, and to buy store: who with certaine ships laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum, passing even through the guards of the enemies. At whose comming, they that before whiles they had but small hope, were oftentimes by way of parlie moved by the enemies to go to the contrary side, now themselves began to perswade and sollicite the enemies to come unto them. And the garison surely was strong enough, considering that the souldiours which lay at Metapontum, were drawne from thence to the defence and keeping of the castle of Tarentum. And therefore the Metapontines, so soone as they were delivered of the feare whereby they were kept and held in as with a bit, revolted unto Anniball. Semblably did the Thurines also, who inhabited the same tract by the sea side. They were moved and perswaded thereto, not so much by the rebellion of the Tarentines and Metapontines, with whom they were linked in kindred, and ioyned neere in bloud (over and besides that they were descended as well as they, out of Achaia) as with anger toward the Romanes for the hostages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore and kinsfolke dispatched letters and messengers unto Hanno and Mago (who were in the countrie of the Brutijneere at hand) offering to deliver the citie into their hands, if they brought their power and presented it before their walls. Now was there one M. Atinius, captaine there over a small garison, whom they supposed might bee easily drawne forth of the towne to make some rash and inconsiderate skirmish, presuming not so much upon his owne souldiours (who were but an handfull) as upon the youth and floure of the Thurians, whom he had of purpose enrolled into bands and companies, and furnished with armour against the like occasions of service. The Carthaginian captains afore named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entred into the territorie of Thuri: and Hanno with his regiment of footmen, advanced with banners displayed before the citie: Mago with the horsemen, staid behind close among the hills, over-against the towne, and there lay secretly in ambush. Atinius then, who by his espials was enforced only of the the squadrons of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wot) both of the falsehood and treason of the townsmen, and also of the covert traines and ambushment of the enemies. The skirmish of footmen was exceeding faint & cold, whiles the Romanes being but few, fought in the vanguard: and the Thurines looked rather when the skirmish should end, than made any hast to fight themselves and helpe: and withall, the squadrons of the Carthaginians gave ground for the nonce, to traine the enemye as farre as the side of the hill, under which, on the other side their horsemen lay in wait and were ambushed. And thither they were not so soone come, but the horsemen made hast to shew themselves, with a great outcrie, and presently put to flight the raw and disordered companie and multitude of the Thurines; who were not very fast and sound in heart to them on whose side they fought. The Romanes, albeit they were environned round, whiles the footmen lay still at them on the one side, and the horsemen charged them a fresh on the other side, yet they maintained fight, and held out a long while: but at last, they likewise turned their backe and fled to the citie. There the traitours and conspiratours being gathered together on heapes, so soone as they had let in at the gates standing wide open, the companies of their owne cittizens: when they saw once the Romanes running apace in disaray toward the citie, made a false alarme, crying aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends together intermingled, would enter the citie, unless they made better hast to shut the gates. So they excluded the Romanes out, and gave them as a prey to be hewne in peeces by their enemies. Howbeit, Atinius with some few, was received within the towne first. After this, there was some mutinie and dissention betweene the cittizens themselves, for a little while. Some were of mind to stand upon their guard, and defend the towne: others were of opinion, to yeeld unto fortune of the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in conclusion, fortune & bad counsell together, (as for the most part it falleth out) prevailed. And so, after they had brought Atinius and his souldiours to the haven side, unto their ships for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mild & just government, and therefore were readie to save him, than for any regard at all they had of the Romanes, they received the Carthaginians into the citie.

The

- A The Consuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territorie of Capua, not only to make spoile and mare the corne, that was laid up already in strong townes against winter, but also to assaile Capua: supposing they should make their Consulship renowned unto posteritie, by the destruction of so rich and wealthie a citie: and besides, do away that great dishonour and shamefull blemish of the Empire of Rome, in suffering a citie so neere unto them to continue now three yeres in rebellion, without revenge and condign punishment. But to the end that Beneventum should not be without a guard, and that against all suddaine accidents and occurrences of warre, in case Anniball should come to Capua, for to reskue and aid his allies, (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be horsemen to withstand his violence: they commaunded T. Cracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavallerie and light armed footmen: and to take order and leave some other to governe the legions and the standing campe, for the guard and defence of those parts there.

Cracchus before hee dislodged out of the Lucanes countrie, hapned to have a fearefull and prodigious token, as he offered sacrifice. For after the sacrifice was performed and accomplished, two snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the entrails of the beast, and fell to eat the liver: and so soon as they were espied, suddainly glid out of sight and were no more seene. Now, when as the bowel-priers had given advise to kill a new sacrifice, and so soone as the inwards were opened and laid forth, to tend and looke unto them more heedfully; the snakes came againe, as it is reported, the second & third time: and when they had once given as it were an assay, and tasted the liver, they went cleere away without hurt and untouched. And albeit the Soothsayers aforesaid, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious sight pertained properly unto the chiefe captaine and Generall, and warned him to take heed of some close persons & secret practises: yet his fatal destinie of death that hung over his head, could by no forecast and providence be altered and avoided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principall head of that bend and side of the Lucanes, which when the other faction revolted unto Anniball, tooke the Romanes part; and having bene by them chosen the Pretour, had continued in that place of magistracie a yere already: this man all on a suddaine chaunged his mind and affection, and seeking to wind and enter into the favour of Anniball, could not be content to revolt himselfe, and to draw with him the Lucanes to rebellion; unless he made a league also and covenant with the enemies, and sealed it with the murder and bloud of his Generall: of him (I say) who being entereined and lodged in his house, he purposed villanously to betray. He entred therefore into secret speech and conference with Mago, governour over the Brutij, & having capitulated with him, under his faithfull word and promise, That if he delivered the Romanes Generall into his hands, the Lucanes might live in freedome under their owne lawes, in league & amitie with the Carthaginians; he told him of a place into which hee would bring Cracchus, with a small companie and guard about him: willing Mago to put his foot and horse in armes, and in such a place aforehand, wherein he might bestow closely and secretly a mightie number of men. When the place was well viewed and considered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practise. This done, Flavius commeth to the Romanes Generall Cracchus, and enformeth him that he had begun an enterprise of great consequence, for the accomplishment and full perfecting whereof, he needed the helping hand of Cracchus himselfe. Namely, he had perswaded with all the Pretours and Governours, who in that universall and generall trouble of all Italie, had revolted unto Anniball, for to returne againe into the league and friendship of the Romanes; seeing that the Romanes state and their dominion, which by the overthrow at Cannæ was come in a manner to the lowest ebb, and fallen into extreame despaire, flowed now againe, and grew every day more than other, greater and mightier; whereas contrariwise, the puissance of Anniball decayed much, and was wellneere come to nothing: besides, the Romanes were men that might be appeased and reconciled againe, especially the trespasses being so long ago done and past: for never was there nation vnder the sunne, more tractable, more exorable and readie to pardon a fault: and how often have they (to go no further for examples) forgiven the open rebellion even of their forefathers and auncestors? These (quoth he) were my words unto them, and in deed, but my words. Many they had liever heare Cracchus himselfe speake, and heare the same from out of his owne mouth: they would more gladly talke with him in person, & take hold of his right hand, which as the assured pawn of his faithfull promise, he carieth alwaies with him wheresoever he goeth, and they desire no more. I have therefore (saith he) appointed a convenient nient place of interview and conference: lying out of the way and forth of sight, but yet not far from the Romanes campe. There the matter may be dispatched in few words, and all the name and nation of the Lucanes, reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracchus suspecting no fraud nor harme, neither in his words nor deeds, founding all to a great likelihood of simplicitie and truth in his conceit, departed out of the campe attended upon with his sergeants, and guarded onely with a comet of horsemen: and so by the guidance of his owne host, in whose house he lodged, was plunged headlong within the daunger of the ambush of his enemies. VVho suddainly arose: and Flavius because he would put it out of doubt that hee was a traitour, went to their side and joyned with them. Then they let flie arrowes, & shot darts against Gracchus and his horsemen on every side. Whereupon Gracchus alight from horseback, & commanded the rest to do the same, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, they would grace and honour with vertue. For what remaineth else for us, (a small handfull unto them) environned as we are with a multitude of them, within a valley compassed about with hills and woods, but present death? This onely we are to resolve upon, Whither in this present amazednesse and hardesse feare, we will as beasts suffer our throats to be cut without revenge againe; or turning wholly our timorous expectation and suffering of death, into choller and courage, fight adventurously and manfully, and bathing our hands in the blood of our enemies, loose our lives and fall down dead, upon the weapons and bodies of them, lying gaping themselves under us. Ah that Lucane, that fugitive rogue and rebell, that treacherous and false traitor, see ye all lay at him. VVhose hap it will be, ere he die, to bee his priest, to sacrifice and send him to the devill, hee shall win an honourable price, and find no small solace and comfort in his owne death.

Gracchus killed by his host, a Lucane.

With these words, he wrapped his rich coate of armes about his left arme (for they had not brought forth with them so much as their shields) & charged with exceeding force upon the enemies. The fight was farre greater on their part than for the proportion and number of the men. The bodies of the Romanes lay open most unto the shot. And thus overcharged on all sides, from the higher places: as being in the valey subject to the volley of their darts, they were soone perced through. VVhen Gracchus was left naked alone, and his guard dead at his feete, the Carthaginians did what they could to take him alive: but he having espied among the enemies his good host and friend, that Lucane, ran among the thickest preale: where he was so fully bent to mischiefe him, that they could not will nor choose but kill him outright, without they would have lost the lives of many other. He was not so soone dead, but Mago sent him straightwayes unto Anniball, and commaunded that his bodie together with the knitches of rods (belonging to his Magistracie) should be presented and shewed before the Tribunall seate of the Generall. And this is the true report of the end of Gracchus: to wit, that he let his life in the Lucane land, about the plaines which are called Veteres Campi. There bee some that tell it otherwise, how he being accompanied with his Serjeants, and three serving men his bondslaves, went out from the campe within the territorie of Beneventum, neere unto the river * Calor, for to wash himselfe: where there chaunced his enemies to lurke, and lye in wait among the willowes and salowes that grew by the banke side, and so being unarmed and naked too, he was assaulted, where he defended himself as well as he could with flinging at them pible stones such as the river afforded and caried downe with the streame, and so was slaine. Others write, that by advise of the Bowell-priers, he went out of the camp halfe a mile off, for to purge and expiate in some pure and cleane place, those prodigious tokens above rehersed: and there was beset and environed round about with two troupes of Numidian horsemen, who hapned there to lye in ambush. See how variable and uncertaine the same goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this so noble and famous person came by his death. Nay the very funerall and sepulture also of Gracchus, is diversly delivered. Some say, he was entered by his owne souldiours within the Romane camp. Others give out and say (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Anniball he was buried in the very entrance of the Carthaginian leaguer; that there was a funerall fire made in solemne wise to burne his corps; that the whole armie justed and ran at tilt and toment in their compleat armor; that the Spanyards leaped and daunced Morrice; and each nation according to their guise and manner, performed sundry motions and exercises as well of their weapons, as of their bodies: yea, and that Anniball himselfe in proper person, with all honor of funerall pompe that might be devised, both in word and deed, solemnized the obsequies

A sequeis in the best manner. This say they that affirme the thing to have hapned in the Lucanes country. But if a man should beleeeve them, who record how hee was slaine at the river Calor, then the enemies gat nothing of him but only his head. VVhich being presented unto Anniball, he sent Carthalo immediately with it into the Romane campe, unto Cn. Cornelius the Treasuror or Questor: who there within the very camp performed the funeralls of the Generall, and both armie and citizens of Beneventum together solemnized the same right honourably.

The Consuls being entred into the territorie of Campane, as they forraied all abroad, straggling one from another, were by the townesmen of Capua which salied out, and by the horsemen of Mago, put in feare; whereupon in great fright and hast, they rallied the souldiours to their colours, that were raunged over the countrie: but before they could well embattaile them, and set them in array, they were discomfited, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men.

B Vpon which good successe, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very lustie and exceeding audacious, inso much, as they offered to skirmish sundrie times with the Romanes, and ever challenged them to fight. But that one battaile, so unadvisedly and inconsiderately atchieved, made the Consuls more circumspect & warie afterward. Howbeit, one small occurrence happened, which, as it encouraged and animated them againe, so it abated the hearts, and daunted the boldnesse of the other. For in warre there is nothing (bee it never so litle) but one time or other, it is the occasion of some great consequence and importance. There was in the campe one T. Quintius Crispinus, lincked in speciall friendship and familiaritie with Badius, a citizen of Capua. Their acquaintance grew and encreased upon this occasion: This Badius upon a time, before the revolt of Capua, fell sicke at Rome, and lying in Crispinus his house, was liberally and kindly used, yea, and tenderly seene unto by him, during his sicknesse. This Badius having put himselfe forward before the standing guards, that ward at the gate of the Romane campe, willed, that Crispinus should be called out unto him. VVhich being told unto Crispinus, he supposed no otherwise of it, but that he would talke friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were at enmitie, in regard of the publicke state, yet the private right and band of hospitalitie, remained still in force, and was not forgotten, and therefore hee went out somewhat apart from the rest of his fellowes. Now, when they were come in fight and interview one of the other. I challenge thee, o Crispine (quoth Badius) to combat: let us mount on horsebacke, and trie it out betwene us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the

C better man at armes. To this Crispinus made answer againe and said, Wee want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom wee may make proofe of our manhood: as for mee, if I met and encountred you in the very battaile, yet I would decline, avoid, and shift from you, least I should defile and staine my hand in the murder and bloodshed of my guest and friend. And with this hee turned from him, and went his way. But the Campane contrariwise, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and rating at him for his effeminate cowardise and dastardinesse, letting flie at the hamelesse and innocent man, all spightfull teame and reprochfull language; which himselfe ywis (if he had his due) was well worthe of: calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed, and finally charged him, that he made his excuse of sparing him, for friendship sake, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But if (qd. he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publicke league and covenant, our private bands of amitie and hospitalitie, are not yet ynough broken in sunder, then here I pronounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, That I Badius a Campane, renounce all hospitalitie with thee T. Quintius Crispinus a Romane, and so farewell all friendship for ever: I will, I say, have no more to doe by way of acquaintance with thee, no societie, no alliance, no hospitalitie will the guest have with that host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native countrie, and to make assault upon the publicke buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou bee a man, meet me in the field. Crispinus drew backe a long time, and was loth to enter into the action, but at last his fellow horsemen, serving in the same troupe and comet with him, forced and perswaded him, not to suffer that bragging Campane, thus to insult over him without revenge. VVherupon he made

F no more adoe, nor any longer delay, but whiles he went unto the L. Generals, to know their pleasure, whether they would permit and license him, out of his order and ranke, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defiance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armour about him, tooke his weapon, mounted on horseback, and calling upon Badius by name, bad him come forth if he durst to single fight. The Campane made no stay, and so with speare in rest, rest, set spurres to, and they ran their horses full carriere one at the other. Crispinus with his lance pierced Badus above his shield, through the left shoulder, and therewith unhorsed him, & when he was fallen to the earth with the push, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and so to dispatch him outright. But Badus, before his enemy seized upon him, left his target behind and his horse, and by good footmanship recovered his own fellows. Crispinus then, all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made shew of the horse and armour that he had won, and bearing up with all the bloudie point of his lance, was with much praise and great gratulation of the souldiours, brought honourably to the Consuls, and presented before them. At whose hands hee was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded.

Anniball having dislodged out of the territorie of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, within three dayes after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all, but that, considering the Campanes in his absence, had but few dayes before fought fortunatly, the Romanes now would be so much lesse able to abide his royall armie so often used to victorie. And verily when the medley was once begun, the Roman battailons of the Infanterie were much troubled and distressed, especially with the fierce assault of the horsemen, who overcharged and pelted them mightily with their darts and Iavelins, untill the signall was given to their owne Cavallerie also, to set hard to, and charge the enemies with their horse. Now while the men of armes were busy in fight on both sides, it hapned that the regiment of Sempronius [Gracchus lately slain] were descried marching a far off, under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius the Treasurer, which put both parts in like feare, least they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they founded the retreat on either side, as if they had bene agreed so to do, departed out of the field (as a man would say) on even hand, and retired themselves unto their severall holds: howbeit, the greater number was slain of Romanes, upon the first violent charge given by the horsemen. From thence, the Consuls intending to draw Anniball away from Capua, departed sundry wayes, Fulvius into the territorie of Cumes, and Claudius into the Lucanes country. The next day, when Anniball was advertised, that the Romanes had abandoned their camp, and that they were gone into divers parts with their severall armies, being at first uncertaine whom to pursue, resolved at length to make after Appius, and so began to do. But after he had once trained the enemy about to the place that he desired, he returned himselfe another way to Capua. And Anniball hapned also upon a new occasion presented, to have a good hand of his enemies in those parts.

There was one M. Centenius, surnamed Penula, one of the chiefe Centurions of the Pilani, a singular good captaine in that kind, as well in regard of his mightie and goodly body, as also of his brave mind, and valiant courage. This man having served out his ordinary time required by law, was by the meanes of P. Cornelius Sulla the Pretor, brought into the Senate house, and became a petitioner unto the LL. of the Counsell, that he might have the leading of five thousand footemen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquainted with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withall so much beaten in coasting those quarters, he would do some great deede, and atcheive a peece of notable service: and looke, by what cunning devises and stratagemes, both our leaders and our armies had bene untill that day, entrapped and over-raught, the very same would he use and practise against the enemy. He was not so vaine and unadvised in making this offer, but they were as fottish & foolish again in taking him at his word, and trusting him: as who would say, A good leader and commander, and a stout and hardie souldiour were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thousand: whereof the one halfe were citizens, the other allies and confederates: and besides them, he himselfe also gathered together out of the country as he marched, a good companie of voluntaries: in so much as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucanes country, where Anniball abode, after that he had followed Claudius in vaine, and to no effect. But a man that had but halfe an eye, might see what the sequele and event would be of the conflict betwene Generall Anniball, and Centinere Centenius: betwene both armies also, the one of old beaten souldiours used ever to victories, the other of raw novices and young beginners, yea many of them taken up sodainly in hast, and slenderly armed by the halves. For so soone as both hostes had confronted one another, and that on neither side they dallied and shifted off, but minded presently to go to it and fight; soone were they on both parts arranged in order

A order of battaile. And albeit the Romanes had many disadvantages, yet they maintained skirmish more than two houres: and that so hotely and couragiously, that they shrunke not one jot, so long as their leader stood on foote. But after that he once was stricken downe and slaine, who not only in regard and remembrance of the former name (that he had won) of valour and prowesse: but also for feare of future shame and dishonor, in case he should remaine alive after the defeature of his forces, whereof he was the onely cause through his foolle-hardie rashnesse, presented himselfe desperately upon the pikes of his enemies, where he might be sure of nothing but present death: & incontinently the Roman battailon was discomfited & put to flight. And so hard bested they were, in seeking waies and meanes to escape (all the avenues were so laid and beset with the horsemen) that of so great a multitude, there were hardly one thousand saved, all the rest miscaried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

B In this meane time, Capua was streightly beleaguered by the Consuls; and they began to assault it in most forcible manner: great preparation there was of all things needfull unto such an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Corne was conveyed to Castilum, and laid up there for store: at the mouth of the river Voltumnus (where now the citie standeth) was the skonce and castle fortified (which Fabius before had built) and a strong garison therein planted, to the end that both the sea so neere, and the whole river also might be at their commaund. Into these two fortresses standing on the sea side, as well the corne which lately was sent out of Sardinia, as also that which Mutius the Pretor had bought out of Hetruria, was transported from the port of Ostia, whereby the army might be served plentifully all winter season. Over and besides that losse received in the Lucanes country, the armie likewise of the Volonies, i. voluntary souldiours (which during the life of Craffus, had served truly and faithfully) now abandoned their colours; as if by the death of their Captaine they had taken themselves fully discharged from warfare.

Anniball made no small account of Capua: for willing enough he was, that his allies & friends there, should not be forsaken & left in so great perill wherein they stood; and yet upon that fortunate succeffe which hapned unto him through the rashnesse of one Roman captaine, his singersitched to be doing with another of them, and hoped to find some good opportunitie and advantage to surprize and overthrow both captaine and armie. Whereas therefore certaine Apulian Embassadors advertised him, that Cn. Fulvius the Pretour, (who at the first in assaulting D of certaine cities in Apulia, which had revolted unto Anniball, bare himselfe like a wife & prudent captaine: now afterwards, upon his good fortune and happie speed in those affairs, whereby himselfe and his souldiours had made up their mouthes and filled their hands well with booties and pillage) both himselfe and his men were growen so idle and so dissolute, that no good government nor militarie discipline remained among them: hereupon Anniball having good experience, (as often heretofore, so in this late instance but few daies past) in how small steed an armie serveth, when it is directed by an unskillfull leader, removed his forces into Apulia. Now lay the Roman legions and Fulvius the Pretour, encamped about Herdonia. And when the newes came thither, that the enemies were on their journey comming toward them, hardly might the souldiours be reclaimed and staid, but they would in all hast plucke up standards and ensignes, E and straightwaies go into the field and bid them battaile, without commission and commaundement of their Pretour. And no one thing more held them backe, than the assured hope they had, to doo it at their pleasure whensoever they would. Anniball the night following, having certaine intelligence, that there was a tumult in the campe, & that most of the souldiours mightily importuned their Generall, to put forth unto them the signall of battaile, and called earnestly unto him for to lead them out into the field, made full account to meet with good opportunitie and occasion, to have a faire day of his enemies: and therefore he bestowed three thousand men lightly appointed, in divers villages thereabout, among the thicke groves and bushes, and within the woods: who at a signe given them, should all at once upon a suddaine, start up & leap forth of their lurking corners: and withall, he gave order to Mago, with two thousand horsemen F or therabout, to keep all the waies whereas he supposed they were most like to flee & make escape. Having thus ordred all things beforehand in the night time: at the breake of day he entred the field with his armie, & embattailed himself in warlike maner. Fulvius for his part, was not behind; not induced so much upon any hope or conceit he had of good speed, as drawne & haled thereto, through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his souldiours. And therefore as they came forth forth to battaile upon a head and heat, inconsiderately, so they were set in array as disorderly, even at the pleasure of the fouldiours, according as they came forth and tooke up their ranks and files, as they list themselves: & then againe, as the toy tooke them in the head, left the same, either upon wilfulness or fear. The first legion together with the left wing or corner of horsemen, were first marshalled: and the squadrons drawne and stretched out in a great length: norwithstanding the Knight-marshals and Coronels cried out, that withinforth, there was no strength nor power at all; and that the enemies wheresoever they should happen to charge, would breake in upon them and go through. But no hole some counsell for their owne good, might be taken and considered upon: nay they would not so much as lend their eare, & give them the hearing. And by this time Anniball was in place, with another manner of armie (you may bee sure) and otherwise ordred and aranged. And therefore the Romanes were not able to abide so much as the first shout and thocke of the onser. The captaine himselfe (as foolish and headie as Centenius, but in courage and resolution farre short of him) seeing how the world went, the field like to be lost, his fouldiours in feare and great perplexitie; recovered his horse in great hast, and with some two hundred horsemen fled away and escaped: all the armie besides, beaten backe affront, beset behind, flanked on the sides, and environned round; were so killed and hewen in peeces, that of eightene thousand, there were not past two thousand saved. And the enemies besides were maisters of the campe.

When these losses one in the necke of another were reported at Rome, the cittie was set in a great fit of sorrow and feare for the while: but so long as the Consuls, in whom rested the maine chaunce, had hitherto prospered and sped well, they were the lesse troubled at these by-blows and crosse misfortunes. Whereupon they addrested C. Leliorus and M. Milius as messengers unto the Consuls, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, those dispersed reliques and remainders of the two armies; also to have an eye & heedfull regard unto them, that upon feare and desperation they yeilded not themselves to the enemy (as it hapned after the Cannian overthrow;) and last of all, to make diligent search and seeke out those Volones, or voluntarie servitours, that had abandoned their ensignes and casted themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Cornelius, who had commission besides to levie more men. And he made proclamation throughout all market townes, faires, & places of frequent resort, That those Volones should be found out and brought againe to their owne colours, to serve as aforetime. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Appius Claudius the Consul, after he had made D. Iunius captaine of the sconce erected upon the mouth of the river Vulturnus, and M. Aurelius Cotta Governor of Puteoli, with commission, That as any ships [with corne] from out of Hetruria or Sardinia arrived there, they should immediately send the corne to the campe; went backe himselfe to Capua: where hee found Q. Fulvius his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Casilinum, and making preparation for the assault of Capua. Then both Coss. jointly together besieged the citie: and sent unto Claudius Nero the Pretor, for to come unto them from Suessula, out of the old camp of Claudius. Who likewise leaving a small garrison there to defend the peece, with all his power and forces, descended into the plaines before Capua. So there were three roiall pavillions pitched for three LL. generals about Capua: and three full armies in three sundrie places began to forisic, erecting bastilons and forts in places not farre distant: yea and to cast a trench and raise a rampiar round about the citie. And in divers quarters at once, they skirmished with the men of Capua, whensoever they came to hinder their fortifications, with so good successe, that the townsmen were driven at last to keepe within their gates and walls. But before that those rampiars and trenches above said were fully finished, and all ends brought together, there were Embassadours dispatched unto Anniball, to complaine in the name of the Capuans, as finding themselves grieved, that hee had forsaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romanes hands: and withall, to beseech him earnestly, that now or never, he would rescue and succor them, being not onely besieged, but also shut up and almost trenched about, as within a prison. P. Cornelius likewise the Pretour of the citie of Rome, sent his letters unto the Consuls, advising them before they had fully invetted Capua round about, to make offer unto the Capuans of this libertie, That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua: and whosoever went forth before the *Ides of March, should enjoy their freedome and all their goods and lands: but as many as after that day, either departed or tarried there still behind, should be reckoned no better than A than very enemies. These intimations were made known unto the Campanes, but so light they set by them, that they fell a railing, reviling, and menacing the Romanes, with most reproachfull taunts and spightfull tearmes. Anniball was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by force or fraud to gaine the castle. And seeing he little prevailed, he turned from thence, and tooke his way to Brundisium, supposing that towne would bee betrayed into his hands. Whiles he lay there also and lost his time in doing nothing, the Embassadours of the Campanes arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requests both at once. Unto whom Anniball made this glorious and lordlike answer: with a majesticke Once alreadie have I raised the siege, and never will the Consuls, I trow, abide my second coming. The Embassadours having received their dispatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themselves within Capua, so enclosed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampiar.

It fortuned at the very same instant, when Capua was thus streightly beleaguerd, that the siege also & assault of Saracose came to an end: helped forward & hastned by intestine treacherie and treason withall, as well as by force of armie & valour of captaine abroad. For Marcellus in the beginning of the spring, doubtfull in himselfe and hanging in suspence, whither to bend his whole forces toward Aggrigentum; against Himilco & Hippocrates, or still proceed to besiege Saracose: albeit he saw the citie might not possibly be woon, either by forcible assault, (considering it was by situation both by sea and land invincible) or pining famine, by reason the passage in manner lay open to and fro betweene it and Carthage, for safe transporting of all sort of victuals: yet because hee would leave no stone unrolled, but trie all waies that could be devised; he commaunded certaine revolts from the Saracosiens (for there sided with the Romanes some of the noblest persons of the citie, who at the time of the first backsliding from the Romanes, because they misliked and abhorred all rebellion and change in the state, were driven out and banished the citie) to deal with their bend and faction by way of conference, to sound the harts (I say) of such as were their followers, and to sollicite them to their part: and withall to assure them (upon their warrant) that if by their meanes Saracose were betrayed, they should live in freedome, and enjoy their owne lawes as they would themselves. But no opportunitie could they espie for to parlie and talke with them. For by reason that there were many suspected to encline and draw that way, every man had a carefull eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practised, but soone it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-servant toward one of the banished persons above said, hapned to be let into the citie, pretending that he was run away from the adverse part unto them: who hapning to meet with some few, began to move and broch such a matter. After which, certaine others lying close hidden under the nets in a fisher bore, came about by water to the camp of the Romanes, and had conference and communication with those former fugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time, this was practised in the same manner, by divers and sundry persons, untill at length they were a crew of fourescore in all. Now when all things were concluded for the betraying of the citie, neere upon the point of execution, it chanced that one Attalus (a false brother among them, who tooke snuffe that he was not specially trusted in the matter) disclosed the conspiracie unto Epicides, and appeached the parties: whereupon they were all put to extreame torture, and suffered death every one. When this plot would speed no better, they conceived hope another way, by a new occasion and occurrence that presently offered it selfe. There chanced one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, sent from Syracusa, as a messenger to king Philip, for to bee taken prisoner by the Roman armada. Now, both Epicides was very desirous & exceeding careful how to ransom him, & also Marcellus was not unwilling for his part to graunt the same. For even then; the Romans began to affect the friendship of the Aetolians, with which nation the Lacedemonians were confederate, and in league. So, when there should be commissioners and delegates sent on both sides, to parlie & treat about his redemption, the most indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharfe of *Trogili, fast by a turret which they call *Galeagra, as being just in the middle between, & most convenient for both parties. It happened now, that as they had recourte oftentimes thither about this businesse, one of the Romans well viewed the wall neere by, he counted the stones, that appeared in the forefront of the wal, and made estimate to himselfe of their quadrature & proportion; & withall, giving a guesse as neere as he could, of what height (by his reckoning) & measure, the wall might be: and supposing it was a good deale lower, than either he himselfe or others, had alwaies before taken it to be, and easie to be skaled with ladders, G even of a meane size and middle fort, hee relateth the matter, and his conceit of it to Marcellus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to bee thought upon. But for as much as, there was no access unto that place, by reason, that for the lownesse thereof, it was the more carefully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for some opportunitie and advantage to helpe that difficultie. VVhich, as good hap was, offered it selfe presently unto them by means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a solemne feast of Diana at that time within the citie, and the same continued three daies together: also hee said, that for want of other things, during this siege to make good chere withall, they spared for no wine; but made merrie therewith in great plentie and abundance. For why? not only Epicides had bountifully bestowed wine upon the whole Commons, but also the great men of the citie had in every ward H and parish where they dwelt, allowed a proportion besides of their owne charges. When Marcellus heard this, he called unto him some few of his Colonels and knight Marshalls, and conferred with them: and when they had sorted out certaine choise and select Centurions and soldiers, fit and sufficient men to adventure and execute so great a peece of service, and withall provided ladders secretly; to all the rest he commaunded a watchword and warning to be given. That they should betimes take their refection of meat and repose of sleepe, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of service. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having feasted all day long, and well filled their bellies with meat, and their heads with wine) were gone to rest, and newly fallen sound asleepe, he commaunded one ensigne I or companie of souldiours, to carie ladders; and besides them, there were upon a thousand well armed and appointed, marching with silence and in thin ranckes, brought thither to the place. When the foremost without any stirre or noise at all, had skaled the top of the wall, others followed in their course. For the forward and resolute boldnesse of the former, was able to animate and encourage the rest, if they had been falsehearted. By this time now, the thousand armed souldiours had seized that part, when the rest of the ladders were set to: and upon more ladders still, they gat up to the wall in diverse places, upon a signall given them from the gate Hexapylus. Vnto which places the Romanes were now come, and found no stirring at all, but exceeding silence and desolation, for as much as a great sort of them had made good chere within the turrets, and either were fast asleepe with drinking wine already, or else were bibbing still, notwithstanding their eyes were heavey, and their hearts asleepe. And yet, some few of them they tooke in K their beds, and killed. Neere unto Hexapylus there is a little wicket, which with great violence they began withall, to breake it open. So as now, both from the wall (as was before appointed) they gave signall by sound of trumpet: and also from all parts they went not to worke any more by stealth, but plainly and openly without dissimulation. For they were come already as far as Epipolæ, a place full of watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and stricken into feare, and no longer to be dealt withall by craft and guile. And it fell out so indeed, that they were mightily skared. For they heard not so soone the sounding of the trumpets, and the shouting and outcrie of them that were possessed of the walls and one part of the citie, but the warders, thinking all was gone, some ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or else were borne downe headlong, with the prease of others that were affrighted. And yet many there I were, who were not ware at all of this miserie and extremitie, both because generally they were all dead asleepe, and also by reason that the citie was so wide and large, that a thing felt and scene in some remote parts, reached not streightwaies throughout, to all the rest. The gate Hexapylus was broken downe somewhat before day, at which Marcellus with all his power entred the citie. He wakened them all, and set them to their businesse; he made them take weapon in hand, and to helpe (what they could) a citie in a manner wholly surprisid and taken. Epicides made hast from the Island (which they themselves call Nalos) with a companie of souldiours about him, making full account to drive them out againe: as supposing, that they were but some few, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were gotten over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were skared and in feare, hee said unto them estoones, that they themselves made more adoe, and every thing worse than there was cause, reporting all in greater measure and more fearful manner than need was in very truth. But when he saw all places about Epipolæ full of armed men, after some small volley of shot, and little skirmish with the enemy, (whereby hee provoked them, rather than did any good else) hee turned backe againe with his companies, and retired in M

A to Acradina, not fearing so much the violence and multitude of the enemies, as least some intestine mischeefe by this occasion might arise, and that he should find in this tumult and hurlyburly, the gates of Acradina, and the Island shut against him. Marcellus being entered within the walls, tooke his prospect from the higher places, and when hee beheld under his eyes the most goodly and beautifull citie of all others in those daies, (by report) he wept and shed teares abundantly, partly for joy that he had brought his purpose to so good a passe, and partly in compassion and remembrance of the auncient glorie and renowne of that citie. Hee called to mind the navies of the Atheniens by them sunke and drowned: hee thought upon the utter overthrow of two puissant armies, together with the losse of two most noble and famous captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memorie so many wars fought against the Carthaginians, with B so great perill and hazard: so many and so mightie Tyrants and kings that reigned and kept their seat and roiall court there: & amongst the rest, he could not chuse but think of king Hiero, of fresh and famous memorie, a prince, who above all other gifts which his owne vertue and fortune had graced & endued him withall, was recommended especially for his many favors and good turnes done unto the people of Rome. When all these things presented themselves to his remembrance, with this cogitation besides, how all that beaute and glorie within one houres space was ready to burne on a light fire, and to be consumed into ashes: before that he advanced his ensignes against Acradina, hee sent before, those Syracusians who had converted (as is afore-said) amongst the guards and garrison of the Romanes, to perswade the enemies with mild & gentle speech, yet, to yeeld the citie. It so fell out, that the most part of them that warded the gates and C walls both, of Acradina, were certaine fugitive revolts fled from the Romanes, who had no hope at all, upon any condition whatsoever to be pardoned. These would suffer none, either to approach the walls, or to parte and speake with any. And therefore Marcellus, after hee saw that enterprife frustrate & disappointed, commaunded to retire with the ensignes unto Euryalus. This Euryalus is a little mount and fort, situate in the utmost quarter of the citie, remote far from sea, and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, & the middle parts and very hart of the whole Island; a place very commodious for the taking up & receipt of all victuals. The captain of this hold was Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Vnto whom there was sent from Marcellus, Sosis, one of them that murdered the tyrant: and after long communication, Sosis with craftie words abused by him, & colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus, that D Philodemus had taken a farther day of respite & deliberation. But he put off still from day to day, trifling out the time of purpose, untill Hippocrates & Himilco might come with their forces and legions, making no doubt, but if he might receive them into his fortresse, the whole armie of the Romanes being now enclosed within the walls, should be overthrowne, and utterly defeated. Marcellus seeing that Euryalus was not delivered up, (and forced possibly it could not bee) encamped himselfe betwene Neapolis and Tyche (so are two parts of the citie named, and may for their bignesse go well enough for two entier cities of themselves:) for feare, least if he were once entered into the populous and most inhabited places of the citie, his souldiers greedie of pillage, would not bee kept together, but runne loosely up and downe to rife. Thither came unto him from Tyche and Neapolis, Embassadors and Oratours, with olive braunches adorned with sacred veiles and infules, humbly beseeching him to hold his hand from effusion of blood, & firing the citie. Marcellus calling his counsell about these their petitions, rather than demands, after mature deliberation, by generall consent of all, gave expresse and streight commaundement to the souldiours, that no man should offer abuse or violence to the bodie of any freeborne person whatsoever: as for all besides, his will and pleasure was it should bee their bootie. Now was the campe of Marcellus defended on both sides with housing in steed of a wall, and hee bestowed a good corps de guard at the gates thereof, lying open over against the streets: least when the souldiours ran to and fro in the citie, the campe in the meane while might be assailed. Then upon the sound of trumpet the souldiours fell to their businesse, ran into all parts, brake open dores, set all on a fearefull hurrey, but spilled no blood: and they never gave over ransacking and rising, untill E they had cast out and carried away all the riches and goods, that had beene a gathering a long time, during their wealthie and prosperous estate. Amid these stirres, Philodemus also seeing no hope of succours and rescue, after he had covenanted for his securitie, to return safe and without harme to Epicides, withdrew his garrison away with him out of the fort, and rendred it up to the Romanes.

Now whiles every man was turned another way, and busied in that part of the citie which was forced, Bomilcar taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Romane fleet by reason of a violent tempest could not ride at anchor in the maine sea, gat forth of the haven of Saracofe with 35 ships, and having sea-roume, halfed up sailes, and away he went with a mery gale of wind, leaving 55 behind for Epicides and the Saracofians: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what danger the state of Saracofe stood, returned within few dayes with a fleet of a hundred saile, rewarded for his labor (as the report went) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treasure of king Hiero paid for. Marcellus possessed now of the fortresse Euryalus, and having planted there a garison, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, least if a new power of enemies had bene received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, enclosed now as they were, and encombred within the walls.

After this he besieged Acradina, and invested it round about, and fortified three severall campes (in meet and convenient places) against it, hoping to shut them up into such streights, that they should be driven to extreame scarcitie & want of all things. Now when as for certaine daies, the guards of the one side & the other had rested quiet; sodainly upon the arrivall of Hippocrates and Himilco, they within began from all parts to set freshly upon the Romans. For, first Hippocrates (after he had encamped and well fortified himselfe fast by the great Key, and given a signall to them that kept Acradina) assaulted the old campe of the Romanes, where Crispinus lay with his guard for the defence thereof: then Epicides also sallied forth, and brake upon the Corps de guard of Marcellus: and withall, the Carthaginian fleet approached close to the strand that lieth betwene the citie and the Romane camp, to hinder that Crispinus might have no aid sent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater stirre and tumultuous alarme, than any skirmish to speake of: for Crispinus not only gave Hippocrates the repulse, and drave him from the defenses of his owne campe, but also followed him in chase, as he fled fearefully in hast away: and Marcellus forced Epicides to take the citie againe, and get it over his head. So as now they seemed very sufficiently provided and appointed against all dangers from thence forth, of their sodaine sallies and irruptions.

Over and besides all these troubles, there hapned a common calamitie unto both, the plague and pestilence: in such manner, as it might soone have withdrawne the minds, as well of the one part as of the other, from thinking any more of warre. For, besides that it fell out to be the Autumne or harvest season of the yeare, the place it selfe by nature unholsome, stinking and corrupt (but much more without the citie than within) the extreame and intollerable heate of the weather mightily distempered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one & the other. At the first, by occasion of the distemperature of the season, and corruption of the place, they both fell sick and died: but afterward by visiting and tending one another that were infected, the disease grew catching and contagious, and so spread and increased more and more: in such manner, as either they that were fallen sick perished for want of looking to and diligent attendance; or if any came about them, to keepe them and minister unto them, they were infected and endangered also as deeply as the other: so as every day a man could go no where, but either death, or corpes caried forth to their graves, were presented to his eies: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, wailing, and piteous lamentation. In the end their hearts were so hardened and made savage againe, by continuall usage to this miserie, that not only they gave over to weepe over the dead, and to accompanie them unto their sepulchres with due mourning and dolefull plaints, but also to cary them forth and to interre them: so that the breathlesse bodies lay scattered all abroad on the ground in the sight of them, that looked every houre for the like miserable death themselves. The dead killed the sick: the sick infected the sound, partly with feare, and partly with the corruption and pestiferous stench that came from their bodies. And because they would dye rather upon the sword's point, than of this maladie, some of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their miserie. Howbeit, the plague was hotter by farre in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romanes, by reason of the corrupt water, and much slaughter committed there, & so long siege about Saracofe. For of the enemies armie, the Sicilians at the first, so soone as they saw the sickness to spread commonly, and increase by reason of the corruption of the place, got themselves away, and stole every man home to the cities neere adjoining. But the Carthaginians were faine to stick by it still, as having no place to retire themselves unto, and

A and so, they together with their Generals themselves Hippocrates & Himilco, died all of them, and not one escaped. Marcellus when he saw this mortalitie grow thus hote, brought his people into the citie, where the houses & shadowie places yeilded some good refreshing to the sick & weake bodies: howbeit, many also of the Romane armie went of it, and turned up their heeles. Thus when the land-souldiours of the Carthaginians were all gone and consumed of the plague, the Sicilians who had served under Hippocrates, withdrew themselves into certaine townes, which were not great, yet sure and strong, both by naturall situation, and also by strength of walls and other defenses; the one of them three miles from Saracofe, the other fiftene miles distant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveyed from out of their own cities adjoining, all manner of victuals, and sent abroad for aids of men.

B In the meane while Bomilcar set saile once againe with his fleet for Carthage, where he made relation of the state of their confederates in such termes, that still he fed them with some hope, That not only by their help they might be saved, but also that the Romans (notwithstanding they had in some sort forced and taken the citie) might be surprisid and taken there themselves: and in conclusion persuaded and prevailed so with them, that they granted not only to send with him a great number of hulks & caricks, laden with store of all things, but also to furnish him with more ships of warre; to encrease his Armada. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 130 galleies, and 70 ships of burden, and had forewinds good enough to set him over into Sicilie. But those winds kept him from doubling the point of the cape Pachynus.

C The same and rumor first of Bomilcar his coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it againe, wrought diversly in the minds of the Romanes and Syracusians, ministring one while feare, another while joy unto them both. Whereupon Epicides fearing least if the same Easterly winds which then held, and were settled in that corner, should continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navie would returne againe into Affricke, leaving the guard of Acradina to the captaines of the waged and mercenarie souldiours, sailed to Bomilcar, riding still with his fleet in the rode that looketh toward Affricke, and fearing a conflict at sea, not so much because he was inferiour to the enemies either in force or number of ships (for he had many more than the Romanes) but for that the winds stood more favourably to help the Roman Armada than his: howbeit, in the end he persuaded him to try the fortune of a battaile at sea. And Marcellus for his part, seeing both the Sicilian forces gather and assemble together from all parts of the Island, and understanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great store of victuals: for feare least at any time whiles hee was shut up within the enemies citie, hee should be assailed both by sea and land: albeit he was short of them in number of ships, yet determined to hinder Bomilcar for arriving at Saracofe. Thus rid two armadaes of enemies affronting one another, about the head of Pachynus, readie to joyne battaile, so soone as the calmnesse of the weather would give them leave to advance into the maine and open sea. Therefore when the East wind began to lie, which for certeine daies had blustred and raged, first Bomilcar weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his armada seemed to gather still into the deepe, only because hee might more easilie gaine the Cape and promontarie aforesaid. But so soone as he saw the Romanes ships make way toward him, (I wot not what suddaine accident it was that afrigh-E red him) he set up all his sailes and fell off, into the maine sea: and after he had sent certain messengers to Heraclea, willing them for to set againe their hulkes home into Affricke, himselfe coasted all along Sicilie, and shaped his course for Tarentum. Epicides disappointed thus on a suddaine, of so great hopes that he had, because he would not returne againe to the siege of a citie, whereof a great part was lost already, saileth to Agrigentum, there to abide & expect the event and finall issue, rather than to stirre himselfe and trie any more, how to helpe them with any succour from thence.

F These things being reported in the campe of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicides had quitted Saracofe; that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole lland of Sicilie, and in manner yeilded it againe into the hands of the Romanes: after they had sounded first their minds who were besieged, by talke and conference with them, they sent Embassadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of surrendring the citie. When they were growne in a maner to this point, without any squaring or difference at all, That the Romanes should have the signorie all and wholly which belonged unto the kings: and that, all the rest the Sicilians should enjoy, with libertie & their own proper lawes; the Embassadors aforesaid called forth to a parley, those unto whom whom Epicides at his departure had committed the government of the affaires, and declared unto them, that as they were addrested Oratours unto Marcellus, so they were from him sent unto the annie of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the besieged, as those who were without the daunger of the siege, should be comprised within the treatie, and abide one and the same fortune: and that neither the one side nor the other, should capitulate or enter into any covenant for themselves apart, without all the rest. Who being received and admitted, for to salute and speake unto their kinsfolke & friends, made them acquainted with the agreement and composition betwene Marcellus and them: and so after they had presented unto them some good hope of their safetie, they perswaded with them so farre forth, as to joyne with them, and all together, for to set upon & assault the bodies of the captains deputed by Epicides, namely Polyetes, Philistio, and one Epicides surnamed Sydus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude together unto a generall assembly: where they complained greatly of their povertie, and penurie of all things (for which they were wont to murmure secretly among themselves:)

And albeit yee are distressed (say they) with so many miseries and calamities, yet are yee not to blame fortune therefore, so long as it was in your owne power and choise, either to be delivered from them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (said they) it was not hatred, but meere love and charitie, that moved them to come against Saracofe for to assault it. For when they heard that the government of the state was usurped by Hippocrates and Epicides (the ministers first belonging to Anniball, and after to Hieronymus) then they began to lay siege unto it, intending not the overthrow and destruction of the cittie it selfe, but to put downe and depose the cruell tyrant that ruled the state. Seeing then, that now Hippocrates is dead, Epicides excluded from Saracofe, his deputies and captaines killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their hold and possession of Sicilie, both by land and sea, what reason have the Romanes, but to bee willing and well content, that Saracofe should continue in safetie now, as well as if Hiero himselfe were living, the onely maintainer & observant upholder of the Romane amitie? And therefore, if ought but well should happen, either to the cittie, or to the citizens, yee may thanke yourselves, and none else, for letting slip opportunitie now offered, of reconciliation & attonement with the Romanes. Never looke to have the like occasion hereafter, to that, which at this instant is presented: if yee had the grace to see what a doore is opened for you, to be delivered from the yoke of most insolent & proud tyrants. This speech they gave eare unto with exceeding accord and generall applause. But before that any Embassadours were nominated to bee sent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors should be created. Out of the number of which Pretours, there were Oratours addrested unto Marcellus. And the principal man among them, spake in this wise. Neither we Syracusians (quoth hee) o Marcellus, at the first revolted from you Romanes, but Hieronymus, impious and wicked Prince as he was; yet nothing so much hurtfull to you as to us: nor afterwards, when peace was knit again upon the murder of the tyrant, was it any citizen of Saracofe, but Hippocrates and Epicides (the kings right hands and ministers, who oppressed and kept us under, with fear of one side, & with deceivable sleights on another side) that made the brack, & were the troublers & disturbers of this peace. Ne yet can any man come forth and say truly, that ever we were at our owne libertie, and entertained not peace and amitie with you. And now also I assure you, so soone as by the massacre of these, that held Saracofe in such oppression and bondage, we began againe to be our owne men, and to have the law in our owne hands; the first thing you see that we do, is this, to come & present ourselves unto you, to deliver up our armour and weapons, to yeeld our bodies, our cittie, the walls, and all the strength thereof, and to refuse no condition, that it shall please you Romanes to impose upon us. As to your self, o noble Marcellus, the gods have given you the honour of conquest, over the most noble & beautifullest cittie of all other in Greece. Behold, how, what memorable acts soever that we have at any time achieved, either by land or sea, all makes to the advancement of the glorious title & dignity of your triumph. See you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-say & the trumpet of fame, how great and mightie a cittie you have won, but rather that it may stand still and remaine for all posteritie, for a marke and worthie spectacle to behold: to the end, that whosoever hereafter, shall resort thither by land, whosoever shall arrive there by sea, it may present unto them, both our Trophees and worthie victories over the Atheniens & Carthaginians; and also this of yours over us, the bravest conquest of all the rest. See I say that you leave for your house and familie, the cittie of Saracofe whole and sound, to do homage and fealtie ever hereafter, to the

- A the name and linage of the Marcelli, and to hold of them as of their soveraigne LL. in chiefe and in villenage. That all the world may see, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater stroke with the Romanes, than the ancient name of king Hiero, a noble Prince of famous memorie. Much longer was he a friend, than the other an enemy. His good deeds and many favours yee have tasted and felt with great contentment: the follie and madnesse of Hieronymus, hurt none of you, but wrought his owne confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might have obtained at the Romanes hands: all was cleere there, and no daunger from thence. But among their owne selves they were at more warre: there was the perill, there was all the mischief. For the Romane rebels, who were runne from them, doubting that they should be delivered over into their hands, and not comprised within the termes of the composition and protection, drave the auxiliaries also that were waged souldiours into the same scruple and feare. They hastilie therefore tooke armes, and first killed the Pretours: and afterwards, ran all about to massacre the Saracofians. Looke whom they hapned to meet, them they murdered in this furious fit of choller. Whatsoever came next to their hands, and lay handsome for them, they rifled. And because forthwith, they would not be without their leaders, they created fixe provosts or captaines, that three should governe Acradina, and other three Nasos. At the last, after the uprore was appeased, the mercenarie souldiours aforesaid, followed the matter thoroughly by search and diligent inquirie, what were the capitulations in deed agreed upon with the Romans; and then began the very truth to appeare, namely that their condition and the fugitives were far different.
- C These Embassadours in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they were caried away with a wrong surmise and false suspicion, and the Romanes had no just cause to punish them. Now there was one of those three Provosts of Acradina, a Spaniard, named Mericius. Unto him there was sent for the nones among those of the retinue and traine of the Embassadours aforesaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliarie souldiours, serving under the Romanes: who finding Mericius alone without other companie, gave him to understand especially above all things, in what tearmes he had left Spaine (& from thence he was newly come) namely how the Romanes there were grown mightie, and held a great hand over them with their forces. And that himselfe, in case he had a mind to doe some worthie deed, might soone rise, and be a great man in his countrey: chuse whether he list to serve under the Romanes, or returne againe unto his owne home. Contrariwise, if he went on stil in this course he had begun, and minded still to be besieged, what long abiding place could he have there, shut up as he was from sea & land? Mericius pondered well these reasons: and when it was agreed, that there should bee addrested new Embassadours unto Marcellus, sent his owne brother with them, who by the selfesame Spaniard was brought apart from all the rest unto Marcellus: and after he had a protection granted, he laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it should be done, and so returned to Acradina. Then Mericius because he would withdraw mens minds from all suspicion of treason, and that he intended nothing lesse, than to betray Acradina, gave it out, That he liked not, and would no more of this recourse, ever & anone, of Embassadours betwene; and therefore as he would admit of none to come from Marcellus, so he would send no more to him. And to the end, that all the guards should bee kept more diligently, hee thought it good to divide conveniently among the Provosts, the quarters of the cittie, and assigne to every one his ward by himselfe, and that each one should be bound to answer for the safe keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then all gave their consent to part accordingly, and to himselfe befell the charge of that quarter which reacheth from the fountain or wel Arethusa, unto the mouth or entrie of the great key or haven. And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romanes. Whereupon Marcellus caused a great hulke, laden with armed souldiours, to be fastened by an haling rope unto a gallic of foure course of oares, and so in the night by strength of oares to bee towed and drawne up after it into Acradina, and landeth the souldiours over against the gate that is neer to the fountain Arethusa. This being done about the releefe of the fourth watch, Mericius received the souldiours that were set ashore at the gate, according as before it was agreed. And Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all his forces gave a Camisado upon the walls of Acradina, in such manner, that not onely he turned thither unto his assault all those that kept Acradina, but also from Nasos there came running whole squadrons and companies of armed men (leaving their owne wards) for to repell and put backe the violence and assault of the Romanes. In this tumult and trouble, certie taine barges appointed and furnished thereto aforehand, were brought about to Nafos, & there set other souldiours aland: who comming at unwares upon the corps de guards that were left halfe naked and very weake, by reason of the departure of their fellowes, and finding the gates wide open, at which erewhile the souldiours ran out, with small adoe were maisters of Nafos, left, as it was, forlorne of warders, who in feare made haft to run away and escape. And none of them all had lesse meanes to defend themselves, or smaller mind to carrie still, than the fugitive rebels, for they durst not well trust their owne fellowes, and so in the hottest of the skirmish made an escape. Marcellus so soone as hee understood, that Nafos was woon, and likewise that one quarter of Acradina was held and kept for him, and that Mericius with his guard had joined to his souldiours, founded the retreat: for feare, that the kings treasure, which was more in name than in deed, should be rifled and spoiled.

Thus by suppressing the violence of the souldiours, both the rebell fugitives that were in Acradina, had good time and place to shift for themselves and get away, and also the Syracusians delivered now at last from feare, opened the gates of Acradina, and sent Oratours unto Marcellus, craving nothing but life for themselves and their children. Marcellus called his counsell together, and those Syracusians likewise, who in the time of civile dissention, were driven to forsake their houses, and remained among the garisons of the Romanes: and then hee made the Embassadours this answer. There have not been (quoth he) more benefites and good turnes for the space of fiftie yeares received at king Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mischeefes intended against them within these few yeares, by them that have seized and possessed the citie of Syracusa. But most of those mischeefes in the end, have lighted upon their heads right justly, who duly deserved the same: and for the breach of league and covenants, they themselves have suffered at their owne hands more greivous punishment by farre, than the people of Rome would willingly ever have required. As for mee, this is the third yeere that I lie in siege before Syracusa; not, I assure you, with this intent, that the citie should not be reserved safe, and found for the naturall people thereof to keepe and inhabite, but that the captaines & ring-leaders of fugitives and rebels might not seize of it, and so hold it in captivitee and oppression. How much the Syracusians might have done with me at first, may be easily seen by the example either of those Syracusians who conversed among the guards of the Romanes, or of the Spanish captaine Mericius, who yeelded up his garrison. Yea, and the hardie and resolute course in the end taken (although it were with the latest) by the Syracusians themselves, may sufficiently testify the same. Whereby also it may appeare, that for all my travell and paine which I have undergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of Syracusa, both by land and water, thus long; I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as this, that it may be said, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquere Syracusa.

Syracusa was won and Acradina held.

Archimedes
killed.

Then the Questour was sent, attended with a guard, unto Nafos, for to enter upon the kings treasure there, and to keepe the same in safetie. The pillage of the citie was given to the souldiours: but there were appointed certaine warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garisons of the Romanes, for to save the same. Amids many cruell, spitefull, and foule examples of anger, mallice, and covetousnesse, which happened to bee committed during the time of this saccage, it is reported, That in so great hurlyburly as possible might bee, when a citie is newly taken, and hungrie souldiours runne to rifling, Archimedes was busily occupied, and studying upon certaine Geometrical figures that hee had drawne out in the dust, and happened to be slaine by a souldiour, that knew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and thereupon gave especiall order, that he should be honorably entere: yea and caused his kinsfolkes to be sought out: and all they in remembrance of him, & for his name sake, were not onely saved, but also well accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you see in what sort, and by what meanes especially, Saracose was woon. A citie wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have bene gotten in Carthage, if it had bene forced then: notwithstanding it was able to hold out with Rome, and mainteine warre with equall force and power.

Some few dayes before the winning of Saracose, T. Octavius with fourescore Gallies, of five ranks of oares, crossed the seas from Lilybaeum to Vtica, and being entred the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certaine Caricks charged with corne. After he was disembarked and set a land, he wasted grievously part of the territorie about Vtica, and returned to the citie

A with bootie and prizes of all forts. And the third day after he went from Lilybaeum he returned thither againe with 130 caricks full of corne and other bootie: and that corne he sent forthwith to Saracose: which if it had not come as it did in good time to help the present necessitie, the conquerours as well as the conquered had felt the smart of most extreame and grievous famine.

In the same sommer, the Roman Generals in Spaine (who almost for two yeares had done no memorable act there, but warred by pollicie and stratagemes, more than by force of armes) dislodged from their forts and winter harbours, and joyned their armies together. Then they called a counsell, where they jumped with one generall accord in this opinion, That considering all this while they had effected this much only, as to empeach and stay Asdruball from all meanes of passing over into Italie, it was now high time to make an end at once of the warre in Spaine. And to effect and bring this to passe, they supposed verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in armes thirtie thousand Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spaine then, no fewer than three armies. Asdruball the sonne of Gisco, and Mago, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romanes almost five dayes journey: Asdruball the sonne of Amilcar, an auncient warrior, and an old Captaine in Spaine, was somewhat neerer with his whole power, before a citie named Anitorgis. Him the Roman Generals were desirous to diffeate and vanquish first: and in good hope they were, that they had strength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: mary, this was their only doubt and feare, least upon the discomfiture of him, the other Asdruball and Mago would for feare retire themselves into the unpassable woods, and take the wilds and mountaines, and so mainteine a long war. They supposed therefore it was the best course to divide their power betwene them in two parts, and at once to compasse the whole warre of Spaine. And thus they agreed to part their forces, namely, That P. Cornelius should lead two third parts of the armie, consisting of Romanes and allies, against Mago and Asdruball: and that Cn. Cornelius with the other third part of that old armie should joine with the Celtiberians, and warre against Asdruball the Barchine. [sonne of Amilcar above said.] Both these captains with their hosts set out together in their journee, putting the Celtiberians before in the vanguard, & encamped neere the citie Anatorgis in the fight of their enemies, having but the river running betwene. And there Cn. Scipio staid behind, and made his abode with the power afore said: but P. Scipio went onward to performe that part of the warre which he purposed and intended. Asdruball after he perceived that there lay in camp but a small power of Romanes, and that their whole hope relied upon the aids of the Celtiberians; as one that could well skill of the falshood and trecherie of the barbarous people, but especially of all those nations, among whom he had been so long a souldiour: by reason that both camps, as well his owne as the other of the Romanes, were full of Spaniards, hee used by the meanes of reciprocall commerce of their language, for to have secret speech and conference with the principall heads of the Celtiberians, and to treated with them, that in consideration of a great summe of money, they were perswaded and yeelded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romanes the slip. And this they supposed was not so heinous & odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withall to turn their swords upon the Romanes, and to warre against them: againe, they were to have as good pay and wages to sit still, and not to serve, as was sufficient to bind them for to beare armes and fight: and last of all, rest it selfe, and sleeping in a whole skin, together with their returne home to their owne, and the joy and pleasure of visiting their friends, and seeing their goods and lands, were plausible and pleasing inducements to every man. And therefore the captaines themselves were no sooner drawne thereto, than the very multitude. Over and besides, to strike it dead sure, they stood in no feare of the Romanes (being so few as they were) that they could possible keepe them perforce. And surely, this might well serve, to be a Caveat for Roman captaines ever hereafter, and such precedent examples and instances as this, may stand in steed of good lessons indeed, to teach them how they trust again the aids of foreiners; & never to relie themselves so much upon them, but that they alwaies have in their campe the greater part of their owne forces, and the more number of their naturall souldiours. All on a suddaine therefore the Celtiberians dislodged, plucked up standers, and departed from them, and never bad them farwell. And when the Romanes demaunded the cause of this change, yea, & besought and importuned them to carrie, they made them no other answer but this, That they were called and sent for home, by occasion of warres in their owne cuntry. Scipio seeing, that these Allies of his were so slipperie, and could neither be intreated nor enforced to stay: and that himselfe alone without them was not able to make his part good with the enemy: and to joyne againe with his brother, was a thing impossible: for want of all other good meanes, for the present, when he saw no remedie els, determined to retire himselfe as farre backward as he could: having this especiall care above all things, not to encounter and joyne battaile with the enemy in plaine field, without some advantage, who now was passed over the river, and traced him hard at heeles in his dismarch.

About the same time P. Scipio stood in the like termes of feare, but in more danger by the comming of a new enemy, and that was Masaniissa the young Prince, who then was a friend and pensionarie fouldier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mightie and renowned for his amitie with the Romanes. He with his Numidian horsemen first encountred P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night molested and troubled him very shrewdly: in such sort, that not only he would intercept and catch up those that were gone out wandering and straggling farre from the camp, a fuelling or foraging, and send them short of home; but also ride braving even before the camp. Many a time would he venture, yea and enter upon the thickest of the standing corps de guard, and make foule worke and trouble among them. By night also he used oft to make many starts upon a sodaine, and assaile the gates of the camp and the rampier, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romanes at no time, nor in no place could be at rest and quiet for him, but ever in feare and doubt of some shrewd turne or other by him: so as they were driven to keepe within their rampier, cut off from the use of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as besieged: and more straightly yet were they like to be beleaguered, in case Indibilis, who was comming (as the rumor went) with 7500 Suesethanes, were once joyned with the Carthaginians. Whereupon Scipio a warie warrior and prudent Captaine otherwise, driven to these hard extremities, and forced to make shifts, entred into a rash and inconsiderate designement, even to go on and meete (forsooth) Indibilis in the night, and in what place soever it should be his hap to encounter him, there to bid him battaile, and fight with him. Leaving therefore a meane guard to keepe the camp, and T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, as Provost and Captaine, he set out at midnight, and meeting with his enemies, joyned battaile with them: but they skirmished rather by loose companies in their march, than with their united forces in set and pight field. Howbeit, the Romanes had the better hand so much as it was, considering what a confused and disorderly medley there might be. But the Numidian Cavallerie, whom Scipio thought he was secured of, and that they were not aware of him, all on a sodaine flanked the sides of the Romanes, and mightily terrified them. Against these Numidians, whiles Scipio made head againe afresh, behold a third sort of enemies also charged upon his back, even the Carthaginian captaines, who by this time while the other were in fight, had overtaken their allies and were come thither. So as the Romanes were to maintaine battaile on all hands, and were at a stand, and in doubt with themselves against which enemy to turne first, or what way with a close couched squadron to give the venture for to breake through. As the Generall was thus manfully fighting, and encouraging his souldiours, presenting and opposing himselfe forward, where was most need and danger, his chance was to be run through the right side of his bodie with a Lance: and that massive band of the enemies which had charged upon the thicke battailon, which environed their captaine, seeing Scipio falling from his horse readie to dye, in great joy and mirth set up a cheerefull shout, and ran all over the armie, and caried glad tidings that the Romane generall was slaine. This voyce being once spread all abroad, caused both the enemies to take themselves undoubtably for victours, and the Romanes to make no other accompt but they were vanquished. Whereupon they having lost their leader, began forthwith to flye out of the field. But as it was no hard matter for them to make a lane and breake through among the Numidians, and other auxiliarie souldiours lightly armed; so to escape and go cleere away from so many horse, and footmen also, who were as swift on foote as the horsemen, it was almost impossible. Thus they were more in maner slain in their flight now, then in their fight before. And there had not one remained alive, but that the day being far spent already, and toward evening, the night came on apace and overtook them. The Carthaginian captaines, and those also of Affrick, taking the full benefit of this their good fortune, slept not their businesse, nor made delay: but presently after the battaile, scarcely allowing their souldiours so much sleepe as would content nature, marched in great hast toward Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar: making accompt assuredly, that when they had joyned their power with his, they should breake the neck of slaine.

A of this warre, and end it once for all. When they were come to him, great joy and gratulation there was betwene the captaines & the hoasts of both sides, for this fresh victorie newly achieved: and seeing they had already defeated so brave a warrior and great commander, together with his whole armie, they made no doubt but expected certainly to have another hand as good as this.

The newes verily of this so great a foile and overthrow, was not yet come unto the Romanes: but yet they were stricken into a sad dump and deepe silence; and more than that, into a secret presage & fore-determining of some unluckie ridings: as commonly mens minds use to fore-give & tell beforehand, when there is some mischiefe and ill toward them. The Generall himselfe besides that he saw he was abandoned and forsaken of his associates, and knew the forces of the enemies so mightily re-enforced by good conjunctures and guesses, yea and by very reason, was induced to suspect some loss and calamitie received already, rather than inclined to hope after any good successe and happy speed. For thus he discoursed with himselfe: How is it possible that Asdrubal and Mago should bring their armies together without conflict, unlesse my brother be slaine in fight, or have forgotten to be a warrior? how cometh it that he withstood them not, or how hapneth it that my brother followed not hard after them fast upon their backs? At leastwise, if he had not bene able to keepe them asunder, but that both captaines and armies must needs meete and joyne in one, yet he himselfe me thinks, at leastwise would have come by this time to his brother, and brought his owne power to him. In this perplexitie and anguish of spirit, he thought yet, for the present time, that the only good course he could take, was to withdraw himselfe backe from thence as far as he could: and so all that one night unwares to his enemies (who so long only were quiet) he marched a great way, and wone much ground of them. The next morning, so soone as the enemies perceived that the Romanes were dislodged and gone, they sent out the Numidian light horsemen, and began to follow after them apace, and pursued them as fast as possibly they could: and before night the Numidian Cavallerie had overtaken them, and skirmished one while with the taile of their march; another while at their sides and flanks, and gave them no rest: whereat the Romanes made as it were a stand, and began to defend and save their armie as well as they could: yet with great warinesse and regard of securitie, Scipio encouraged them so to fight, as they might march on still and gaine ground, before the Infanterie overtook them. But as one while the armie was on foote, and another while stood still, in long time they rid but a little ground. And Scipio seeing the night draw on apace, reclaimed his souldiours from farther skirmishes: and after he had rallied them together, he retired with them up to a little mount, no sufficient place (God wot) of safe retreat for an armie, especially so troubled & affrighted already, yet higher than any other place all about. There the first thing that he did, was to bestow the baggage and cavallerie in the mids withinforth: and at first the infanterie ranged round about in a ring, made no difficult matter of it to put by the violent charge of the Numidian horsemen. But afterwards when the three Generals marching with three full armies approached, their Captaine Scipio perceiving that he was never able to keepe the place without some fortification, began to cast his eye about, and to bethinke with himselfe, by what meanes possible he might empale himselfe round about as it were with a rampier: but the hill was so naked of wood, and the foile of the ground besides so stonie and craggie, that he could neither finde any underwood fit to cut out stakes for a pallisad, nor earth meete to make turfes for a banke, or minable for a trench: and in one word, all things untoward and unhandsonie for a mound, and to fortifie withall. Neither was there any place there, to speake of, so sleepe and upright, but the enemy might at ease mount up and climbe it. All the hill on every side, had a gentle rising and ascent up to the top. Howbeit, to represent some shew and resemblance yet of a rampier, they were forced to take their packe saddles, with their packes tied fast unto them, and so round about to pile them and raise them to the usuall height of a mure: And where there wanted packe saddles to make up the worke, there they were faine to heape together, all sorts of fardels, trusses, and other carriages, and to put them betwene the enemies and them. The Carthaginian armies when they were come, marched very easily up against the hill. But the new fashion and manner of their defences and fortifications, was very straunge unto them, so as at the first the souldiours marvelled much and were astonished thereat, and stood still. But their captaines on all sides cried out upon them. And why stand yee gaping (say they) so; and do not pull in peeces and plucke away that foolish bable there, good to make sport with?

A very toy, that women & children would scarce stand about thus long: Why? the enemy is taken already in a pincfold, and lieth lurking and hiding himselfe behind the tuffes & other cariages. After this manner (I say) the leaders rated at the souldiours. But it was not so easie a matter, either to get over that barricado of the packes, or to remove and rid them out of the way, as they lay piled close against them; ne yet to unfold and unwrap the packe-saddles, lying overwhelmed as they did, under the packes, and entangled together with them. Thus they were hindered and staied a long time: and when at length they had put this bag and baggage aside that was set in their way, and made passage and entrance for the armed men, and that in divers places; the campe and tents were soone taken on all sides, ere a man could turne about: and so being few to many, and frighted men to late conquerours, no marvell if they were killed & hewne in peeces in every place. Howbeit, many of the souldiours having fled for refuge into the Forrests neere by, escaped into the camp of P. Scipio, whereof T. Fonteius his lieutenant had the charge. As for Cn. Scipio, some write that he was slaine upon that mount, at the first onfet & assault made by the enemies: others report, that with a few others he fled into a towre hard by the campe: and that there was a fire made round about it, and so when the gates thereof were burned, which by no violent meanes otherwise they could breake open, the enemies entred and tooke it, and they within were killed every one, captaine and all.

Thus Cn. Scipio came to his end, in the seventh yeare after that he went into Spaine, and on the nine and twentieth day after that his brother lost his life. Their death was bewailed and lamented no lesse over all Spaine, than at Rome. For among the citizens at home, one part of their sorrow they tooke for the losse of the armies, another part went for the distraction & alienation of the province, and a third againe was spent in the cogitation of the publicke calamitie: but Spaine from one end to the other, mourned onely for their governours and captaines, and had a great misse of them. And Cneius of the twaine, was more bewailed, because he had bene longer time their ruler, and had won the favour and affection of men, and possessed their hearts before the other: and was the first that ever gave them in those parts a prooffe & tast of the Romans just and temperate government.

When the armie was thus defeated and brought to nothing, so as Spaine seemed utterly lost, there arose one man yet, that recovered all againe, and brought the decayed state to the former perfection. There was in the armie one L. Martius, the son of Septimius, a gentleman & knight of Rome, a forward young man, for courage and wit, farre above the degree & condition wherein he was borne. Besides this excellent & most toward disposition of his by nature, he had great helpees by the discipline and instruction of Cn. Scipio: under whom, for so many yeares hee was trained & had learned all militarie knowledge & skill meet for a souldiour. This Martius, what by rallying the dispersed souldiours who were fled, and what by drawing others out of sundrie garisons, had raised and assembled together a reasonable good power, and joyned with T. Fonteius, the Lieutenant afore said of P. Scipio. But the Romane knight, above all others, grew to so great credit and reputation among all the souldiours, that when they had fortified their campe within the river Iberus, & were determined among themselves, to chuse one Generall over the armies, in a solemne assembly of souldiours, even by their owne militarie election: they went one by one in course one after another, unto the maine Corps de guard that defended the rampiar, and to the other wards belonging unto the campe, untill they had all given their voices: and so by generall consent created him their Generall. All the time which they had after, (and that was but small) they employed in fortifying their hold, and conveying thither come and victuals: and what charge soever was imposed by him upon the souldiours, the same they executed readily and willingly, and without any shew that their hearts were dismayed and cast downe any jot at all. But after that newes was brought, that Asdruball the sonne of Gisco, was comming against them, to dispatch cleane the reliques of the warre; that he had passed over Iberus and approached neere: and the soldiers saw once the signall of battell put forth unto them by this new Generall; calling to mind, what noble warriours they had served under but a while before; what worthe leaders they were wont to have, and with how puissant armies they used heretofore to go to the field: they fell a weeping every one, shaking and beating their heads: some lift up and stretched out their hands to heaven, blaming & accusing the gods: others lay along upon the ground, calling everie one upon his owne captaine by speciall name. Neither could their pittious mones & plaints be staied, notwithstanding the Centurions encouraged what they could, the souldiours of their companies

A companies: notwithstanding (I say) that Martius himselfe sometimes spake them faire, sometimes rebuked them, for giving themselves to such foolish and vaine puling, like women: & not rather resolve to raise up their hearts, and with him to quicken and whet their stomaches in defence of themselves and of the common-weale, and not to suffer their former captaines and leaders to lie dead and unrevenged. By this time now all on a suddain, the shout of the enemies was deferred, and the sound of the trumpets were within hearing, being come close under the rampiar. Whereupon all at once, turning their sorrow and weeping into anger & indignation, they ranne every man to his armour and weapon: and as if they had bene horne mad, they hastned from all parts to the gates and entrees of the campe, & charged upon the enemies as they came carelessly and without order and array. Immediately this unexpected and suddaine object, strooke an exceeding feare into the Carthaginians: as wondring from whence so many enemies should start up so soone, considering the armies were so lately cleane in manner destroyed; and how it came to passe, that being newly vanquished and put to flight, they should be so stout, so bold and confident of their own selves; who a gods name, should be their Generall, after the two Scipios were slaine; what captaine and governour had they over the campe; and who gave out the signal of battaile: mervelling (I say) at these premiffes, and so many particulars, that they once imagined not afore, at first hand they wist not what to doe, but as amazed men, began to give ground and recule; but afterwards, being still fiercely followed upon with a violent charge, they were plainly beaten backe and put to flight. And verily, either there had bene a foule havocke and slaughter of them that fled, or a rash and dangerous enterprise for them who would have followed the chase: but that Martius hastened to found the retreat, and opposing himselfe against the foremost ensignes of the vanguard, yea and taking hold of some of them himselfe, staied the maine battaile & repressed their violence, who were upon the point already to pursue them with heat. And so he reduced them back againe into the campe, as greedie as they were still of murder, & thirstie of bloodshed. The Carthaginians, who at the first were driven from the rampiar, and for feare hastned away; after that they saw none to follow them, supposed they had bene afraid, and therefore staied still: whereupon they departed to their camp again in reckless manner, faire and softly. And as carelesse as they were in their retire thither, so negligent were they in guarding the same: for although their enemies were neere, yet they remembered and thought againe, that they were but the taile and reliques of two armies, vanquished & defeated a few daies before. Vpon this resolute perswasion of theirs, and base conceit of the enemies, they were very negligent every way within their campe: whereof Martius having by his espiall, certaine intelligence, resolved upon a designment, which at the first sight seemed more like a project of hazard, than an enterprise of hardinesse; and it was no more, but even upon a braverie to set upon the enemy in his owne campe, and give him a camifado. For as he thought it an easier enterprise, to force the hold and pavilions of Asdruball, being but one, than to defend and keep his owne, in case three armies and three captaines should joyne againe together: so hee considered withall, that either if he sped well in this exploit, he should restore and set upright againe unto the Romanes, the decayed and prostrate state of Spaine: or if he were discomfited and put backe, yet by giving the adventure first upon the enemies, he should not be altogether contemned, and of no reputation. But least this attempt so suddaine, and the terror and error which may fall out in the night-time, should happen to trouble this his designed plot, & the course of his good fortune; he thought it not amisse, to make a speech unto his soldiers, and to exhort & encourage them alone hand. And therefore calling them together to a generall audience, in this manner hee discoursed unto them of his intent and purpose.

My valourous and loiall souldiours, either the reverence and affectionate love of mine, toward our cheefe captaines during their life; and after their death; or the very present condition and state wherein we all now stand; may be a sufficient testimonie and prooffe to any man who so ever, that this charge and government of mine, as it is in regard of your judgement of me right honourable, so it is in truth, and in very deed, to me most weightie, and full of care and trouble. For at what time as (but that feare tooke away all sence of sorrow) I was not so much maister of myselfe, as to seeke out and find some comfort and solace for mine owne pensive soule and heavie spirit; I was forced being but one, (which is a most hard matter for a man to doe in time of greefe) to minister consolation unto the common misfortune and calamitie of you all. And surely I have no list at all (the harder is my case) to avert my mind from continuall greefe of heart,

not so much as even then, when as I am to studie and devise, by what means I may be able to preserve (for the behoofe of my countrie) these small remnants of two armies. For why? the grievous and bitter remembrance of calamities past, is ever before me. The two Scipions trouble mee all the day time with carefull thoughts, they disquiet me in the night season with fearfull dreams, they make mee oftentimes to start out of my sleepe, willing and charging mee, to suffer neither them nor their souldiours (who were your fellows and companions, and for the space of eight yeeres in those parts where they served, never received foile) ne yet the Commonwealth, to continue unrevenge; warning me withall, to follow their discipline, their precepts, rules, and good instructions. And like as, whiles they lived here among us, there was no man more obedient than my selfe to their directions and commaundements; even so after their decease, whatsoever in my conceit, I judge they would have had especially done in all occurrences, the same my desire is, that you also (my souldiours) would like of and approve for the very best. I would not have you to weepe, waile, and lament still for them, as if they were extinct and gone for ever, (for they live still, and shall, so long as the world endureth, and continue immortall in renowne and fame of their worthie and noble acts) but rather so often as you remember and thinke of them, to go like hardie and valiant men to a field, even as if you heard them speaking unto you, or saw them giving out the signall of battell. Neither was it (I assure you) any other object but that, presented yesterday unto your eies and minds, which effected so memorable a peece of service as it was: by which ye have made good proofe unto your enemies, and given them to understand, that the Roman name died not together with the Scipios; and that the vigour and vertue of that people which was not extinct and buried, by the overthrow at Cannæ, will ever rise againe (ye may be sure) out of all adversities, let cruell fortune storme and rage as much as ever she can. And now, since yee have shewed such valour and hardinesse alreadie of your owne accord, I have a mind, and would gladly see, how bravely yee will beare your selves upon the direction and commaundement of your capitaine. For yesterday, when I sounded the retreat unto you, at what time as you followed so freely upon the enemy, being troubled and disarraid; my desire and meaning was not, to repress and abate your bold courage, but to deferre and reserve it against some greater opportunitie of advantage, and for a more honourable and glorious exploit: that anon upon the first occasion, you being prepared and provided, might surprise them at unwares, & not standing upon their guard; armed and well appointed, assaile them disarmed and naked; & that which more is, whiles they are in their beds fast and sound asleepe. And the hope that I conceive of this good opportunitie and effect thereof (my souldiours) ariseth not upon some fantasticall imagination of mine owne braine, by hap-hazard and upon vain presumption, but grounded upon good reason and present experience. For verily, if a man should demaund even of you your own selves, What the reason was, that being but few in number, & lately discomfited, ye were able to defend your campe, against many more than your selves, and those heartened with fresh victories; yee would make no other answer but this, That you, fearing that which followed, had both fortified your campe in every respect with strong munitions, and were your selves well appointed and furnished, yea, & readie to receive them whensoever they came. And certes, so it is, & we find it true by experience. Men are least sure and secured against that which fortune saith is fearelesse, and need not to be prevented, because that which wee neglect, is evermore open and exposed to all dangers. Now the enemies doubt nothing lesse at this time, than that we, who were so lately our selves besieged and assailed by them, will now come to give an assault upon them in their hold. Let us adventure to doe that which no man would beleieve that ever wee durst enterprise, and the selfsame cause which seemeth to make the thing most difficult, shall effect it sone of all others. At the change of the third watch I will lead you forth without any noise at all in great silence. Well informed and assured I am, that in their campe the Sentinels are not relieved in due course & order, neither yet the ordinarie corps de guard kept as they ought to be. Your shout and outcrie shall not so soone be heard at the gates, nor your first charge and assault given, but yee shall surely be maisters of the campe. Then let me see you performe that carnage and execution among them heave and dead asleepe, affrighted with an unexpected arme, and taken on a suddain unarmed, and in their beds; from which yesterday ye thought much, that ye were called away and reclaimed, I wote well, that this seemeth unto you an audacious enterprise, and full of hazard, but when things go crosse & stand in doubtfull termes, & when other means faile, the hardiest attempts, yea, & the most venterous and desperat courses, are ever safest and speed best.

For

A For if a man stay never so little at the very instant when a thing is to be done (whereof the opportunitie passeth and flieth away ere one would thinke) immediatly when it is once gone, he may fling his cap after well enough, and complaine thereof and say, had I wist, but never the neerer. One armie they have hard at hand, and two more are not farre off: now if we venture of them here, our opportunitie and advantage is as good as theirs. And once alreadie ye have made triall of their forces and your owne: put we it off another day, contenting our selves with the bare name of yesterdaies fallie, and give over so, it will be great doubt and danger, least all the Generals with all their armies be rallied and re-united. And shall we then be able to hold our owne against three Generals and three hostes, whom Cn. Scipio having about him his whole puissance, fresh and in good plight, could not withstand nor abide? Our Capitaines by dividing their forces, and dismembriing one complete armie, were defeated and overthrowne: semblable may our enemies, parted while they be, & severed asunder, be discomfited & brought to nought. Lo, this is the only way for us to warre, and none other. And therefore let us wait no longer than the commodious opportunitie of the next night. Goe ye then a gods blessing, make much of your selves, take your repast and repose, that yee may be fresh and lustie, to breake into your enemies hold with the same resolute courage, wherewith erewhile yee defended your owne. The souldiours, as they gladly gave eare to this new counsell, of their new capitaine, so, the more audacious and adventurous that it was, the better it pleased them. The rest of the day behind, they spent in froishing and making readie their harnes and weapons, and in cherishing their bodies, yea, and the better part of the night they slept quietly. And so at the releefe of the fourth watch they set forward.

Now were there other companies also of Carthaginians, beyond this next camp above said, about sixe miles distant from thence. A hollow way and valey there lay betwene, standing thick of trees. In the midst of this wood, for a furlong space well neere, he bestowed closely a cohort of footmen, yea, and certaine horsemen of Romanes: but by his leave, this was but a craftie and slye trick, borrowed of the Carthaginians. Thus the mid way being intercepted and taken up, the rest of the forces were conducted in a still march toward the enemies in the next campe. And finding no guards before the gates, no Sentinels upon the rampier, they entered in as it had been into their owne hold, and no man made resistance: then they sounded trumpets, & gave the alarme. Some fell to killing of the enemies halfe asleepe, others sling drie litter & straw for to kindle fire, upon their hailes & pavillions; other some again keep the gates, that none should issue forth. So the fire, the outcrie, and massacre all together, put them out of their right wits, & made them, as it were, besides themselves; that neither hear they could, nor yet make any shift for themselves. Unarmed and naked men fell among the bands of armed souldiours. Some run in haft to the gates, others finding the waies and passages beset, run up to the rampier: and looke as any escaped and gat away from thence by that means, hee flieth streightwaies directly toward the other campe. Where they were caught up by the cohort of footmen, and the cornet of horsemen, which rose up suddainly out of their Ambuscado: & being enclosed on every side, were killed to the last man. And yet, if it had been any ones good hap to have escaped from thence with life, so swiftly and with so great expedition, the Romans after they had gotten the neerer campe, sped themselves to the other, that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring newes of the desicure. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and because some also a little before day were slipt away a foraging, fuelling, and boot-haling, the Romanes found every thing more loose and out of order, than in the other campe. Their weapons onely stood reared up in their corps de guard, the souldiours themselves were unarmed, either sitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and downe before the gates, and under the rampier. With these souldiours so secure, so retchlesse, so disarmed and disordered (the Romanes being yet in their hote blood, and not cooled upon their fresh massacre, and more than that, lustie and brag for their new victorie) began to make a fray, and to skirmish. But the Carthaginians were not able to keepe them out of the gates. And so within the campe there was a hote and cruell fight: for, from all parts thereof, they ran together upon the first alarme that arose in the very beginning of the tumult and skuffling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romanes bucklers and targuets scene all bloudie, were a sample unto the Carthaginians of a former execution; and thereupon drave them into a mightie feare. This fearefull sight, caused them all to turne backe and take their heeles: and thus as many of them as escaped killing, gat out by heapes wherefoever they could make shift to finde way, and were cleane turned out of their campe and all that they had. So in the compasse of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Marius, there were two encamped houlds forced and woon from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies slaine, saith Claudius, who translated the Annales of Acilius out of the Greeke tongue into the Latin, and 1830 taken prisoners, besides the gaine of a mightie rich bootie. In which pillage, there was found a shield of silver weighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Asdrubal the Barchine. Valerius Antias recordeth, that the campe only of Mago was taken, and seven thousand men slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal upon a fally forth, there died ten thousand, and 4330 were taken prisoners. Piso writeth, that when Mago followed after our men in an hore and disorderly chase (for they seemed to give back and recule) there were five thousand men killed by the traine of an ambush. But all writers do blazon the great honor and fame of Duke Marius. And besides the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speake of some miracles: namely, that as he made the oration unto his souldiours, there was seene a flaming fire burning from his head, without any sense and feeling of his, to the great wonder and feare of the souldiours that stood about him: and that in memoriall of this brave victorie over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Iup. untill the Capitoll was burned, that foresaid sheeld, with the image of Asdrubal, and it was called Marius his sheeld. After this, Spaine was quiet for a long time, whiles both sides after so many overthrowes given and taken betwene them, were loth to hazard the maine chaunce in one battaile.

In the time that these affaires passed in Spaine, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracusa, having set all other things in order throughout Sicilie, with such faithfulness and upright integrity, that not only he greatly augmented his owne glorie, but also enlarged the majestie of the people of Rome, brought over to Rome all the goodly and beautifull ornaments of that cite, their graven and molten images, their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great store in Syracose. These braveries (no doubt) at the first were no more but the spoiles of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of warre and conquest. But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Artificians: and from hence came afterwards our licentiousnesse and outrage in spoiling and robbing, so commonly and ordinarily, all sacred and profane places, where these things were to be had: which staid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Romaine gods themselves, and to that very first temple which by Marcellus was beautified and adorned principally above the rest. For strangers and forcin travellers used in pilgrimage to visit the temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and singular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be seene.

Now from all cities wellneere of Sicilie, there resorted Embassies unto him: as their causes were divers and unlike, so their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Syracuse, had either not rebelled at all, or became reconciled and in favour againe, they were accepted in the qualitie of faithfull allies, and made much of: those who for feare after the losse of Saracose, yielded, were reputed as conquered, and received lawes and conditions at the wil and pleasure of the conquerour. There remained yet no small reliques of warre about Agrigentum for the Romanes to dispatch, namely Epicides and Hanno, the captaines of the former war: and a third, sent new from Annibal in the roume of Hippocrates, a citizen of Hippon (his countrymen name him Mutines) defended from the Libyphenices, a man of Action, and one who under Annibal had bene brought up, and taught all seates of armes, and skill of warfare. Vnto his charge were committed by Epicides and Hanno the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he overran all the countries belonging to the enemies: he went unto all the confederates, and so wrought with them to continue fast in their allegiance, and to send aides to every one in due time accordingly: in such sort, that within short time he got himselfe a great name throughout all Sicilie, so as the favorites and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any, than in him. And therefore both Captaines, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicides the Syracusan, who for a time had bene pent up within the walls of Agrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelitie as policie of Mutines, boldly adventured to come forth of the walls of Agrigentum, and upon the river Himera encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power, and sat him downe encamped, almost foure miles

A miles from the enimie, minding to wait and expect, what they did or went about. But Mutines gave him neither opportunitie of place to rest him long, nor respite of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terror, and tumultuous noyse assailed the standing guards of his enemies: yea and the morrow after gave them battaile as it were in a pight field, and drave them within their holds and fortifications. But being called from thence by occasion of a mutinie of Numidians within the campe (who to the number almost of three hundred, were departed to Heraclea Minoa) he went to appease their moods, and to reclaime them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the captaines (by report) a great charge and expresse warning, not to fight with the enimie, howsoever they did, in his absence. But both the captaines were greatly offended thereat, and Hanno especially, who was already mal-content, and repined at his glory: What? saith he, thinketh Mutines, a base Affricane, and not of the right stamp neither, to gage and rule me a Carthaginian General, sent with Commission from the Senate and people? He perswaded therefore Epicides effectually to passe over the river, and to strike a battaile: for, quoth he, if we should stay for him, and then happen to have a fortunate day of it and win the victorie, all the honor no doubt shall redound to Mutines.

Be yee sure, Marcellus thought this a great indignitie, that hee who had repulsed at Nola Annibal, even when he bare himselfe so brauely upon his fresh victorie at Cannæ, should give one foot to these pettie enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land: whereupon hee commaunded his souldiours to arme in all hast, and to bring forth the standards and ensignes. But as he was arranging his men in battel aray, there came riding unto him all on the spur, with bridle on the horse necke, ten Numidians from out of the armie of the enemies, with these tidings & intelligences, assuring them, That their countriemen, who first were offended and discontented by occasion of that mutinie aforesaid, wherein three hundred of their companie departed and went away to Heraclea: and then afterwards, because they saw their owne head and leader, by the practise of those other captaines, who maligned and envied his glorie, sent farre enough out of the way, even against the very day when the battaile should bee fought; were not disposed at all to fight, but would sit still and not stirre. A kind of people these were, deceitfull otherwise, & used to break promise; howbeit now, they were just & true of their word. Vpon this, as the Romanes tooke better heart unto them, (for there was a speedie pursuivant or courier sent throughout the battalions, from companie to companie, for to signifie unto them, that the enimie was disappointed and abandoned of his cavallerie, whom they feared most of all other) so the enemies were mightily dismaied and put in feare: for over and besides, that they had no helpe from them who were the greatest strength of their armie, they were in a deepe feare least their owne horsemen would set upon them. By which occasion, the conflict was not great, for at the first shout and shooke given, well it was seene which way the game would go, and the matter was soone determined. The Numidians, who at the first encounter and during the conflict, had stood quiet in both points of the battaile, seeing their owne fellowes turne backe and flie, bare them onely companie for a while as they fled: but after that they perceived them all, to make hast for feare, to Agrigentum: feareing also themselves, there to be besieged among them, slip away every one to their owne citties. Many thousands were there slaine and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicilie: upon this victorie he returned to Syracuse. By this time now, was the yeare almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Senate decreed, that P. Cornelius the Pretour, should send letters to the Consuls, lying before Capua, purporting this tenor: That for as much as Annibal was farre from them, and no great matter of consequence like to bee performed the while at Capua; the one of them (if they thought so good) should repaire to Rome, for to create new magistrates in the roume of the old. The Consuls having received the letters, agreed betwene themselves and tooke order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the soleme election of magistrates: and Fulvius remaine still at Capua. So Claudius created new Coss. Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpitius Galba the sonne of Servius: a man that had not borne any curule office of state before. After these, were Pretours chosen, L. Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpitius, C. Calpurnius Piso. Vnto Piso befall the jurisdiction within the cite. Sulpitius had the government of the province Sicilie. Cethegus, of Apulia: and Lentulus, of Sardinia. The Consuls had the government of their provinces prorogued for to continue one yeare longer.

THE XXVI. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the fixe and twentieth Booke.

ANNIBALL encamped himselfe at three myles end from Rome east upon the river Anio. Himselfe in person accompanied with two thousand men of armes, rode to the gate Capua, for to view the site of the cittie. And notwithstanding that for three daies space, the armies of both sides were come into the field ready embattailed, yet they never joyned in conflict, by reason of the tempestuous and stormie weather: But ever as they were returned again into their campe, presently it proved faire. Capua was won by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius the pro-Consuls. The Nobles & principall citizens of Capua poisoned themselves. When as their Senators stood bound to stakes (for to be whipped) and then to lose their heads, there came letters from the Senate of Rome unto the pro-Consull Q. Fulvius, with direction to spare their lives: but before that he would read them, he put them up into his bysome, and willed the ministers or executioners, to let the law have the course, and to do their office, and so he went through with the execution. It happened that in a solemn assembly of the people, there was much debate and question, who should governe as L. Deputie the province of Spaine: and when no man was willing to undertake that charge, P. Scipio, the sonne of that Publius who was slaine in Spaine, made offer to go that voyage, and by the voices generally of the people, and with one accord of all, he was thither sent. In one day hee assaulted and also forced New Carthage, being a young man, not fully 24. yeare old. And there went an opinion of him, that hee was descended of some heavenly race: both for that himselfe, after he was come to severenteen yeares of age, and bad put on his manly robe, conversed within the Capitull, and also because there was a snake or serpent sene oftentimes in his mothers bedchamber. This booke containeth besides the affaires in Sicilie: the amitie concluded with the Aetolians: and the war against the Acenonians and Philip king of the Macedonians.

CNEWS Fulvius Centimalus and P. Sulpitius Galba the Consuls, when they had entred into their magistracie upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senators into the Capitoll, where they consulted with the LL. about the state of the common-weale, concerning the administration of the warres, and attending the provinces and the armies. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius, the Consuls of the former yeare, continued still their rule and full command, with the charge of the same forces which they had before under their hands. And over and besides, they were expressly commanded, not to depart from Capua (before which they lay at siege) until they had forced and won the cittie. For at that time, the Romanes among all their other affairs, were most amused upon it: not so much for anger and malice, (whereof they had never against any one citie greater and juster cause) as in this regard, that being a state so noble and mightie, like as by revolting first it had drawne and induced certaine other cities to do the same: so if it were recovered & regained, like it was to reduce their affections againe, to looke backe and returne unto their old allegiance and obedience to their wonted ignorance of Rome. The Pretours also of the former yeare, M. Junius in Tuskane, and P. Sempronius in Gaule, continued in their places of regiment, with two legions a peece under their conduct, the same which they had before. And so M. Marcellus remained as pro-Consull behind in Sicilie, for to finish & dispatch the reliques of the warre there, with the power of that armie which he had alreadie: and had commission (if need were of new supplie) to make up the number of his companies, out of those legions which were commaunded by P. Cornelius the Viz-pretour in Sicilie: provided alwaies, that he chose no souldiour

A souldiour out of those bands, unto whom the Senate had flatly denied, either licence to bee discharged, or passport to returne home into their countrie, before the warre was fully ended. Unto C. Sulpitius, whose lot it was to governe the province of Sicilie, were assigned those two legions, which P. Cornelius had before: with a fresh supplie out of the armie of Cneus Fulvius, which the last yeare was shamefully defeated, beaten, and put to flight in Apulia. These souldiours, all the sort of them, had the same limitation of service and no other, appointed and set downe by the Senate, as those former who remained after the overthrow at Cannæ. And this disgrace they had besides, as well the one companie as the other, That they might not winter within any towne, nor build them any standing campe for wintering harbours, within tenne miles of a citie. L. Cornelius the lord Deputie in Sardinia, was allowed to have the conduct of those two legions, which were under the leading of Q. Mutius. And order was given unto the Consuls, to levie and enroll a new supplie thereto, if need required. T. Octavius and M. Valerius were appointed to guard and defend all the sea coasts of Sicilie and Greece, with the helpe of those Legions and Armadoes which they had alreadie. The Greekes had fiftie saile in their fleet, and were manned with one Legion. The Sicilians had one hundred ships, and two legions to furnish them. So that in this yeere the Romanes mainteined three and twentie legions, to wage war both by sea and land.

In the beginning of the yeere, when the letters of L. Martius were read and scanned in the Senat house, the LL. there assembled, liked well of the contents, and spake highly in the praise of his worthie acts: but many of them were offended at the superscription, because hee tooke upon him the honourable title of a Propretour in his stile, and wrote thus [L. Martius the Propretour, to the Senate:] considering, that his commaund was neither graunted by the people, nor allowed and confirmed by the Senate. An ill precedent (say they) it is, and of bad consequence, that Generals of the field should be chosen by armies, and that the solemnitie of Elections, so devoutly begun in the name of the gods, and with the religious observation of the Bird-flight, should now be transferred into the campees and provinces farre from lawes and magistrates, and committed to the inconsiderate wils of rash affectionate souldiours. And when some there in place, were of opinion, that the matter should be put in question at the counsell table, it was thought better to deferre that consultation, until those gentlemen of service, that brought the letters from Martius, were gone and departed. As concerning come and appaerell for the armie, they agreed to write backe unto him, that the Senat would take order and provide for both: but they would not allow in any cause to give him this addition, and to write [To Martius the Propretour] least that they might seeme to approve the very same thing by their prejudice and dome aforehand, which they had left for to be decided and determined afterwards. When the Gentlemen afore said had their dispatch, and were dismissed, the first thing that the Consuls propounded, was it, and no other: and generally they jumped in this one point, for to deale with the Tribunes of the people, that with all speed possible they would move the Commons, and propound unto them, for to know, who their will and pleasure was, should be sent L. Deputie into Spaine, for to have the government of that armie, whereof Cn. Scipio, L. Generall, had the conduct.

This matter, I say, was treated of with the Tribunes, & a bill preferred thereof unto the Commons: but there was another greater contention in teames, that had possessed their minds alreadie. For C. Sempronius Blesus, had commensed a criminall action against Cn. Fulvius, accusing him for the losse of the armie in Apulia, and ceased not in all the assemblies of the people, to make invectives against him, charging him, That being captain General, through his much folie, ignorance & rashnes, he had brought his armie into a place of danger: reproving him moreover, and saying, That never any capitaine but Cn. Fulvius, had corrupted, marred, and infected his legions with all kind of vices, before that he betrayed them to the enemies: in such wise, that it might be well and truly said, that they were altogether spoiled and defeated, before they had a fight of their enemies: and were not vanquished by Anniball, but by their owne Colonell and Commaunder. See (quoth he) the disorder that is in Elections, and how no man, when hee is to give his voice, doth wel weigh and consider, who it is that he chuseth a Generall, and unto whom hee committeth the charge of an armie. Behold the difference betwene Cneus Fulvius, and T. Sempronius. This man having the leading of an armie of bondslaves, by discipline, good order and government, within short time brought his souldiours to that good passe, that there was not one of them all throughout the armie, remembered and regarded how basely he was borne, and and of what parentage descended, but all in generall bare themselves so, that they were to their friends a sure defence, & to their enemies a fearefull terror: and after that he had recovered them at Beneventum, and other cities, (as it were, out of the chaws of Anniball) he restored and delivered them safe & sound to the people of Rome. Whereas contrariwise, Cn. Fulvius having received an armie of Roman citizens, well and worshipfully borne, liberally and honestly brought up, had taught them servile vices fit for slaves, and so trained them, that with their friends and allies they were stout, proud, and unruly; and among their enemies were cowards & very dastards: & so far short they were to bear off the violence of the Carthaginians, that they were not able to abide so much as their first crie and shout. And no mervaille I assure you, that the soldiers could not stick to it in the battaile, and hold out manfully; when the Generall himselfe was the first that ran away beastly. I rather wonder at it, that any of them stood to it and died in the field, and were not all of them as fearefull as Cn. Fulvius, and tooke not his heeles with him for companie. Yet, C. Flaminius, L. Paulus, L. Posthumus, both Scipions, as well Cn. as Pub. chose rather to loose their lives in battaile, than to forsake their armies when they were environned round with enemies. But Cn. Fulvius, hee was in manner the onely man that returned to Rome with newes of the armie defeated and overthrowen. Now verily, a great indignitie it is, and a shamefull manner of proceeding, that the residue of the armie, after the overthrow at Cannæ, because they fled out of the field, were confined & transported over into Sicilie, with expresse condition, not to returne againe from thence, before that the enemy were clean gone and departed out of Italie; & that the very same rigorous and heavey decree passed likewise, and was executed against the Legions of Cn. Fulvius; and Cn. Fulvius himselfe, who fled out of that battell, which was through his owne folly and rashnesse begun, should goe away cleare, and escape without all punishment: that himselfe, I say, should lead his old age in taverns, stews, & brothel-houses, where alredie he hath spent his youth; full daies; while his poore fouldiours (who have faulted in nothing, but that they were like unto their captaine) be sent far ynough off, and packed away (as it were) into exile, and endure shamefull and ignominious fouldierie. Lo, how unequally at Rome the freedome of the citie is parted betwene the rich and the poore; betwene men of nobilitie and high calling, and those that are of mean parentage and low decree.

Cn. Fulvius

Thus much spake the plaintife C. Sempronius Blasus. The defendant on the other side, shifted all the blame from himselfe, and laid the whole fault upon his fouldiours, alleadging & pleading thus, That when they called upon him hastily, and with great wilfulness for to give battaile, hee brought them forth into the field, not on that day which they would themselves (for it was late in the evening) but the morrow after, when both time and place were meet and convenient for the purpose: and notwithstanding they were well appointed and orderly embattaile, yet were they not able to sustaine, either the fame, or the furie of the enemies, I know not whether. And when they all fled away amaine, he also was carried away in the throng of the rout: like as Varro the Consul, at the battell before Cannæ, and as many other Generals elsewhere. And what good could hee have done to the Commonweale, in case hee had staid behind alone? unless peradventure his death might have cured and remedied the publicke sores and maladies, or made amends for the common losses. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that hee light at unwares upon places of disadvantage and daunger; ne yet, because hee was entrapped within the traines of an ambush, marching on end forward, without sending his espials before, that hee was overcome; but even by fine force, by dint of sword, in open field, and in a pight battell. And it was not he could doe withall, if his owne men were fearefull and timorous, & the enemies hardie and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts. It is long of every one his owne nature to be either bold or heartlesse.

Two severall daies was he judicially accused, & at both times a fine of monie only set upon his head, in case the matter should go against him. At the third Session the witnesses were produced forth, to be deposed and give evidence: and after that he had bene shamefully reviled, and charged with all manner of reproches, there were very many upon their oth restified, That the first beginning of the fright and flight both, was occasioned by the Pretour himselfe: and that the fouldiours seeing themselves forsaken by him, and supposing verily that their captaine and leader was not afraid of his owne shadow, but had great reason to feare, they likewise turned their backs and fled. Vpon which evidence, the whole Court was so incensed against him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commense a capitall action, for that he was worthie to dye.

Whereupon

Whereupon arose a new debate and controversie: for whereas the Tribune had twise before laid a penall action upon him of monie, and now at the third time said that he would have a jurie of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigate this rigor of the Tribune. But when those his colleagues made answer againe and said, that they would not oppose themselves nor hinder his course, but that hee might proceed in the suite at his owne good pleasure, more maiorum, i. [according to the auncient manner used by their forefathers,] either by order of law, or rule of custome, and bring him being but a private person, to the triall either of a capitall crime, or penall trespass: then Sempronius spake and said flatly, that he laid upon him a criminall action of treason against the State; and requested of C. Calpurnius the L. chiefe Iustice of the citie, for to have a day of hearing and judiciall triall by the people. Then the defendant cast about to help himselfe by another remedie, namely, in case he could compasse that Q. Fulvius his brother, might possibly be present at the Session when he should be judged: who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that went on him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like presently to be maister of Capua. But when this said Q. Fulvius had requested so much by his letters, ended to that purpose as effectually as he could devise, and to move commiseration and pitie in behalfe of the life of his brother, the LL. of the Senate returned this answer unto him againe, That it was not for the good of the State that he should depart from Capua: thereupon, before the Sessions day was come, Cn. Fulvius departed of his owne accord into exile to Tarquinij, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that banishment of his to be a just, due, and sufficient punishment for his offence.

During these busineses at Rome, the whole strength and force of warre was bent against Capua, and yet the citie was rather streightly beleaguered, than forcibly assaulted; in so much as neither the servants or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the famine any longer: and send unto Anniball any messengers, they possibly could not, by reason of the streight watch and ward that the Romans kept, so neere one unto the other. At length there was a certaine Numidian offered to go and to escape cleere away, who having taken letters unto Anniball to put him in mind to be as good as his promise, departed in the night, and passed through the mids of the Romane camp, and put the Campanes in very good hope, to issue forth at all the gates, and to make a sally upon the enemy, whiles their power and strength served them. And verily in many scufflings and skirmishes which they made, they got the better for the most part in horsfright: but lightly their footmen had ever the worse. The Romans for their parts were nothing so much pleased when they had the upperhand at any time, as they were discontented and ill apaid, to receive a foile in any kind of service of them; who were not onely besieged, but in manner overcome already and conquered. So they devised a means in the end, to make up and supply by industrie and policie the defect they had in strength and force. They chose out of all the Legions certaine lustie young men, such as for cleane strength of bodie, and lightnes withall, were most nimble and swift. These had every one of them, a light buckler or target, shorter than commonly horsemen have, and seven javelins or darts apeece, foure foot long, with yron heads at one end, like as those javelins have, which they use to launce that are lightly armed, and begin skirmishes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horsebacke, & used them, both to sit the horse and ride, and also to leape downe on foot, with great delivernesse and agilitie, at the signall and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practise and exercise, they were able to doe it nimble ynough, and without feare, they advanced forth into the plaine, lying betwene their campe, and the wall of the citie, & affronted the horsemen of the Campanes as they stood arraunged in battell array: and so soone as they were come within a darts cast, the light javelottiers afore said, dismounted from their horses, at a signe given them: and behold, all of a suddaine, out of the Cavallerie there was a battaillon of footmen arraunged, who charged the men of armes of the enemies, and let flie their shot with great force, dart after dart, which they launced so thicke, that they gauled many a horse, and wounded also many horsemen. Howbeit, their feare was much greater, by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of fight. The Romane horsemen seeing their enemies thus affrighted, set too hard, and charged upon them lustily, chased them and beat them downe even to the citie gates. After this, the Romans were the better in horse-service also. And hereupon began the manner from thenceforth, to entertaine such light armed javelottiers called Velites, even among the Legions. The first deviser of this mingling mingling of footemen among the horsemen they say was one Q. Navius a Centurion, and that G he was highly honored by the Generall for his invention.

Whiles things stood thus at Capua, Anniball was greatly distracted in mind, and possessed with two contrary cogitations, whether he should go to gaine the Castle of Tarentum, or to reskue and save the citie of Capua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way; as being a citie like to give the very triall and prooffe, what would the issue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romanes. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his cariage in the Brutians country, and all his souldiours heavily armed, he made hast into Campania, with an elect power of foote and horse, such as he supposed most meet and best appointed for expedition and riddance of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him three and thirtie Elephants, and so he sat him downe closely in a secret valley behind the mountaine Tiffata, which overlooketh the citie Capua. At his first comming he forced the fort called Galatia, and compelled the garison there to quit the place, and then he turned & opposed himselfe against the enemies who besieged Capua. But he dispatched certaine courriers afore unto Capua, to signifie unto them, at what time he minded to set upon the camp of the Romanes: that they also at the very instant might be ready to issue forth at every gate of the citie to do the like. The Romanes having no foreknowledge by their espials of this occurrence, were mightily terrified: for Anniball himselfe assailed them one way, and all the Campanes as well foote as horsemen (together with the garison souldiours of the Carthaginians under the leading of Boflar and Hanno their captaines) sallied out another way. The Romanes therefore being driven to their shifts, as well as they might in so sodain and fearefull a case, had an eye to this, not to make head all together one way, and so to leave the rest quite without defence; therefore they divided their forces in this manner among themselves: Appius Claudius opposed himselfe against the Campanes: and Fulvius against Anniball. Claudius Nero the Viz-Pretour, with the horsemen belonging to the sixth legion, quartered upon the way that leadeth to Sueffula: and C. Fulvius Flaccus the Lieutenant, with the horsemen of Allies, tooke up his standing, and planted himselfe over-against the river Vultumus. The battaile began not after the usuall manner, only with shouts and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men, neighing of horses, and rustling of armour, there was a multitude of Campanes good for no other service of war, placed upon the walls, who together with ringing and sounding of basons and vessels of brasse (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moone is in the eclipse) made such an hideous noyse, that it caused even them that were in fight to be amused thereupon, and to listen after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campanes from the trench and rampiar. But Fulvius on the other part had more trouble to deale with Anniball and the Carthaginians, who charged so fiercely upon him, that the sixth legion there, gave ground and recoiled: which being once beaten back, a squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants passed forwards as far as to the rampiar, and had already broken through the maine battaile of the Romanes: but they were in suspence betweene doubtfull hope and present danger, thinking one while to breake through and passe into the camp; and doubting another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. Fulvius seeing this feare of the legion, and peril wherein the camp stood, encouraged and exhorted Q. Navius and other principall Centurions, to assaile valiantly, to kill and hew in peeces that one companie of the enemies which were fighting under the counter-scarp. For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extreame hazard: for either you must give the enemies way, and then wil they more easily enter into the camp, then they had already perced through the thick squadrons of the battaile; or els ye must disscate and slay them in the place, even under the trench. And that (quoth he) were no difficult peece of service, considering they are but few in number, severed and shut out cleane from the succour of their fellows: and the same Romane battailon which seemeth now disbanded and open, whiles it is affrighted, if so be it would make head and turne both sides upon the enemy, were able to compasse round and environ them, and put them to a doubtfull hazard, yea and cut them in peeces within the mids. Navius had no sooner heard the Generall speake these words, but he caught the ensigne of the second band of Hastati from the ensigne-bearer, and desplayed it in the faces of the enemies, threatening to sling it among the mids of them, unless his souldiers made the better hast to follow him, and settle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of bodie, his brave

A brave annour besides set him out and beautified his person: and withall, the advancing of his ensigne on high, drew every mans eyes upon him, as well enemies as friends. But when he was approached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, but launced at him their barbed javelins, and the whole battaile in manner was bent only against him. But neither the multitude of enemies, nor the voley of their shot, was able to repressle and rebut the violence of that one man. Likewise M. Atilius a Lieutenant, caused the ensigne-bearer of the first band of the Principes belonging to the same legion, to enter with his ensigne upon the cohort and troupe of the Spaniards. The Lieutenants also L. Porcius Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the garding of the camp, fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elephants upon the very countrescarp, as they were passing over and entering the camp.

B And by occasion that their bodies filled up the ditch, the enemies had a passage made them into the camp, as it were over a causey or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there, over the very carcases of the slaine Elephants, there was a cruell carnage committed. But on the other side of the camp, the Campanes and the garison of the Carthaginians had the repulse already: and under the very gate of Capua which openeth upon the river Vultumus, there was another skirmish, where the Romanes striving to enter the towne, were not so much put back and withstood by force of armed men, as by brakes, scorpions, and other engins of ordinance, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, discharged shot so violently, that they drave the enemies farther off. Over and besides, the forcible and furious assault of the Romanes was daunted and suppressed, by reason that their Generall himselfe Ap. Claudius, was hurt; who as

C he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vaward, hapned to be wounded with a dart above in his brest under the left shoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there slaine before the gate, and the rest were driven for feare to make hast and get the citie over their heads. Anniball also perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies so manfully defended even to the utterance: gave over farther assault, and began to retire his ensignes, and to turne backward all his fooremens, interposing his horsemen behinde them, for feare the enemy should charge them on the taile. The legions were exceeding egre to pursue after the enemies: but Flaccus commaunded to sound the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effectuated two things, to wit, that both the Campanes saw in how little steed Anniball served them; and also Anniball himselfe knew and

D perceived no lesse. Some writers that have recorded this battaile, set downe, that of Anniball his armie there were slaine that day eight thousand men, and of Campanes three thousand: that the Carthaginians lost fiftene ensignes, and the Campanes eightene. But in others, I find that the conflict was not so great, and that the fright was much more than the skirmish: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unware into the Romanes camp, those Elephants as they passed through the mids thereof, overthrew and laid along many of the tents and pavilions; and the Sumpter-horses and other beasts there for carriage, with great noyse brake their halters, and collars, fled for feare, and bare downe all afore them as they went. And that besides this tumultuous fright and confusion, Anniball dealt fraudulently, by sending in among the rest certaine that could speake the Latin tongue (for some such he had about him) who in the Consuls name gave commaundement (since that the camp was lost) that every souldier should make shift for himselfe, and flye to the next mountaines. But this deceit was soone espied and prevented with the losse and slaughter of a number of enemies: and the Elephants were coursed out of the camp with fire. But howsoever this battaile was either begun or ended, the last it was fought there, before that Capua was yielded up and surrendered.

The Medjastuticus (for so they call the head magistrate and governour of the citie of Capua) for that year, was one Seppius Lesius, a man of base parentage & mean calling. The report goeth, that his mother upon a time as she made satisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherlesse and under age) by a purgatorie sacrifice, for a prodigious domestical portent, that hapned in her house, was told by the Soothsaier out of his learning, that one day the chiefe government of Capua should befall to that child: whereat, she seeing no likelyhood nor hope at all of any such matter, said thus againe, You talke of a poore citie of Capua, when that day comes; and God save all, when my sonne shall he advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words spoken at randon and in jest, proved afterwards good earnest, and true in deed. For when when as the cittizens were driven to great freights, through sword and famine, and were past all hope of recoverie: in such sort, as they that were of qualitie and borne for honour, refused to be in place of authoritie, this Lesus complaining that Capua was forlome, betrayed, and abandoned by her owne nobilitie, tooke upon him the chiefe magistracie, and was the last of all the Campanes that bare soveraigne rule in that cittie.

Anniball perceiving, that neither his enemies would be drawne forth any more to fight: nor possibly hee could breake through their campe for to come unto Capua: for feare least that the new Consuls should stop all the passages, and intercept his purveiance of victuals, determined to dislodge without effecting his purpose, and to remove from Capua. And as he cast and tossed too & fro in his mind, what course to take, and whither to go; it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and seat-cittie of the whole warre. This was the upshot of all, and the empresse that he most desired. Howbeit as all others much grieved and greatly blamed him, that he had over-slipt the opportunitie when it was, even presently upon the battaile at Cannæ: so himselfe acknowledged no lesse, that he was mightily overseene. And yet the thing was not so farre past (he thought) that he should despaire, but upon some suddaine fright and unexpected tumult, he might seize of some quarter of the cittie or other. And if Rome were once in that hazard, then either both the Romane Generals, or one at the least, would immediately leave the siege of Capua. Who, if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minister either unto him, or to the Campanes, some occasion of good fortune. The onely thing that troubled his mind was this, for feare least that as soone as his back were turned, the Campanes would yeeld themselves unto the Romanes. He therefore with large and liberall rewards, induceth a certaine Numidian (an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertooke) to be the carrier of certaine letters, and to enter into the campe of the Romanes, counterfeiting himselfe, to be a fugitive, from the adverse part unto them: and so when he espied his time, to slip secretly from the other side of the campe, to Capua. The letters were very comfortable, importing unto them, That his remove and departure from thence, was for their good and safetie, wherby he meant to withdraw the Romane captains and their forces from Capua, to the defence of their owne cittie of Rome: willing them not to let fall their hearts and be discouraged; for by patient abiding some few daies, they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made stay of all the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Vulturinus, & commanded them to be brought to Castilinum, which he had fortified aforetime with a pile or castle to guard & keep the place with a garison. And having intelligence that there was such store of barges and botomes upon the river, as would serve to transport in one night his whole armie: he made provision of victuals for ten daies, brought downe his armie by night to the river side, and crossed the water with all his power, before the next day light. But this was not carried so secretly, but before that it was effected, intelligence was given thereof by certaine rennegate fugitives: whereupon Fulvius Flaccus addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave notice thereof. At which tidings, men according to their sundrie fancies and humours, were diversly affected: and as so fearfull an occurrence required, incontinently the Senate assembled.

P. Cornelius surnamed Asina, was of opinion, that all the captaines and armies whatsoever, should be called home out of all parts of Italie, without regard of Capua or any other exploit besides, save onely the defence of the cittie. Fabius Maximus thought it was a dishonest, lewd, and shamefull part, to depart from the siege of Capua, and to be skared to turne here and there, and to be carried away with every copie of Anniball's countenance, and with his vaine threats and menaces. Hee that woon a victorie at Cannæ, and durst not then go forward to the cittie, hath hee conceived any hope now to win Rome, being also lately repulld from Capua? No, he marcheth toward Rome, not minding to besiege it, but hoping to raise the siege from Capua. And how ever it be, I am assured (quoth hee) that Jupiter (the witnesse of covenants broken by Anniball) and other gods besides, will defend us with the helpe of that armie which we shall find at home in the cittie. Betweene these two opinions, P. Valerius Flaccus held the meane, and prevailed: for he having a regard and due consideration, both of the one and the other; thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, & to certifye them, what strength they had of able men to defend the cittie: as for the forces of Anniball, and what power was needfull to mainteine the siege at Capua, they themselves knew best. Therefore in case that one of the pro-Consuls

A pro-Consuls there, and part of the armie might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, & nevertheless, the siege continue with the conduct of the other pro-Consull, and the rest of the armie: then Claudius and Fulvius should so order the matter betweene themselves, that the one of them might remaine still before Capua at siege, and the other repaire to Rome, for to defend and keepe their native countrie from the same danger. Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act: which being brought unto Capua, Q. Fulvius the Viz-Consull who was to go to Rome, by reason that his colleague was sicke of his hurt, chose out of the three armies certaine companies of souldiours, and so with fiftene thousand footmen, and one thousand horsemen, passed over the river Vulturinus. Then having certaine intelligence, that Anniball minded to march along the Latin street way: he tooke his journey through the townes and burroughs situate upon the way Appia, & sent his courriers before unto Setia, Sorã, and Lavinium, which are seated neere unto it, not only for to lay provision of victuals redie for him in their citties and townes, but also from the countrie villages farther out of the way; to bring their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their townes for their own defence, and every one to stand upon their good guard, and to looke unto their state, as well publike as private.

Anniball the same day that he had crossed Vulturinus, encamped not farre from the river. And the morrow after, entered into the territorie of the Sidicines, and led his host neere unto Cales. There, after he had staid one day, forraying and spoiling the countrie, he marched by Sueffula, into the territories of Allifas and Casinum, by the way of the Latine street. Under the town Casinum he abode in campe two daies, and raised booties here & there in every place. From thence leaving Interramna and Aquinum, he came into the countrie about Fregellæ, as farre as to the river Liris: where he found the bridge cut downe by the Fregellanes, for to impeach and let his journey. Fulvius likewise was staid at the river Vulturinus, by reason that the barges & botomis were burnt by Anniball: and much ado he had, for the great scarcitie of timber & wood, to make punts and boats for to set over his armie. But Fulvius, after hee had once transported his men in such boats and planks as hee made shift withall, had afterwards no hinderance in his journey; but found not onely store of victuals in the townes and citties as hee travailed, but also plentie thereof brought readie for him to the waies side right courteously. Then the souldiours as they marched on foote cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speede, considering they went to the defence of their naturall countrie. D Now there was a post sent from Fregellæ, who rode night and day and never made stay, and he put the cittie in exceeding feare. The running together besides of the people, that ceased not to make every thing more than it was, and to invent somewhat of their owne fingers ends, and put it to the newes that they heard, made a greater hurree than the messenger himselfe, and set the cittie in an uprore. And not onely the women were heard to weepe and wale in their owne private houses: but also from all parts, the Dames of the cittie came flocking into the streets, running about to all the churches and chappels of their gods and goddesses, sweeping the altars with the tresses of their haire hanging downe, kneeling upon the bare ground, and stretching out their hands up toward heaven unto the gods, pouring out their praies and supplications, That they would vouchsafe to preserve the cittie of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to save the Romane wives and their little children from harme and all abuse. The bodie of the Senate gave attendance upon the magistrâtes in the common place, readie to give them their advyse and counsell. Some receive of them direction, and departed every man to execute his charge: others offer themselves to the magistrâtes, to be employed in any service whatsoever. Sundrie guards were bestowed in the castle, in the Capitoll, and upon the wallies: all places about the citie were wel manned. The Albane mountain also & the castle of Thufculum were furnished with good garrisons. Amids this alarme tidings came, that Q. Fulvius the pro-Consull, was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an armie. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authoritie, after he was come into the cittie, there was a decree graunted out of the Senatehouse, that Q. Fulvius should have as large a commision of rule and commaund as the Consuls themselves. Anniball, after he had made fouler worke & havocke in the territorie of Fregellæ; than in other places, for anger that they had cut downe the bridges against his coming, led his armie through the Frusinate, Ferentinare, and Anagnine countries, and came forwards into the territorie of Lavicos: and so by Algidum hee marched toward Thufculum. And when he could not be let in there within the wals, he descended beneath

Thufculum,

Tusculum, on the right hand to Gabii: from whence he conducted his armie into Pupinia, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The neerer the enemie approached to the citie, the greater slaughter was made of the paissants that fled from him, by his vauntcurriers, the Numidian light horsemen, whom he feared afore to make riddance. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken captive.

In this tumultuous trouble, Fulvius Flaccus with his armie, entred Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midst of the citie, along the street Carinae into the Exquilie, and from thence he went forth, and betweene the gates Exquilina and Collina pitched his tents. Thither the Adiles of the Commons brought victuals: the Consull and the Senate resorted to him into the campe, where they sat in counsell about the State of the Commonweale. And agreed it was, That the Consulls should lie encamped likewise about the gates Collina and Exquilina: that C. Calpurnius Pretour of the citie, should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the castle with a guard, and that the Senatours keepe residence continually in good number within the compasse of the Forum, what need so ever there should be of their counsell and advice, against all suddaine accidents. By this time Anniball was come forward, as farre as to the river Anio, & within three miles of the citie lay encamped, where he kept a standing leaguer. But himselfe in person with 2000 horsemen, advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as farre as to Heracles his temple, and rode all about as neere as he well could, to view the walls, and the situation of the citie. Flaccus tooke foule disdaine thereat, and thought it a shamefull indignitie, that he should brave it at his pleasure so scornfully without revenge, whereupon he sent out certaine of his owne Cavallerie, and gave commaundement, That they should set the enemies horsemen farther off, and chase them backe into their campe. Whiles they were in skirmish together, the Consulls gave order, that the Numidian horsemen, such as were fled from the enemie, and turned to the Romanes (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) should passe through the midst of the citie to the Exquilie: supposing that there were none more meet than they, for to fight among the valleyes, the garden houses, the sepulchres and hollow waies on every side. Whom, when some from the castle and the Capitoll, espied riding downe the descent of the hill, called Clivus Publicus, they ran crying about the citie, The Aventine is taken, The Aventine is taken. Which alarme caused a tumult, & gave such an occasion of fear, and running away, that if the campe of Anniball had not been without the walls, the fearefull multitude doubtlesse would have abandoned and quit the citie. But they tooke their houses, and gat every man up to the terrasses and leads thereof: from whence they pelled with stones and others shot their own friends in steed of enemies, as they rode scattering one from another in the streets. This tumult could not be repressed, nor the error appeare, by reason that the waies were so pestered with a number of the countrie peasants, and of cattell besides, whom suddaine feare had driven into the citie. Howbeit, the horsemen fought fortunately, and the enemies were removed and set backe. And because it was necessarie to stay all disorders and uprores that chanced upon small occasions to arise, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Dictatours, or borne the office of Censors, should have their full power & authoritie, untill such time as the enemie was cleane departed from about the walls. And that was to good purpose: for all the rest of that day, and the night following, there were divers and sundrie garboiles, without any cause or occasion raised, and the same stilled & appeased by that meanes.

The next day Anniball passed over Anio, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. Neither were Flaccus and the Consulls behind hand for their parts, but readie for battell. When both armies stood arraigned in order on both sides, amused upon the issue and event of that one fight, which was for no lesse a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very citie of Rome: there fell such a mightie storme of raine and haile together, and so troubled both hostes, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for safetie into their severall campees, fearing nothing lesse than their own enemies. The morrow after likewise, when they stood in the same place in battell array, the like tempest parted them asunder. And they were not so soone retired into their campe, but the day was wonderfull faire, and the weather calme againe.

The Carthaginians tooke this for an ominous presage to them of ill lucke. And Anniball was heard (by report) to say, That one while his mind, another while his fortune, would not give him leave

A leave to win the citie of Rome. There were other occurrences besides, as well small as great, that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whiles he lay with his host in arms before the walls of Rome, he understood, there were certaine companies with banners displayed sent into Spaine for to supplie the armies there. Of lesse reckoning was this, that hee was advertised by a certaine captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon hee was encamped, happened at the same time to be sold: not underfoot, but at the full price, and nothing abated. This he tooke to be so presumptuous a part, and such a scornfull indignitie, namely, that there should bee a chapman found at Rome, to make purchase of that peece of land, which hee was possessed of and held in right of armes, that presently he called for a publicke crier & trumpet, and gave commaundement unto him, to proclaim port sale of all the shops of Bankers and money chaungers at that time about the Forum in Rome. Nevertheless, hereupon hee was moved to dislodge, and retired his campe backwards from the citie to the river Turia, fixe myles from Rome. From whence hee tooke his way to the grove of Feronia, where stood a temple, in those daies much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereof were certaine Capenates, who used to bring thither the first fruits of their corne and revenues, yea, and many other oblations besides, according to their store: by meanes whereof they had adorned & garnished it with much gold and silver. Of all those gifts and offerings was this temple then, robbed and spoiled. But after the departure of Anniball from thence, there were found great heapes of brasse, by reason that the souldiours upon touch and remorse of conscience, had cast in many brazen peeces. The sacking and pillage of this temple, all writers doe agree upon, and make no doubt thereof. Caelius saith, That Anniball as hee went toward Rome from Ereum, turned thither, and hee setteth downe the beginning of his journey from Reate, Cutilia, and from Amitemum. And that out of Campania, he came into Samnium, and from thence into the countrie of Peligni, and so passed beside the citie Sulmo, to the Marucines, and then by the territorie of the Albenses into the Marfians land, and from thence hee marched to Amitemum, and so forward to the towne Foruli. Neither is there any error or doubt in all this, because the markes and tokens of the voiage of so great an armie, could not within the memorie and compasse of so small an age, be confounded and worne out. For certaine it is, that he passed that way. The only difference lieth herein, whether hee came to the citie of Rome, or returned from thence into Campania, by that way aforesaid.

D Now was not Anniball so resolute to defend Capua, but the Romanes were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the siege and assault thereof. For he sped himselfe so fast another way in his voiage back, first out of the Lucanes countrie to the Brutians, and so, on stil to the streight of Sicilie and to Rhegium, that with his suddaine comming thither, he surprized them at unwares, even before they heard of his arrivall. As for Capua, albeit in the time of Fulvius his absence, it was no lesse streightly beleaguered, yet it felt the comming againe of Flaccus: and besides, there was much marvell there, why Anniball returned not backe as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were forsaken and forlorne of Anniball, and that the Carthaginians were past all hope, to keepe and hold Capua still to their owne use. There was an Edict moreover of the Pro-consull, passed by order from the Senate, and the same published and devulged among the enemies, That what citizen soever of Capua, would turne to the Romanes before such a certaine day, hee should have a generall pardon. But there was no conning in, nor raunging to the Romanes side; for feare of punishment at the Romans hands, more than for any regard of their alleageance to the Carthaginians: because their transgression and trespass in their former revolt was so great, that it might not be pardoned. And as no one man at all, privately on his owne head came over to the campe of the Romanes, so there was no good order taken by publicke counsell, for the benefit and safetie of the whole citie. The noblemen had given over managing of state-matters, and could not be brought by any means to assemble in Senate. And in cheefe place of government was hee, who had not wooon to himselfe any honour thereby, but his unworthinesse was derogatorie to the authoritie and power of that Magistracie which he bare. For now there was not one of the cheefe citizens and noblemen that would be so much as scene in the market place or common hall of assemblies: but shutting themselves within dores in their private houses, they expected every day for the destruction of their countrey, together with their owne undoing and overthrow. The whole charge & care lay upon Bostar and Hanno, captaines of the garrison in the fort there of the Carthaginians, and more carefull were they of their owne welfare, than fearefull for the jeopardie of their friends and allies. These two wrote letters unto Anniball, endited not onely in plaine teauues & frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they laid unto his charge, That he had not onely betraied Capua into the hands of the enemies, but also delivered and exposed them and the garison to the cruell clutches of the Romanes to be massacred and executed. That hee was gone his waies, and departed into the country of the Brutij, as one that turned away his face of purpose, because he would not see with his owne eyes the losse of Capua. But ywis the Romanes contrarywise could not be withdrawn from the siege of Capua, no, not by the assaulding of the citie of Rome: so much more were the Romanes resolute enemies, than the Carthaginians constant friends. But if he would returne againe to Capua, and bend the full force of his warre thither, both they and the citizens also of Capua, would be ready to fall forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they passed not over the Alpes with intent to war with the Rhexines and Tarentines; no, but where the Romane legions were, there ought the armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Cannæ, thus at Thrasymenus were the victories atchieved, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joyning camp to camp, and by hazarding the fortune of battaile. To this effect were the letters penned, and given to certain Numidians; who for a good reward, had offered their service before, for the safe carriage and delivery of them. These fellows presented themselves before Flaccus in the camp, in habit and qualitie of fugitives, unto his side: hoping to spie out some convenient time when they might give him the slip and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Capua, there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart from thence to the aduerser part. But behold, there hapned anon a Capuan wench to come into the leaguer (a naughtie-pack and an harlot, that one of the supposed counterfeiter fugitives aforesaid kept.) She enformed the Generall of the Romanes, that those Numidians, fraudulently and by covin, pretended to flye unto his part, and had letters about them unto Anniball. This would she stand to, and be ready to averre to the very face of one of them, who bewrayed and disclosed the plot unto her. At first, when he was brought forth before her, he set a jolly countenance of the matter, and made it very strange, and pretending stoutly that he knew not the woman: but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truthe, and especially when he saw that they called for the rack, & that he was upon the point to be put to torture: & so in the end confessed that all was true, and therewith brought forth the letters. Over and besides, another thing was now revealed, which before was kept close and secret: to wit, that there were other Numidians besides, who under the colour of fugitives, had gone up and downe in the Romane camp: of these there were apprehended not so few as threescore and ten, and they together with the new, were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and sent back againe to Capua. This piteous spectacle & sight of so feareful execution, killed the courage, & brake the very hart of the Campanes. Whereupon, the people ran together unto the Counsell house, & compelled Leſius to assemble a Senat, and openly threatned the Nobles (who a long time had absented themselves from publick consultations) that unless they would now repaire into the Senate, they would go home to their very houses, and pluck them out by the eares into the street. For feare hereof, the chiefe magistrate had a frequent and full assembly of Senatours. Whiles all the rest were of opinion to send embassadors to the Romane Generals, Vibius Virius (who had bene the chiefe cause and principall author of their first revolt from the Romanes) being demaunded his advise, spake to the point in this manner.

The Creation of Fabius Pictus in the Senate of Capua.

They that talke of embassadors, of peace, and of yeelding, little consider and remember either what they would have done, in case the Romanes had bene at their devotion and mercie, or what themselves must endure and suffer. For what thinke ye wil become (quoth he) of this present surrender of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romanes our selves, and all that we had, for to obtaine their aid and succour against the Samnites? And have we so soone forgotten, at what time, and in what condition and state we were when we forsooke and abandoned the people of Rome? Also, after our revolt, how we most cruelly and shamefully killed their garison, whom we might have dismissed and sent away with their lives? Moreover, how often we have issued forth against them lying at siege, and how mischeivously minded we were unto them, yea and how we have sallied upon them in their camp? Over and besides, call ye not to remembrance, how we called for Anniball to surpris and defeat them? and (that which of all other is most fresh in memorie) how we sent him from hence to give the assault

A assault to Rome? On the contrary side, marke well and call to mind, how maliciously they have attempted and practised all hostilitie against us: by which ye may well know what account to make of them, and what ye are to trust unto. For when they had a stranger and forain enemy within Italie, nay when they had Anniball their enemy: when the warres were so hote, that all was on a light fire: they passed by all other affaires, yea they let Anniball himselfe alone, and sent both their Consuls with two complet consular armies to besiege and force Capua. This is the second year that they keepe us entrenched round about, pinning us up, and pinning us with extreme famine and hunger: during which time, they themselves as well as we, have endured the utmost extremities and dangers that are, and sustained most grievous and infinite travailes: oftentimes being killed and cut in peeces about their rampiers, trenches, and ditches, and finally driven almost out of their camp and hold. But to let passe and speake no more of these ordinary matters, seeing it is an old and usuall case, for them to abide painefull toyle, and incur many perils, who besiege and assault any cities or townes of their enemies: See a manifest signe of their deadly feud, and execrable hatred against vs. Anniball with a puissant power of foote and horsemen both, assailed their camp, yea and in some part was maister of it. Thinke ye that in so great danger of theirs, they were one jot withdrawn from the siege? He passed over the river Vulturnus, and burnt the territorie of Cales: yet for all that calamitie and losse, which their allies received, stirred not they one whit, nor gave over their enterprife. He commaunded to march forward with banner displayed against the very citie of Rome: they made as little account of that dangerous tempest toward, as of all the rest. After he had passed over the river Anio, he pitched his tents within three miles of the citie; nay, he approached at length the walls, and made a brave vado even under the gates; to be short, he presented unto their eye his resolution, and menaced to make Rome too hote for them unless they levied the siege before Capua: and yet they gave not over but beleaguered us still. The very wild and savage beasts be they never so fell, be they maddened never so much with blind rage and woodnesse against one, yet if another go to their denes, and offer to take away their whelps, they will turne again to succour and help their yong ones: but the Romanes, notwithstanding Rome was besieged, their wives and children in danger, whose piteous cries and lamentable plaints, were heard almost even hither; notwithstanding their alters, their sacred fires, the temples of their gods, the monuments and sepulchres of their Ancestours, were profaned, abused, and polluted, could not be drawne away from Capua. So eager, so hungrie are they to be revenged of us, so thirsty are they, to drinke our blood. And good reason, haply, they have so to do. For would not we also have done the semblable, if fortune had given us the opportunitee? But seeing the will of the immortall gods is otherwise: and considering that I owe nature a death; in my power it is (whiles I am at libertie, whiles I am mine owne man, and maister of my selfe) to avoid torments, to shun shamefull ignominies and reproches (whereof the enemy hopeth I shall feele the smart) and that by one kind of death, which as it is honest, so it is also easy and gentle? Never will I endure to see Ap. Claudius and Q. Fulvius, proudly and insolently bearing them selves upon their conquest over us: never will I be led and haled bound with cheines, through the citie of Rome, to make a shew, and to serve for a spectacle and gazing stock in their Triumph: and afterwards either in darke prison, or tied openly to a stake, yeeld my back and side to be rewed, whipped, and mangled: and then lay my neck upon the block, to have my head chopt off with the bloody axe of the Romanes. Never will I behold my native country sacked, spoiled, and put to fire and sword, nor the chaste married dames of Capua, to be forcibly ravished, the faire & beautifull maidens shamefully deflowered, and the wel-favoured yong boyes & freeborne, unnaturally abused. They raised Alba in times past from the top to the very foundation, and left neither stick nor stone thereof, Alba I say, from whence they had their offspring, and were first descended: to the end that there might remaine no memorie at all of their stock and first originall. And shal I ever beleve they will spare Capua, & receive it to mercy, against which they are more hatefully and mortally bent, than against Carthage? Therefore, my maisters and friends, as many of you as are minded and resolved to dye before ye see these so many miseries and wofull calamities, I have at home a supper this night well furnished and provided for you all: and when ye have eate meate your fill, and drunke wine to it liberally, the same wassail cup that first will be presented unto me, shall go round about to you all: and that one draught, shall deliver your bodies from torments, preserve your spirits from anguish and contumelious disgrace, keepe your eyes from beholding all cruell acts, your eares from hearing ring all shamefull indignities which follow and attend upon conquered persons. There shall be also in readinesse, cerreine servitours of purpose, to make a mightie great fire within the base court-yard of mine house, and to cast our dead bodies thereinto. This is the onely honest way to death, and becoming us who are free borne & gentlemen in deed. In which doing, our enemies will wonder at our vertue and valour: yea and Annibals himselfe shall well know, that he hath forsaken and betrayed his trustie and magnanimious allies.

This Oration of Virius, there were more men present, that heard with applause and good liking, than could find in their hearts to put that in execution which they so well allowed & approved. The greater part of the Senat, not despairing, but that the clemencie of the people of Rome, which had bene tried and seene oftentimes in many warres, might be gained and extended also unto them; concluded, to send Embassadors with commission to yeeld Capua into the Romans hands. Some seven and twentie Senatours there were, that accompanied Vibius Virius home to his house, and supped with him: and after they had done what they could to drinke themselves drunke, and to intoxicate their braines with freely taking in their wine, (therby to withdraw their minds from the fence and apprehension of their imminent harme and miserie) drunke all of the poisoned cup above said. This done, and the banquet ended, they rose from the table, tooke one another by the hand, embraced each other, taking their last leave, bidding a finall adieu & farewell, & bewailing together with plenteous teares, their owne misfortune, and the miserable state of their countrie; some staid behind to be burned in one and the same fire for fellowship, others brake companie and departed to their owne houses. Now, by reason that their veines were filled with full feeding and drinking wine so liberally, the poyson was not so quicke of operation, nor so effectually as to hasten their death. And therefore most of them languished all night long, yea and continued drawing on a peece of the next day, before they let their last breath: but yet they all had yeelded up their ghost, before that the gates were set open for the enemies.

The day following, the gate of Iupiter which stood next over against the Roman campe, was by the commaundement of the pro-Consull opened. Thereat entred one legion & two cornets of horsemen, under the leading of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant: who after he had first above all other things, given expresse order, that all armor of defence, & weapons of offence (which was to be found in Capua) should be brought forth and presented unto him; placed & disposed at all the gates, warders sufficient to see that no person might possibly go forth, or be let out: then he laid hold upon the garison of the Carthaginians, & commaunded the Senators of Capua to repair into the camp, before the Roman captain Generals themselves. So soon as they were thither come, straightwaies they had yrons clapped upon them, and were commaunded to make tender unto the treasurers of all the gold and silver they had. The gold amounted to 70 pound weight: the silver rose to the weight of three thousand and two hundred pound. Five and twentie of the Senatours were sent to Cales, eight and twentie to Theanum, to be kept safe in ward. Eventhose who were knowne for certaine, to have principally moved and perswaded the revolt from the Romanes. Concerning the punishment of the Senatours of Capua, Fulvius and Claudius could not agree. Claudius was more tractable and exorable, and might soone have bene intreated for a pardon. Fulvius was more rigorous, and proceeded to a harder course. Whereupon Appius put over the whole deciding and determination thereof unto the Senate of Rome. Alleading, that it was meet and requisite, that the LL. of the Counsell should have the examination of the cause, and namely upon these points. Imprimis, whether they had complotted and combined in this action, with any of the free boroughes and cities belonging to the state of the Latines. Item, whether they had any help & reliefe from thence in the time of the war, or from any other towns whatsoever? But Fulvius in no case would condescend thereto, nor suffer that the minds of faithfull & loyall allies, should be disquieted with doubtfull surmises & suspicions of any crimes; and called in question upon the appeachment and delatorie information of those, that never yet, made reckning or conscience, either what they did, or what they said. And therefore he protested to suppress that manner of proceeding, and crush that inquisition for ever. After this communication they departed asunder: and Appius made no doubt, but that howsoever his Colleague fared and tooke on, giving out so shrewd and bitter words, he would yet take pause and stay for the letters from Rome, concerning so weightie a businesse as this was. But Fulvius, because of his designement, brake up his keeping of state in his royall pavilion, and sent his officers and ordinarie traine out of the way, because he would not be hindered and empeached by them,

A them, in the course of his designement: and commaunded the Colonels and captaines of the allies, to give warning unto two thousand chosen men of armes, for to be in readinesse and present themselves at the third sound of the trumpeter. With this power of horsemen hee set forward by night, and marched to Theanum: and by breake of day entred the gate, and kept his way on into the market place. At the first entrance of the horsemen, the people ran together from all parts: then he caused the chiefe magistrate (a Sidicine) to be called: and charged him to produce his prisoners the Capuans, whom he had in custodie. When they were all brought forth, they were first whipped with rods, and then beheaded. From thence hee rode upon the spur to Cales: where so soone as he was set on the Tribunall seat, in place of judgement, and the Capuan prisoners likewise presented in place and bound to the stake; there came a horseman in post from Rome, and when he had delivered letters from C. Calpurnius the Consull, and the people of Rome, unto Fulvius; there ran a rumout from the Tribunall through all the assembly, that the whole processe against the Campanes was to be put off and reserved entire to the censure and doome of the LL. of the Senate. And Fulvius supposing it to be no lesse indeed, after he tooke the letters, never brake them up, but bestowed them in his bosome, and gave commaundement to the Crier, to charge the Licitor or executioner to do his office, according to law. Thus they also that were at Cales were executed and suffered death. Then he read the letters, and the order set downe by the Senate: but it was too late now, to stay that which was done already and past, and which indeed was hastned with all speed that might be, for feare it might have bene crossed and prevented.

C Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Taurea Tubellius a Campan, passing amidst the throng, called by name alowd upon Fulvius. Whereat Flaccus wondring what the man meant, sat him downe againe upon his seat, and demanded what he would? Mary (quoth he) command me also to be killed, that thou maist boast and glorie another day, that thou hast done to death, a better man by farre, and much more valiant than thy selfe. Surely (quoth Flaccus) this fellow is lunaticke and not well in his wits: and againe, were I minded to take his life from him, I am inhibited by vertue of the act of the Senate. Then (quoth Tubellius) since that my countrie is forced and lost, my kinsfolke & friends made away: seeing also that I have with mine own hand murdered my wife and children, because they should suffer no villanous indignitie; and may not my selfe so much as die this death which my countriemen here have suffered before my face, I will seeke by vertue & manhood to ease my self of this life, so tedious, so irksome, and odious unto me: and with that, he drew forth the skeine which he had hidden under his garment, & stabbed himselfe in the brest quite through his bodie, & there at the feet of the L. General, fell downe redie to die in the place. For as much as both the execution of the Campanes, & also the most part of other matters were performed according to the will of Flaccus alone: some there be, that write how Appius Claudius died about the time that Capua was yeelded. And that this very same Taurea, neither came to Cales of his owne accord, nor killed himselfe: but that as he was a binding to the stake, because the words which hee uttered, could not bee heard for the confused noise of the people, therefore Flaccus commanded silence, & then Taurea spake those words before rehearsed, namely,

E That himselfe a right valiant & hardy man, was put to death by a meaner person than himselfe, and much inferiour to him in valour and vertue. Whereat by the commaundement of the Proconsul, the crier pronounced & said: Go to Sergeant, let this brave & valiant man have the more store of rods bestowed upon him, let him have good scourging, lay on load, & let the lashes surely on, & let him be the first that you proceed against, let him have the law to the full. Some there be that have written, how the act of the Senat was read before he proceeded to the beheading: but because there was this branch or clause within the act, That if he thought so good, he should reserve the whole deciding of the matter unto the Senate: he construed it thus, that it was put to his discretion, for to weigh and consider what was more profitable to the Common-weale. This done, he returned from Cales to Capua. Atella & Calatia were both surrendered into his hands; where they also who were the chief heads of those states, suffered the like punishment. Thus there were upon a fourescore of the Senatours put to death: and to the number well neere of three hundred Capuans (borne of noble blood) committed to prison. Others of them were bestowed in safe custodie within divers cities of the Latines, and came to sundrie unhappie ends. The multitude besides of the Campanie citizens, were sold outright.

It remained now to put to question and debate, what was to be done with the cittie and the territorie territorie theretobelonging. And some were of mind, that a citie so exceeding mightie, so neer G a neighbour, and so dangerous to Rome, should be utterly rased and destroyed. But the consideration of a present commoditie and gaine, tooke place and prevailed. For in regard of the territorie and land lying about it (which was well knowne to be the most fertile soile in all Italie, and yeelded all maner of fruit) the citie was saved: whereinto those husbandmen that tilled the grounds, might retire themselves and dwell. And for the peopling and inhabiting thereof, there was a multitude reserved of the inhabitants which were there already, namely, of liber-tines and enfranchised bondslaves, merchants factours, retailers, artificers, and craftsmen, who kept there still and remained. But the whole territorie, and all the publick edifices were seized to the use of the people of Rome. Moreover, order was taken, that Capua should be inhabited only, and replenished with people like a citie; but no forme of Commonweale, no corporation, no H Senate, no assemblee of Commons, nor magistrate of their owne should be allowed there. For without a common counsell of State, without magistracie and government, without intelligences and reciprocall commerce, as in the bodie of a Communitie, they supposed, that they would never agree together in any complot, but bee farre unmeet to contrive a conspiracie and compasse alteration. As for a Provost or Governour to minister law, and execute justice among them, they purposed to send them one yearly from Rome. Thus were the affaires ordered and composed at Capua, by a good policie and commendable course every way. For those that were most in fault and guiltie, were punished with rigour, and that speedily. The number of cittizens were scattered and dispersed sundrie waies, without all hope to returne againe. The bare houses and walls that had not offended, they were spared, and neither burned nor pulled down. And besides the commoditie and gain that accrewed unto the Romans by this manner of proceeding, they woun some name of clemencie and mercie among their Confederates and Allies: in that they saved a most noble and wealthie citie, at the ruines whereof, all Campanie, and as many States as bordered about Campanie, would have grieved much, and groned againe. By this meanes also the enemie was constrained now to confesse, and could not otherwise chuse, how powerfull and mightie the Romanes were to chastice and punish their faithlesse associates, yea, and how feeble Annibal was, and not able to defend and maintaine those, whom he had received into his protection.

The Romane Pro-consuls, after they had finished and performed their charge at Capua, af-signed unto Claudius Nero fixe thousand footmen out of those two legions which he had before K Capua, and three hundred horsemen which he had chosen himselfe: also of Latine Allies as many foot in number, and 800 horse besides. This armie Nero embarked at Puteoli, and transported into Spaine. When he was arrived at Taracon, after he had there landed his souldiours, and laid up his ships in docke, and armed withall his mariners, (to make the greater number) he marched to the river Iberus, where he received the forces of T. Fonteius, and L. Martius, and from thence advanced toward the enemies.

Asdruball the sonne of Amilcar, lay encamped at a place called the Black-stones, in the Aufetanes country: it lieth betwene the townes Illyturgis and Mentissa. Now Nero kept the narrow streights of the Forrest there. Asdruball because he would not be pent up in so streight a route, sent an herald or messenger of peace to him, who should make promise in his name, that if Nero L would permit him to passe peaceably from thence, hee would withdrawall his forces out of Spaine. The Romane captaine tooke this message joyfully: and Asdruball requested, That they might empare the next day, and devise together how the Romanes would set downe conditions and articles in writing, as touching the rendrie and deliverie of the fortresses in every citie, and likewise of prefixing some day, by which time the garrisons should bee removed and displaced, and the Carthaginians have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and covin. Asdruball having obtained his request, presently commaunded, that in the very evening, and all night long the heaviest and most comberfome part of his whole armie, should escape what way soever they could, out of the gullet of the Forrest. But hee gave especiall direction, that they should not over M many of them, that night goe forth, because their small number was not onely fitter to deceive the enemie, and not so soone to bee discovered, but also might more easly passe through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an interview & parle: where the time was spent of purpose in much needlesse talke, and drawing of bookes, more than cause was: whereupon the day being farre gone, the businesse was put off unto the next day. And the night ensuing

A ing betwene, ministred Asdruball more time to send others away. And yet could not they make an end that day neither. Thus there passed certaine daies, employed in open shew about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting out the Carthaginians closely out of their campe. Now, after that the greater part of his hoast was gone away cleare, then he began to wrangle and frapple, yea, and to go from some offers that he had voluntarie made, & ever they were further and further off from agreement. For Asdruball, the lesse that he feared, the lesse also was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his Infanterie were gotten out of the Forrest, and the next morning, not onely the Forrest, but all the plaines about were overcast, and covered with a thicke and foggie mist. Which Asdruball perceiving, he sent a messenger to Nero, requesting to deferre their farther conference and communication to the morrow; pretending, that the present day was a festivall holyday among the Carthaginians, and therefore they made scruple, upon it, to follow any other businesse, but serve God. B All this while there was no fraud so much as once suspected. Asdruball had no sooner obtained respite for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavallerie, together with his Elephants, dislodged, and without any noise or stir recovered without any harme, a place of securitie. By the fourth houre of the day the sunne had dispatched and scattered the mist, and cleared the skie, and then the Romanes might discover the campe of their enemies emptie, and no creature left therein.
Then at length, Claudius perceiving that Asdruball had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-raught by his falshood and cunning practise, began to make out after him, minding to bid him battaile. But the enemie would none of that, and fell off. Howbeit, there passed some dribbling skirmishes betwene the rereward of the Carthaginians, and C the forlorne hope and vaunt-courriers of the Romanes. Amid these affaires (the States of Spain) neither they, who revolted after the overthrow of the Romanes, returned againe unto them; nor any new fell away, more than before.

At Rome, the Senate and people after the recoverie of Capua, tooke as great care for Spaine now, as for Italie it selfe. And agreed they were in general, that the armie there should be strengthened with new forces, and a Generall thither sent: but who should be the man, was not yet doncluded. For as much as, they were to take some extraordinarie care in the chusing of one to bee sent thither, where two singular and renowned warriors were slain within the compasse of thirtie daies, and to succeed in the route of those twain. Whiles some nominated one, and some another, at length they grew to this point, that the people should hold a solemne assemblee (as it D were, purchased) for election of a Pro-consull to goe over into Spaine. And the Consuls accordingly proclaimed a set day for the said assemblee. At first, there was great expectation, that those persons, who tooke themselves worthie of so great command, should put forth themselves, and preferre their owne names beforehand. But when this expectation failed and came to nothing, every man began afresh to reficcate and renew the former greefe, and mourne againe for the losses received, and to find the want and misse of so valourous captaines whome they had lost. Whereupon the whole citie being sad and pensive, & in manner destitute of all good counsell, and not resolved what to doe in this hard case, came yet down, into Mars field upon the day appointed for the election. Every mans eie was upon the Magistrates, and beheld the counte-E nances of their great men and rulers, how they looked one upon another, greiving and grumbling, that the State was at so low an ebbe, and the Commonweale growne to so desperat a case, that no man durst be seene to take upon him the government and province of Spaine. Then all of a suddaine, P. Corneli (his sonne that was slaine in Spaine, a young gentleman, not fully foure and twentie yeeres old) shewed himselfe, and said, That hee would undertake that charge upon him: and therewith stepped up into an higher place, from whence hee might be seene, and there he stood. Vpon whom, when all men had cast their eies, and avised him wel, in a generall accord and favourable affection unto the man, they offed unto him streightwaies, a happie and fortunate government. And when the assemblee was willed to give their suffrages, and goe to a scru-tutio, there was not one Centurie from the first to the last, nor one person from the highest to F the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Stipio, for to take a voiage as L. Deputie into Spaine. But after the thing was passed, and their passionate heat of affection once callied, they were on a sud-daine driven into a still silence and deepe dumpe, to thinke what a straunge and new deed they had done. And that which they bethought themselves most of, was this, that favour had carried them away in this action, more than the due consideration and regard of his age. Some there

were that had in dread and horror the ominous fortune also of that familie; and the name of him that out of two mournfull houses was to go into those provinces, where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and uncle. When Scipio perceived, that presently upon the election passed in so hasty a fit, the people grew to be heave and pensive; he called them to an open audience, and there before them all, discoursed of his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future warre that he was to manage: and that with so noble courage and haucie spirit, that he renewed afresh and kindled againe the former zeale and heate that was so cooled: and possessed mens minds with more assured hope, than usually mans faithfull promise, or reason grounded upon the confidence of precedents past, or any earthly thing is wont to affoord and warrant. For Scipio was a rare and wonderfull man, not only in regard of those true vertues inherent in him: but also for that he had framed himselfe even from his yong and tender years, by artificiall meanes, to the better setting out of those in-bred parts and qualities of his owne: making shew and semblant before the multitude, that the most things which he did, were either represented unto him by night-visions and apparitions, or els suggested, as it were, by revelation from the gods above; were it that he was superstitiously given, and his mind wholly possessed therewith, or that by his pollicie he might effect his designements, and have his commaundements performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared mens minds in this sort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he once put on his mans gowne, there was no day went over his head, but before he began his owne private businesse, or enterprised any publick affaires, he would go into the Capitoll: and so soone as he was entred into the temple, there sit him downe, & alone by himselfe bestow a good time in some secret ylle and corner thereof. This ordinarie manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpose considerately, or by chance unadvisedly) made divers men beleve verily, that it was a truth in deede, which was commonly supposed and reported, That the man had a god to his father. Which deepe and settled imagination of the people, relembed and renewed againe the like fame (in all the world) to that which went before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanitie and fabulous speech of folke, was the very same and all one in every respect: namely, that his mother conceived him by a mightie great serpent: for that very often in his bed-chamber there was scene some such prodigious and wonderfull thing, and ever as any bodie came in, it would wind away of a sodaine, and vanish out of sight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himselfe elevate and discredit as toyes and vanities, but rather cherish and encrease the opinion thereof, by a certain cunning cast of his own, in that he would neither denie and disavow any such matter, nor yet affirme plainly and verifie the same. Many other devises he had of like sort, partly true indeed, partly feigned and counterfet, which caused men beyond all measure to have this yong man in wonderfull admiration. Vpon the strong and grounded presumption whereof, the citie at that time conferred upon him (far unmeet ywis, in regard of his unripe yeares) so great a government, and a world withall of weightie and important affaires.

Besides the forces which remained in Spaine of the old armie, and those which were transported over from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foote, and one thousand horsemen: and to assist him in the conduct of his warres; he had as coadjutor appointed unto him A. Iunius Syllanus the Pro-pretor. Thus with a flecte of thirtie ships, (and Gallies they were all of five banks of oares) he tooke the seas and set sayle from the mouth of Tybre, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alps; and through the gulfes of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene; and disbarked at Emporiz a citie of Greeces: (for descended they are also from Phocæa) and there he set his people a land. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taracon, which he appointed for the Rendez-vous, where all his allies and confederates, (for at the rumor and fame of his landing, there flocked ambassadors unto him from all parts of the province) should meete together at a generall Diet. There he commaunded that the ships should be bestowed in their docks, save only three gallies (of three ranks) which came from Massiles, and upon courtrefie and kindnesse accompanied him from home, and those were sent back againe. Then he gave audience to the ambassadors, who hung in doubtfull suspence by reason of the varietie and of sundry changes and chances that lately had hapned, and to them he began to returne answer, and give them

A them their severall dispatches: but with such a spirit and boldnesse (upon confidence that he had in his owne rare vertues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and favored of rigor, and yet whatsoever he spake, it caried an exceeding majestie with it, and a singular credit. Being departed from Taracon, he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the standing wintering camps of the armie: where he highly commended the souldiours, for that notwithstanding they had received two shrewd blowes, upon two so great diffeatures one in the neck of another, yet they held the province still, and kept the field; and not suffering the enemies to reape and tast the fruit of their fortunate victories, had kept them out of all the countreys lying within Iberus, and defended faithfully all their confederates according to the trust reposed in them. Martius he had in his train alwaies about him; whom he so highly honored, that it was very well scene, he feared nothing lesse than that any other man should eclipse, or shadow his glorie. B Then Syllanus succeeded in place of Nero, and the new souldiers were brought into the standing winter leaguers, and Scipio having reviewed all the cities and the States that he was to survey, and performed all other affaires that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himselfe to Taracon. The same of Scipio was no lesse bruited among the enemies, than it was rise with his owne citizens and loving allies: and a certaine preface went withall of the future event, which caried (as good hap was) the greater feare and dread with it; as there was lesse reason that could be rendred and given thereof. They had betaken themselves into their wintering harbours far distant and remote asunder. Asdruball the sonne of Gisco even as far as to the Ocean sea side, unto Gades: Mago into the midland parts, and especially above the forest and chafe of Castulo. And Asdruball the sonne of Amilcar wintered neere unto Iberus about Saguntum.

In the very end of that summer, when Capua was woon, and Scipio come into Spaine, the Carthaginian Armada which was sent for out of Sicilie to Tarentum, for to intercept the victuals, and empeach the same for comming to the Romane garison that held the castle of Tarentum, had verily stopped all the passages from the sea to the said castle: but by their long abode in those parts, and keeping the seas so straightly, they had caused a greater dearth and scarcitie of victuals among their owne friends than their enemies: for there could not by the help of those Carthaginian ships so much come bee along the river that was possessed by friends; nor from the open ports, for to furnish the townsmen of Tarentum, as the navie it selfe consumed and spent in maintenance of that rabble of sea-men, sailors, and mariners, mingled of all sorts of people. So as the garison of the castle being but few in number there, was able to be sustained by the provision they had aforehand, without the help of any new brought in unto them; whereas the Tarentines and the navie, could not have sufficient conveyed unto them: by reason whereof, at length the Armada had leave to depart thence with more thanks of the citie, than they had for their first ben-venu thither. And yet victuals were not much cheaper, because when the help by sea was gone, there could no come at all be brought from other parts abroad.

At the end of the very same summer, when M. Marcellus was come to the citie out of Sicilie, his owne province, C. Calpurnius the Pretour assembled the Senate for his sake in the temple of Bellona. Where, after he had discoursed of the acts by him atchieved, and complained after a mild and modest sort, laying open his griefes, not so much in the behalfe of himselfe, as of his souldiours: in that when he had performed and accomplished his charge and commission in his province, hee could not have licence to bring home his armie with him; hee demaunded that hee might be allowed to ride in triumph into the citie: but hee could not obtaine it. This matter was much canvased and debated, pro & contra, Whether it were lesse meet and convenient, to denie him triumph being now present, in whose name whiles he was absent, for the fortunate successe & good speed of all affaires under his conduct and government, there was a solemn procession decreed, and sacrifices done to the honour of the immortall gods, for to graunt him triumph (as if the warre were fully finished) whom the Senate had commaunded to wake over his armie to his successe; which surely they would never have deceeved, but that the war remained still within the province: and especially seeing the armie it selfe was away, the best witness supply, whether he had deserved a triumph or no. At length, a middle and indifferent course between both, was agreed upon, namely that he should enter the citie ovant a petie triumph. And the Tribunes of the commons, by the approbation first of the Senat proposed unto the people, that M. Marcellus should the same day that he came ovant into the citie, retaine still his subauthoritie and government. The day before he entred the citie, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus; and and from thence, in ovant wife he sent a rich bootie before him into the citie. There was carried in this poimpe, the counterfeit of the citie Syracuse woon, crosbowes, brakes, standing slings, and all other warlike instruments: besides, the ornaments testifying long and continuall peace, and the great wealth & treasure of the kings: as divers vessels of silver & brasse curiously wrought; other houlhold furniture also, rich hangings of tapistrie, and garments of great price; many goodly images and right noble statues, wherewith Syracuse was adorned and beautified, even with the best and principall cities of Greece. In token also of a victorie over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a shew. And that which was not the least sight & spectacle to behold, Sosis the Syracusian, and Mericius the Spaniard went afore with crownes of gold upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Saracuse was entred in the night season: and the other betrayed Nasos, and the garrison there. Both these were enfranchised citizens of Rome, and had fiftie akres of land a peece graunted unto them for ever. Sosis had his land set out in the territorie of Syracuse, which either belonged to the kings, or to the enemies of the people of Rome, and a dwelling house (chuse where he would in Syracuse of all those that were seized upon by right of conquest.) As for Mericius and the Spaniards that with him fled from the enemies, & sided unto the Romans, they had assigned unto them, a citie to inhabit, & land to occupie in Sicilie, which sometime belonged to them that had revolted from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. Cornelius, for to appoint them the said citie and land, wherefoever he thought good. And in the same territorie, there were allotted and set out, foure hundred acres of land unto Belligenes, by whose meanes Mericius was allured and induced to leave the adverse part and turne to the Romanes.

After that Marcellus was departed out of Sicilie, the navie of the Carthaginians disbarked eight thousand footmen, & three thousand Numidian horsemen. Vnto them revolted the Murgentine land, and Hybla, together with Magella; and other small piles of base account, tooke example by them and followed after. The Numidians with their capitaine Mutines, raunged over all Sicilie, and fired the townes and villages belonging to the associates of the people of Rome. Over and besides all this, the Romane armie there, being discontented and angrie, partly for that together with their Generall, they were not licenced to go out of the province: and partly, for that they were forbidden and debarred, for wintering in any good townes; demeaned themselves slackly and lazily in their militarie service: in such sort, as if there had bene a head to lead them, as they had a heart to move them, they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Cornelius the Pretour, both appeased and mitigated the stomakes of the souldiours, as well by comfortable words, as by rebukes and checkes: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those cities which had revolted. Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Murgantia to the Spaniards, unto whom both a citie and land to it was by order aforesaid due. Both the Consuls who had the government of the province Apulia, seeing there was lesse cause of feare and terror now from the Carthaginians and Anniball, were commaunded to cast lots betweene them, for the provinces of Apulia and Macedonia. So Macedonia befell unto Sulpitius, and he succeeded there in stead of Levinus. Fulvius was sent for home to Rome, about the election of the Consuls. And when he held the solemne assembly of the people, for the choise and creation of the Coss. The Centurie of the younger citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice, declared T. Manlius Torquatus, & T. Otacilius for Consuls. Manlius being there present in place, when the multitude came about him, to congratulate, with, God give you joy, &c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole bodie of the people would approve this choise of the first centurie) came with a great companie about him, to the tribunall seat of estate where the Consull sat: and made request unto him, that hee would give him the hearing of some few words, and commaund that prerogative centurie which had given their voices to be called back again to a new scrutinie. And when every man was attentive, and expected what hee would demaund, hee alleadged for his excuse a paire of ill eies. For a shamelesse Pilot of a ship is he, and as impudent a Generall of an armie (quoth he) who having, to doe all by other mens eies, would require to have the goods and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour, to commaund this centurie of the younger sort to give their voices a new, and in creating Consuls, to remember the war that is in Italie, to consider of the troublesome state of the Common-weale, and to thinke of this, That scarcely yet, mens cares have had any rest, since they resounded and rung againe, with the noises

T. Manlius to
the Consul.

A noises and alarmes, that the enemies raised within those few months, when they lay in siege neere unto the wals of Rome. But after these words, when the said centurie cried with one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Consuls againe, and none other; then Torquatus, Neither (qd. he) shall I be able, if I were Consull to beare with your fashions and conditions, nor you againe, endure my rule and commaundement. To the scrutinie therefore once againe, and thinke how the Carthaginians warre within Italie, and Anniball is the Generall of the enemies. Then the centurie moved as well by the authoritie & reverence of the mans person, as by the applause and admiration of the people, who wondered at his vertue, besought the Consull, to call forth and cite a centurie of the elder bands: for that they would willingly confer with more auricient men than themselves, and by their sage advise & good direction nominate the Consuls. When those elders were called to this centurie, there was some time allowed for to commune apart secretly with them, within the place railed in, called Ovile. These auncients said unto them; that they were to consult of three persons, whereof two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had borne, to wit, Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus. But verily, (say they) in case ye would have some new Coss. to be chosen, for to be opposed against the Carthaginians, ye have M. Valerius Levinus, a notable man, one who hath performed singular good service, & achieved many noble deeds, both by sea & land against king Philip. So when they had three propounded unto them, the elder were dismissed, and the younger entered into a second scrutinie; and declared for Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his glorie for the late subduing and conquest of Sicilie) and M. Valerius, who was absent. This fore-dome & choise of the prerogative centurie, all the rest followed after, and by their suffrages confirmed. Let them mocke on now and scoffe hereat, all they, that have nothing in admiration, but antiquitie and things done in alder time. For mine owne part, if there be any such citie and commonwealth at all, consisting of wise men and Philosophers, as some great Clerks have rather imagined in their fantasies, than found in effect; I dare be bold to thinke and say, that in it there could not possibly be, either rulers and magistrates more grave and temperate in their desire of dignitie & government, or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it should bee thought an unlikely matter and scarce credible, that a centurie of younger persons, were willing to consult with the elder, & be advised by them, to whom they should give their voices, for to be created the chiefe magistrates; it is the corruption of this our age, that is the cause: wherein we see how small reverence and authoritie, even parents themselves have, and of how slender & base account they be amongst their owne naturall children.

After this, followed the Election of Pretours, wherein were created P. Manlius Volsus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, C. Leclorius, & L. Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished, it fortuned, that newes came, how T. Otacilius (whom the people, as it seemed, would have chosen in his absence, to match T. Manlius in the Consulship, but that the ordinarie course of the election was disturbed and stopped) departed this life in Sicilie. The Apollinare games in the former yeare had been exhibited: and when Calpurnius the Pretour put up a bill, and moved the Senate, that they might be celebrated againe that year also, there passed a decree, That they should be vowed to continue from time to time for ever.

The same yeare certaine prodigious tokens were seene and reported. In the temple of Concordia the Image of Victorie, which stood upon the lanterne and top thereof, was smitten with lightning, and being shaken and driven from the owne place, rested fast upon those other Images of Victorie, that were fixed in the forefront of the said temple, and fell not downe from thence. Word also was brought, That in Anagnia and Fregellæ, the wall and the gates were likewise blasted and stricken with fire from heaven: and that in the market place of Sudertum, there ranne streames of bloud a whole day together: That in Eretum it rained stones; and that in Reate a female mule brought forth a sole. These straunge and wonderfull signes were purged and expiate with greater sacrifices: and a solemne supplication proclaimed; wherein for one day the people should wholly attend their devotions, and pray unto the gods: and likewise a Novendiall sacrifice. In that yeare died certaine publicke Priests of State, and new were chosen in their stead. Caius Levinus in the rounne of M. Pomponius Mitho the High priest: and M. Servilius, to supplie the place of Sp. Carvilius Maximus, the Arch-Angur. And for as much as T. Otacilius Maximus, the Prelat or Bishop, died when the yeare was expired, there was none nominated for to succeed him. C. Claudius the Arch-flamine of Jupiter, lost his Flamineship, and was deprived of that Sacerdotal dignitie, because hee had committed an error in sacrificing, when hee should minister and distribute the inwards of the beast.

About the same time, M. Aemilius Levinus (after hee had by secret conferences sounded aforehand and solicited the minds of the Ætolian Princes and great LL) came with a small fleet of ships lightly appointed, to their generall Diet or councell, summoned before for that purpose onely. In which solemne assemblée, after hee had made declaration, That Syracusa and Capua were woon, and under the protection of the people of Rome, and what good successe they had in the affaires and warres of Italic and discoures besides, That the Romanes, according to their ancient custome, received by tradition from their forefathers, used to respect and make much of their Allies: and namely, That either they received them into the cite of Rome, and endued them with the same franchises that they themselves enjoyed, or els dealt so liberally with them otherwise, that they liked of their condition so wel, as they chose rather to be allies than citizens; he protested and said, That the Ætolians should be much more honoured amongst them, than all others, for that they were the first, that of all forraigne nations beyond sea, entertained league and amitie with them. As for king Philip and the Macedonians, their heauie friends, & dangerous neighbors, he had so daunted their courages, abated their forces, and driven them to that passe, that not onely they were forced to abandon those townes, which by violence they had taken wrongfully from the Ætolians, but also had much adoe themselves to keepe Macedonie it selfe quiet, and without perill of hostilitie: promising withall, That he would bring and reduce the Acarmanians (for whom the Ætolians were so discontented & greeued, that they were dismembred from the bodie of their State) under their ancient form of iurisdiction & seignorie againe. These relations & promises made by the Roman Generall, were confirmed & assured unto them by the authoritie and countenance of Scopas (who for the time was the Pretor or head Magistrat of that State) and of Dorimachus a prince of the Ætolians, who with lesse modestie & greater asseveration and confidencie, extolled and magnified the greatnesse, power, and maiestie of the people of Rome. The principall matter that induced and moved them, was the hope of recovering & keeping Acarmania. Whereupon, there were conditions drawne and engrossed, under which they should ioin in league and friendship with the people of Rome. And this branch was added to the rest of the defazances, That if they were so pleased, and liked well of it, there should be comprised in the same league and privileges, the Eleans and Lacedemonians, together with Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdilius of which three, Attalus was king of Asia the lesse, the other were Princes and Potentates of Illyricum. The articles ran in this forme. Imprimis, That the Ætolians should immediatly make war by land with king Philip. Item, That the Romanes at sea should helpe with 20 galiaces at the least, bearing 5 ranks of oares. Item, As touching all the cities that should be conquered (beginning from Ætolia, so far as to Corcyra) that the ground whereon the cities were seated, the edifices, the walls, and the lands thereto belonging, should bee seized to the use of the Ætolians: all other goods and chattels els, should be a prize for the people of Rome. Item, That if the Ætolians happened to make peace with Philip, it must passe with this clause & proviso, that the peace should stand good upon this condition, That Philip abstaine to make warre upon the Romanes and their Allies, and all those that lived under their dominions. Item, In case the people of Rome fortun'd to peece againe, and be confederate with the king, they should put in a caveat and proviso, that he might have no libertie to warre upon the Ætolians, or their associates. These were the covenants agreed upon: and being faire engrossed two yeares after into a paire of indentures, the one of them remained for the Ætolians in Olympia, the other for the Romanes in their Capitoll, among other sacred records and monuments, for a perpetuall memoriall to all posteritie. The occasion of so great delay, was because the Embassadors of the Ætolians, were staied and kept very long at Rome. But that was no let nor hinderance at all to the proceedings in the warres. For the Ætolians presently made warre upon Philip: and Levinus conquered Zacynthus (a little Iland near to Ætolia, having a cite within it of the same name, which he forced by assault, all save the castle) likewise Oeniadæ and Naxus, which he woon from the Acarmanians before: and all these hee gave to the Ætolians. And supposing that Philip having his hands full of the warre upon his owne frontiers, had no time to thinke upon Italic, and the Carthaginians, and to mind the covenants that passed betwene Anniball and him, he retired himselfe into Corcyra.

Philip lying in winter harbor within Pella, was advertised of the Ætolians revolt. Therefore because

A because he minded at the prime of the Spring to conduct an armie into Greece, to the end that Macedonie and the cities bordering thereupon, should not be molested by the Illyrians, whom he supposed would be at quiet and not stir, if they were once frighted with the harmes of others, he made a sodaine rode and expedition into the marches of the Oricines and Apolloniates: and when the Apolloniates issued forth against him, he repelled them, and with great feare and terror drave them within their walls. After he had wasted the confines next to the Illyrians, he turned his forces with like celeritie and speede into Pelagonia: and then woon by assault a cite of the Dardanians, situate in the frontiers of Macedonia, through which the Dardanians ment to have their passage. And when he had performed these exploits in great hast, not forgetting how the Ætolians & Romanes both maintained war against him jointly, he defended through

B Pelagonia, Nymphæum, and Bolea, into Thessalie: supposing verily that the people of those countries might be incited to wage war together with him against the Ætolians. And leaving there behind him (at the streight of Thessalie) Perseus foure thousand strong, for to debar the Ætolians entrance that way: himselfe in person, before that he should be occupied in greater affaires, led forth his armie into Macedonie, and from thence into Thracia, and so forward against the Medians. That nation was wont to make incursions, and to invade Macedonie, whensoever they could perceive that the king was either busied in other warres, or his realme disunished and slenderly provided of good gard and strong garisons. He began therefore to foray and spoile the territories about Phragandæ, and to assault Lamphorina, the principall cite and chiefe strength of that region Medica.

C Scopas having intelligence that the king was gone into Thracia, and kept there occupied in the warres, put all the serviceable young men of Ætolia in armes, and prepared warre against Acarmania. The nation of the Acarmanians, albeit they were both in strength unequal, and also saw already, that they had lost the walled cite of the Oniades, & Naxus: & knowing well, that the Roman forces would come upon them besides: rather upon anger, than any good counsell and aduicement, made preparation for warre, and resolved to meet them. Their wives and children, and elder persons, such as were above fortie yeares of age, they sent away into Epirus, adjoining neare unto them. Of all that were fiftene yeares old and upward unto threescore, they tooke a solemne oth, that they would never returne backe without victorie. They laid also a heauie curse and criell malediction upon all those of their owne nation: and framed a most humble request, in as effectually tearmes as they could devise, unto all their friends, that none of them should entertaine within their cities, their dores & houses, nor admit to their table, any one of them that were vanquished, & fled out of the field: yea, & besought withall the Epirones, to gather together the dead bodies of as many of them as should chaunce to be slaine in battell, and to enterre them all in one grave, and erect a tombe and monument over them, with an Epitaph and inscription to this effect. Here lie buried and entombed the Acarnanians, who fighting in defence of their country, against the violence and injuries of the Ætolians, lost their lives manfully in the field. By this means, when their courages were enkindled and incensed, they encamped themselves in their utmost frontiers, abiding the coming of their enemies. And having dispatched messengers to Philip, to give notice unto him in what jeopardie they stood, they constrained him to give over that warre which he had in hand, considering, that Lamphorina was surrendered up into his hands, and that he had sped well otherwise in the rest of his affaires. The Ætolians, upon the first fame that was blowne abroad of that solemne oth, taken by the Acarmanians, were well cooled, and not so hasty to set forward: but hearing once of Philip his coming, they were driven to retire againe as farre as possible they could within their owne confines. Neither Philip for his part marched on further than to Cline (notwithstanding, that hee made great speed afore, and tooke long journeys; for feare that the Acarmanians should bee surprised, before hee could reach unto them) for so soone as hee heard, that the Ætolians were retired, hee himselfe also returned into Pella.

F Levinus in the beginning of the spring, tooke the sea, and losed from Corcyra, and having doubled the point of Leucates, and sailed as farre as Naupactum, there hee published and gave knowledge, That hee would shape his course from thence for Anticyra: and that Scopas and the Ætolians should there meet him, and be in readinesse. This Anticyra is situate in Locris, on the left hand, as yee enter into the gulf of Corinth. By land it is a small journey thither from Naupactum, and as short a cut by sea. So within three daies after they began to assault the citie on both sides. The fiercer assault was from the sea side, both because they had in their ships engines of batterie, and other ordinance and artillerie of all sorts; and also, for that the assailants from that part, were Romanes. So within few daies the citie was yeelded up, and delivered againe unto the Ætolians, the pillage thereof fell to the Romanes share, according to covenant. There Levinus received letters from Rome, specifying thus much, That he was declared Consull in his absence, and P. Sulpitius was comming to succcede him in the province: but by occasion that he lay there sick of a long disease, he came to Rome later than all men expected.

M. Marcellus entring his Consulship upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senate that day, only for forme and order sake: for he made open profession there, that during the absence of his Colleague, he would treat of no matters, either concerning the state of the citie, or the provinces. But this protestation he uttered withall and said: That he knew full well that there were many Sicilians in the townes and villages neere unto the citie, backbiters and slanderers of him, whom for his owne part he was so far off from hindering, but that they might freely for all him, divulgate and publish abroad in Rome, all those crimes which were devised and spoken against him by his adversaries, that were it not that they pretended some feare forsooth, to charge the Consull with any matters, in the absence of his colleague, he would straightwaies give them audience in the Senate: but so soone verily as my brother Consull is come home, I will not quoth he, I assure you, suffer any one matter to be debated here, before that those Sicilians besent for into the Senate house. And I understand that M. Cornelius hath taken generall search like a muster over all Sicilie, to the end there might come a number to Rome with complaints of me: he also with letters full of untruths, hath buzzed into all mens eares, and borne the whole citie in hand, that the warre continueth still in Sicilie, and all to diminish and abridge my glory. The Consull having that day woon the commendation and name of one, that knew how to rule and governe his affections, dismissed the Senate: and it seemed that there would be a generall vacation not of law matters only, but of all other things, and as it were holiday still, untill the other Consull came unto the citie. This rest and ydleness (as the wonted manner is) set the commons having nothing els to do, a talking: and now their tongues walked apace, ceasing not to spread rumors, That by this long and continuall warre, not only the lands and territorie about the citie of Rome (especially where Annibal had marched with his cruell armie) were wasted, but also Italie was in maner dispeopled and laid desolat, by reason of so many musters and levies: complaining, that whole armies were diseased and put to the sword at Cannæ in defence of the Common wealth: and that there were two Consuls created, both martiall men, and warriours, over-fierce and eager of fight, such as in time of peace and quietnesse, were able to find occasions of warre: so little was it to be looked for at their hands, that in time of war, they would seeke for peace, and suffer the citie to have any breathing time and intermission. These speeches rumoured among the common people, were interrupted and stayed by occasion of a Scare-fire, that began in sundrie places together about the Forum, in the night of that day, which was immediatly before the festivall daies of Minerva, called Quinquatrus. At one and the selfesame time, the seven merchants shops and ware-houses, which afterwards were turned into five, and the shops of the Bankers and mony changers which now are called Nove (or the new shops) were on fire. Divers private mens houses also the fire caught, for as then there were no stately halles and palaces of the citie there built. Likewise the fire tooke hold of the common prison called Latina, the Fish-market hall likewise, and the royall gallerie or walking place: Hardly could the chappell of Vesta be saved, & that by the good help & paines taking especially of 13 bondslaves; whose bondage was bought out at the cities charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no man made doubt, but it came by mans hand, and was the practise of some lewd persons; for that the fires began in many places at once, and those far distant asunder. Whereupon the Consull by the advice and direction of the Senate, made proclamation in a solemne assembly of the people, that whosoever would come forth and give notice, by whose means that fire was procured, he should be well rewarded: if he were a free-man with a peece of money; if bond, with freedome. In hope of which recompense, certaine slave belonging to the Calavij the Campanes, (his name was Mannus) was induced to bewray the maisters whom he served, and five other yong gentlemen of Capua, whose fathers had lost their heads by the commaundement of Q. Fulvius. Those he appeached to have made the sayd fires: and he gave them a warning besides, that they intended to do more mischief about

A about the citie, if they were let alone, and not apprehended: so they were attached, and their household servants. At the first, these persons made light account both of the informer, and the information they made, and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alledging, that the day before, the partie himselfe being chastised and skourged by his maisters, ran away, and so upon an anger and giddie fit, devised (by occasion of this misfortune which was meere casual) to frame an accusation against his maisters. But when the matter was averred to their teeth in open place, and that they, by whose ministerie the feate was done, were in the mids of the Forum put to the rack, for to utter a truth, then they all made confession of the fact. So as well the maisters that were the setters thereof, as the servants that were privie and accessarie thereto, had their deserts, and suffered for it. The informer who disclosed the villanie, was made free, and had 200000 asses for his labor.

B As the Consull Levinus passed by Capua, in his journey [homeward,] there flocked about him a number of Campanes, and besought him with teares, that they might have leave to go to Rome, and present themselves before the Senate, there to make suite (if happily there were any pitie & commiseration in them) not to destroy them utterly, nor suffer Q. Flaccus to consume the name & generation of the Campanes from off the face of the earth. Now Flaccus for his part, denied flatly that he bare them any private grudge by malice: but only hated the Campanes as the common enemies to the state, and so he would do ever, so long as he knew them so ill affected as they were to the people of Rome: for there was not a nation upon earth, nor a people under heaven more spightfully & deadly bent against the Roman name than they were. And that was the cause (saith he) that he penned them up within their walls. For who soever of them chanced any way to make an escape, they ranged about the country like brute and savage beasts, renting, tearing and killing whosoever came in their way. Some of them are fled to the adverse side unto Annibal: other are gone to Rome to set fire on the citie, and there (quoth he) shal the Consull find the market place halfe burned, and the very prints and tokens remaining fresh of the Campanes mischievous practises. There should he see that they minded to have done violence upon the chappell of Vesta, and to have put out those eternall fires, and utterly defaced the farall pledge of the Roman empire, bestowed and laid up sure in the most secret place of the chappell. Neither thought he it was safe for the citie, to permit the Campanes to come within the walls thereof. Then Levinus having caused the Capuans to take a corporall oath, and sweare unto Q. Flaccus, that they would make returne to Capua before five dayes were expired, after they had their answer and dispatch from the Senate; commaunded them to come after him to Rome. Attended thus as he was with this companie, he encountred the Sicilians also, who came forth to meete him: and with this multitude he entred the citie, accompanied (I say) with the Campanes and Sicilians, both vanquished and subdued by warre, as accusers of two most famous persons, Marcellus, and Fulvius, who had conquered two most noble and renowned Cities, Saracose, and Capua.

But both the Coss. treated and consulted first with the Senat, about the state of the common-wealth, and the government of the provinces. There Levinus related, in what rearmes stood Macedonia and Greece: the Ætolians also, with the Acarnanians and Locrians: likewise what acts he had achieved in those parts both by sea and land; and how he had repulsed Philip backe into Macedonia, when hee beganne to make warre upon the Ætolians, who now was retired and gone into the utmost parts of his kingdome: so as the legion might be withdrawne from thence, for that the armada was sufficient to keepe the king forth of Italie. Thus much spake hee of himselfe, and of the province whereof he had bene governour. Then both Consuls in common, proposed unto the Senate, concerning the province. And the LL. decreed that one of the Consuls should take the charge of Italie, and of the war with Annibal: and the other should have under his hand the armada, whereof T. Octavius was the Admirall; & together with L. Cincius the Pretour, governe the province of Sicilie. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tuskane and in France, consisting of foure legions: whereof two of the former yeare, that were of citizens, should be sent into Tuskane, and those two which the Consull Sulpitius had conducted, should be led into France. Moreover, that he should have the government of France, and the leading of the legions there, whom that Cof. would appoint, whose lot it was to have Italie for his province. Into Tuskane was C. Calpurnius sent, with commission after the teame of the Pretourship expired, to have his full jurisdiction to continue for a yeare. Likewise to Q. Fulvius was assigned the keeping of Capua, and his rule proroged for another year. The armies, as well of citizens as of allies, were by commandment of the Senat abridged and made lesse: so that for two legions ther should be but one, & that, consisting of five thousand footmen, & three hundred horsemen: that they should be discharged of foulderie, who had served longest: that of allies there should be left seven thousand foote, and three hundred horse: with the same respect and consideration of service, in dismissing the old fouldiours. As for Cn. Fulvius the Consull of the former year, he ruled the same province of Apulia still, without any alteration of his forces: only his government was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpitius his Colleague, was commaunded to send away all his armie, only the mariners and sailers excepted. Likewise order was given, that so soone as the new Consull was arrived and landed in the province of Sicilie, the armie there, which was commaunded by M. Cornelius, should be sent out of Sicilie. Vnto L. Cincius the Pretour, were assigned the fouldiours that remained after the defeature at Cannæ, for to keepe Sicilie in order; and those arose to two legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Manlius Volsus the Pretour, for to go into Sardinia, even those whereof L. Cornelius had the leading in the same province the former year. As for the legions of citizens, the Consuls were enjoined to levie and enroll them so, as they entertained no fouldiour of all those who had served in the armie, either of M. Claudius or M. Valerius, or Fulvius: nor exceeded the number that yeare of one and twentie legions of Romans. When these Acts were passed in the Senate-house, the Consuls cast lots for their severall provinces. Sicilie and the armada fell to Marcellus: Italie and the warre against Anniball to Levinus.

This lot that fell to Marcellus, so stricke the Sicilians dead, (who stood in the presence of the Consuls, looking for the event of the lotterie) as if Saracose had bene lost againe: in such sort, as their pittifull lamentations, and their wofull plaints, for the present turned all mens eyes upon them, and anone after, ministred cause of much speech and talke. For they went about to all the Senatours from one to another, in poore and vile aray, protesting that if Marcellus came amongst them againe as L. deputie, they would not onely forsake every man his owne countrie where he was borne, but also abandon the whole Iland of Sicilie: complaining, that without any desert of their parts, heretofore he had bene cruelly bent against them, and his hatred was irreconcilable: and what would hee now do in his choller, and knowing that the Sicilians came to Rome of purpose to make complaints of him? The Iland were better (say they) to bee on a light fire to burne with Aetna; or to be all a very sea, than thus to be exposed as a prey unto a mortall enemie, for to be devoured. These grievous mones and pitteous complaints of the Sicilians, first carried to the houses of the Nobes and great men of the citie, and there taken up & much talked of by many, whiles some pittied the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, spread abroad at length to farre, untill they came to the Counsel-table. And the Consuls were dealt withall, to propose unto the Senat, that they might exchange their provinces one for another. Then Marcellus stood up and said, That in case audience had bene given to the Sicilians already in the Senate house, peradventure hee would deliver his opinion to another purpose: but now least any man might say, that they were bridled for feare, & durst not speake their minds freely, nor complain as they would of him, at whose command, & under whose obedience, they were to be with in a while: he was for his part, readie to make change of his province, if his colleague were as well content, & made no greater scruple of the matter. Only he requested that the Senat would not prejudice his cause. For if at the first (quoth he) it had bene hard and uniuersall, extraordinarily and without casting lots, to give my colleague the free choise of his owne province, how much greater wrong then should I have, nay what disgrace were offered unto me, if my lot should be taken from me and transferred upon him. So for that time, the Senat having made an overture unto Marcellus, what they would have done, rather than by any decree prejudiced the matter, brake up. And the Consuls betwene themselves privatly made exchange one with the other. See the fortune and fatal destinie of Marcellus, that haied him, as it were, to be matched with Anniball, and to fall into his hands: to the end that the same man, who of all the Romanes, was the first that vanquished Anniball in fight, and wan the honor from him: should now in the mids of prosperitie & happie successe of warre, be the last Roman Generall that was laine by Anniball, and yielded the glorie of giving him the overthrow. After the provinces were thus interchaungeably shifted, the Sicilians were brought into the Senat. Where they made a long speech as touching the perpetual & constant faithfulness unto the end, of K. Hiero, towards the people of Rome; & all of the Sicilians against Marcellus.

A to currie favour & gaine thanks unto the whole nation of Sicilie. Recounting, that Hieronymus first, and after him Hippocrates and Epicides, as, for other things, so especially for their revolting from the Romanes, and turning to Anniball, were odious and hatefull unto them. For which cause and nothing else, Hieronymus was by the hands of the chieftaines of their young gallants, as it were by a publike decree of the state, made away and killed, and the noblest of their young gentlemen, to the number of seventie, conspired to murder Hippocrates and Epicides: who being disappointed and put by the effecting of their designment, through the delay of Marcellus (who as at that time before appointed, came notwithstanding his power to Saracose) were appeached, their intended plot revealed, and they all by those tyrants put to death. And yet, to speake a truth, Marcellus himselfe was he that gave the first occasion of the tyrannizing of Hippocrates and Epicides, in that most cruelly he sacked and rifled the Leontines. But from that time forward, the Nobles of Saracose never ceased to come in unto Marcellus, and promised to deliver the citie into his hands, whensoever he pleased. But he, forsooth, at first, stood upon these tearms, that he would rather force it by assault: but afterwards, seeing he could not effect that his purpose, notwithstanding that he had wrought all the devises he could, both by sea & land, he made choise of one Josis accorder, smith, & Meritus a Spaniard, to have them to work & contrive the betraying of the citie, rather than of the principal of the Syracusan nobilitie, who had so often offered that service, & never yet would it be accepted: & alway, because he might pretend some colorable cause of justice, to proceed in all rigor against the most ancient allies of the people of Rome, for to massacre them, and make spoile of all that they had. Set case that Hieronymus had not revolted and gone to Anniball, but the whole people and Senate of Syracusa: Suppose, that the Syracusians in general, by publike consent had shut the gates against Marcellus, and not their Tyrants Hippocrates and Epicides, when they had the Syracusians sure ynough under their owne hands: Say they had warred against the people of Rome with as spitefull & cankered malice as the Carthaginians doe, and ever did: what greater hostilitie could Marcellus possibly have exercised against them more than he hath, unless he would destroy & rase the citie to the very ground? Surely hee hath left nothing in Syracusa but the bare walls, the naked & empie houses of the citie, the temples & chapels of the gods defaced & broke open, for the gods themselves, with all the rich & gorgeous ornaments are caried away. Many a man is spoiled & robbed of his goods, in such sort, as having nothing left him but the bare soile, they are not able when all is gone, with his leavings to maintein themselves, and sustaine their wives and children. They were humble petitioners therefore, & suppliant suiters unto the LL. of the Senate, to take order, that restitution might be made unto the rightful owners, if not of all (for that is impossible) yet of so much at least, as was to bee found, and might be truly owned againe.

After these and such like complaints, Levinus the Consull commaunded them to goe forth of the counsell house, to the end, that the LL. might bee consulted with, and deliver their opinions concerning their demands. Nay marrie (quoth Marcellus) let them stay still rather, that I may answer to their very faces: seeing, my LL. our case and condition is so hard, who warre and fight for you, that we must have those to enforce against us, and be our accusers, whom wee have conquered and subdued by martiall armes. Let it even bee so, that two cities, to wit, Capua and Syracusa, woon this yeare, may convent judicially both their conquerours, the one Fulvius, the other Marcellus. When the Embassadors were brought back againe into the Senat house, then began Marcellus the Consull, and spake in this wise.

I am not so farre overseene, and forgetfull, my Lords, either of the majestie of the people of Rome, or of this place of command which I now hold, that I would plead mine owne cause, Consull as I am, against these Grecians, my accusers, in case the question were of any crime or fault of mine owne. But all the controversie to be discussed, standeth not upon these tearmes, to examine what I have done, whom the right of warre will justifie and beare out, howsoever I have proceeded against enemies: but what these men have deserved to suffer. If they were not enemies, nor so to bee reputed, then it mattered not, and it had ben all one, either now or in the life time of king Hiero, to have forced Syracusa. But if it appeare, that they have revolted, that they have evill intreated our Embassadors, threatened to lay violent hands, & to run upon them with sword and force of armes; that they have manned their walls, and shut their gates upon us; that they have maintained the armie of the Carthaginians against us: who can bee grieved and offended, if they have suffered as enemies, who stucke not first to offer all hostilitie whatsoever? Rejected

Rejected

Rejected I the Nobles of Syracusa when they would have delivered the citie into my hands: And made I more account of Sosis, and Mericus the Spaniard, and thought them worthie to be trusted in so important a matter: Yee are not, I am sure, the meanest of the Syracusians, that thus reproch others with baseness of estate. Who was it of all you here, that promised to open mee the gates: that undertooke to receive my armed souldiours into the citie? Nay, nay, ye hate and curse them in your heart, who have so done; and even in this place cannot forbear to give them hard tearmes, & reyle them: so unlike it is, that you your selves ever meant to have done any such thing. Even this abject condition and base calling of theirs, my LL. which these men twit them with, is a manifest token, and a most evident argument, that I refused none, that was willing to do good service unto our state and Commonweale. At the very first, before I laid siege unto Syracusa, I assailed by all means to have peace; one while sending Embassadors unto them, other whiles going in person to parle with them. Afterwards, seeing that without all reverence of Embassadors, they shamed not to offer them abuse; without regard of my selfe, they deigned me no answer when I came to the gates, and conferred with their cheefe Nobilitie: after much travell, toile, and infinite paines, sustained both by land and sea, at length by fine force and hote assault, I became maister and Lord of Syracusa. Now as touching that which hath befallen unto them, since they were overcome, and lost their citie; I would suppose they had more reason, and juster cause to make their mone, and complaine unto Anniball and the Carthaginians, those that are likewise conquered, than before the Senate of the people of Rome their conquerour. For mine owne part, my LL. if I had ever meant to denie and disavow the spoiling and sacking of Syracusa, and not to stand to it when I had done, I would never have ben so ill advised, as to beautifie and adorn the citie of Rome with the spoils therof. And what I have given or forgiven unto any particular person, I am assured that I may well justifie and avow the same, both by the law of war, and also by the desert of every one. Now, my LL. whether yee will approve and ratifie my doings, or no; it concerneth and toucheth the Commonweale rather than my selfe. My part I have done, and discharged my dutie faithfully. It much importeth now the State, that by reverting (as it were) and disannulling mine actions, yee make not your other Generals from henceforth, to be more slacke and backward in the like employment. To conclude my LL. since that ye have heard both my selfe and the Sicilians speake our minds face to face, we will all together goe out of this temple, that in my absence the Senat may more frankly speake to the point, and deliver their opinions. Thus the Sicilians were dismissed, and he himselfe went forth also to the Capitoll, for to take a levie of souldiours.

The other Consull in the meane time, put to question the demands of the Sicilians before the LL. Much canvassing a long while, and discussing there was of the matter, and divers opinions passed. Many of the Senatours following T. Manlius Torquatus the head and principall man, that maintained a side, were of this mind, That they should have made warre against the tyrants, the common enemies as well to the Syracusians, as to the State of Rome. And as for the citie, it was (say they) rather recovered and received, than wonn by force: and being so received, it was to be re-established in her owne auncient lawes and freedome, and not after it was so wearied with miserable servitude, to be scourged and afflicted with warre upon it. But between the warring of the tyrants of the one side, and the Romane Generall of the other, a most beautifull and noble citie, standing in the midst (as a prise and reward for the winner) is undone by the means; even that citie which sometime had been the garner (as it were) & the treasure-houise of the people of Rome: by the munificent liberalitie and bountie whereof, by whose rich presents and goodly gifts our citie many a time and oft, yea & but of late daies in this Punick war, hath ben relieved & adorned. Liking Hiero should arise again from the dead & come among us, Hiero (I say) the most faithful maintainer of the Roman state, with what face could we shew unto him, either Saracose or Rome? When he should see of one side, his own native cuntry, halfe rased and wholly spoiled: and on the other side, comming to Rome, in the very entring of the citie, and hard at the gate, should behold the spoiles of his own citie? Notwithstanding these & such like speeches cast out among them, to procure ill will and hatred to the Consull, and to move pittie and compassion to the Sicilians, yet the LL. of the Senate in favour of Marcellus, agreed upon a milder decree, and enacted, That whatsoever he had done, either during the warre, or after conquest, should be ratified and allowed for good: Item, for the time to come, the Senate would take order and provide for the good of the Syracusians, and give the Consull Levinus a speciall charge, to have regard

A gard of the welfare of that cittie, so far forth, as might not be prejudiciall to the state of Rome. Then were two Senatours sent into the capitoll to the Consull, to request him to repaire againe unto the assembly of the Senate: and after the Sicilians also were admitted into the place, their act and decree aforesaid was openly read. The Embassadors had good words given them, and were dismissed: whereupon they fell downe prostrate at the feet of Marcellus the Consull, beseeching him to pardon that which they had spoken, either to bewaile, or to ease their calamitie; and to receive both them in particular, and the cittie of Saracose in generall, unto his mercifull protection. After this, the Consull with gracious words licenced them to depart.

When the Sicilians had their dispatch, the Campanes had audience given them in the Senate: and as their speech was more lamentable, so the cause was heavier, and harder to be digested: for neither could they themselves denie, but that they deserved condign punishment: nor Tyrants had they any, upon whom they might lay the blame. But they thought they had suffered enough for their finnes already, in that so many of their Senatours died by poison, and so many lost their heads. Some few of their nobilitie and but a few remained yet alive, who as they were not touched in conscience, nor so faultie, as to lay violent hands upon themselves, so the Consull in his furious wrath, adjudged them not worthy of death: they therefore made humble suite for themselves, their wives and children, to obtaine freedome, and to enjoy some part of their owne goods, being, as they were, mere citizens of Rome, and most of them by affinitie and neere kinned, upon mutuall and crosse mariages, linked in alliance and bloud to the Romanes. After that they also were willed to void out of the Senat house: for a while, there grew some question and doubt, whether Q. Fulvius should be sent for from Capua (for presently upon the taking of the citie, Claudius the Consull died) that this matter might be argued and discussed in presence of the Generall himselfe, like as the other had bene reasoned of and debated betweene Marcellus and the Sicilians. But afterwards when they saw in the Senat house M. Attilius, and C. Fulvius, the brother of Flaccus, both his Lieutenants: likewise Q. Minutius, and L. Velutius Philo, Lieutenants unto Claudius, who had bene present in all actions, and were eye-witnesses of every thing: and besides, were unwilling that either Fulvius should be called away from Capua, or the Campanes longer delayed: M. Attilius Regulus, who of all them that had bene at the service of Capua, was of greatest authoritie and reputation, being demanded his opinion, spake in this wise.

I take it (quoth hee) when Capua was newly woon, I was one of counsell with the Consuls there, when question was asked, and enquire made, Whether any one Campane had deserved well of us and our Commonweale. And found it was, that two women onely, to wit, Vetia Oppia, come in Atellae, but dwelling then at Capua, & Faucula Cluvia, sometime a common strumpet and curtizane, were well willers unto us. The former of these twain daily sacrificed for the welfare, life, and victorie of the Romanes: the other, secretly sustained the poore and needie Romane captives with food and victuals. As for all other Campanes, from the highest to the lowest, they were no better affected unto us, than the Carthaginians. And even those, who were beheaded by Quintus Fulvius, suffered death, not because they were more faultie than others, but for that they were of greater marke and calling than the rest. Now, that the Senate should decide the cause of any Campanes, who are enfranchised denisons of Rome, without a graunt from the people, I see not how it can bee. For in our forefathers time the like case was of the Saticanes that rebelled: and then M. Anisilius, a Tribune of the Commons, first put up a bill, & the Commons afterwards passed it, namely, That the Senate might have power and auctoritie, to give their opinion, and determine of the Saticanes. Therefore I am of mind, that we deale with the Tribunes of the Commons, that one or more of them, preferre a bill unto the Commons, by virtue whereof wee may bee authorized to set downe some order for the Campanes. Then L. Attilius, a Tribune of the Commons, by leave and advise of the Senate, propofed unto the Commons a bill in this forme and manner. WHEREAS THE CAMPANES, ATELLANES, CALATINES, AND SABATINES, WHO HAVE YEELDED THEMSELVES UNTO FULVIUS THE PRO-CONSULL, TO BE AT THE PLEASURE AND DEVOTION OF THE PEOPLE; OR ROME: ALL THAT ALSO, VVHICH THEY HAVE SURRENDERED TOGETHER WITH THEMSELVES, AS WELL THEIR TERRITORIE AS THEIR CITIE, AS ALL UTENSILS, BOTH SACRED AND PROFANE, THEIR NECESSARIE IMPLEMENTS, AND AL OTHER THINGS WHATSOEVER, I DEMAND YOUR VVIL AND PLEASURE, O QUIRITES, WHAT SHALL

BE DONE VVITH THE PREMISES? The Commons after deliberation, gave their voyces to the said bill in this forme. OUR VVIL AND PLEASURE IS, THAT VVHATSOEVER YE THE SENATOIRS, VVHO NOVW ARE SET IN COUNSELL, OR THE MOST PART OF YOU THINKE GOOD AND DETERMINE, SHAL STAND FOR IUST AND LAWFULL. Vpon this graunt or Act of the Commons, the Senate by a decree awarded unto Oppia and Cheria, first their owne goods and libertie: and moreover if they were desirous to crave farther reward at the Senates hand, they were best to repaire unto Rome. For every familie and severall house of the Campanes, there were speciall acts and decrees made, all which to repeate and rehearse, would not quit the labour. Some had their goods confiscate: themselves, their children and wives were to be sold, excepting those their daughters which were wedded, before that they came under the subjection of the people of Rome. Others were to be clapt up in prison, untill farther order were taken for them hereafter. Moreover, of some Campanes they made distinction by valuation of their wealth, whether their goods were to be confiscate or no. All their beafts and cartails which were taken, save horses; all their bondslaves, but males fourteene yeres of age and upward, all moveable goods also which were not annexed and fastned to the soyle, they awarded for to be restored to the true owners. All Campanes, Atellanes, Calatines, Sabellanes, excepting those, who either themselves, or whose parents tooke part and sided with the enemies, they judged to be free: provided always, that none of them were either Free-denizens of Rome, or of Latium. Item it was enacted, that none of all them who had bene at Capua whiles the gates were shut, should remaine either in the citie or territorie of Capua, within a certaine day prefixed: but should have a place set out unto them for to dwell in, on the farther side of Tyberis, so it were not upon the very banke close unto Tyber. As for those that during the time of warre had bene neither at Capua nor in any other citie of Campanie, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this side the river Liris betweene it and Rome: but such as were turned and passed to the Romanes side, before that Anniball came unto Capua, they should be transplanted on the hither side of Vulturinus the river: provided, that none of them should possesse either house or land within fiftene miles of the sea. As concerning them who were displaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tybre, neither they nor their heires and successors for ever, should purchase and hold house or land in any place, but in the territorie either of Veij, Sutrium, or Nepefium: but so, as they exceeded not the stint of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and charrels of all the Senatoirs, or such as had borne Magistracie in Capua, Atella, or Calatia, they awarded that sale should be made thereof in Capua. As for those that were free borne, and whose bodies were to be sold, they should be sent to Rome, and there set a sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of brasse, which were said to have bene woon and taken from the enemies, whether they were sacred or profane, they referred to the Colledge of the Priests and Prelates, to determine thereof at their discretion. Thus they gave the Campanes their dispatch, and sent them away much worse apaid for these decrees, than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruell proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquitie and unjust dealing of the very gods, and their owne cursed fortune together.

After the Sicilians and Campanes were dismissed, there was a muster taken: and when an armie was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and rowers to furnish the gallees. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Consuls could neither raise men enow, nor yet find monie at that time in the chamber of the citie, for to presse and hire them, and pay their wages withall: they published an edict, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subsidie booke, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should as aforetime find rowers at their owne charges, and mainteine them with meate and money for thirtie dayes. Vpon which edict and proclamation, all men so grumbled and muttered, and were so highly discontented and angry, that they wanted an head and captain; rather then matter and occasion of a mutinie and insurrection: geving out, That the Consuls had taken a course, and were in the very traine to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they had alreadye the Sicilians and the Campanes. For thus many yeares they have bene pilled, polled, cleane spent and consumed with exaction of tributes, and had nothing left them but the bare ground, and the same lying wast and untilld. As for their houses upon their lands, the enemies had burned: their servants and hines, such as should husband and till their

A their grounds, the commonwealth had bereaved them of: one whiles buying them up to the warre, for some small peece of money: otherwhiles levying and pressing them to the seas to be gallic-slaves, for a thing of nothing. A man could not so soone get one brasse farthing, or single silver denere before hand, but it went by and by either for gallic-pay, or for yeerely tribute. And to give that now which they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commaundement whatsoever. Let them sell and make an hand of their goods, imptison and punish their bodies too, when all is gone besides; seeing there is nothing left them to ransom and redeeme, the same againe. These and such like words were not only muttered in huggermugger, but uttered also and geven out in broad termes even in the market place and before the Consuls, by the multitude that flocked and gathered together in exceeding great numbers: in such sort, as the Consuls were not able with all that ever they could do, to appease the mutinie, neither by sharp rebukes, nor faire words and comfortable speeches: Then they said, that they would give and allow them three dayes respite for to thinke and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed wholly and employed in taking a view and survey of their goods, and making dispatch and riddance thereof out of the way. The next day the Consuls called the Senate together to consult about the supplie of rowers, and gallic-slaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make deniall; at length the drift of all their speech was this, That whether it were right or wrong, the burden must lye on private mens shoulders, there was no remedie: for seeing therewas no monie in the common chest, how should mariners and rowers els be gotten and levied? And without Armadaes, how possibly should either Sicilie be held still in possession, or Philip be kept out of Italie? or the sea coasts of Italie remaine in safetie and securitie? In these distresses and difficulties the Counsell being perplexed, and to seeke for remedie; and whiles every mans wits were in the waine and so confused, as if they were benumbed and stone cold: Then Levinus the Consul, As the Magistrate (qd. he) goeth before the Senat in place of honor, and the Senate likewise before the common people in worth & dignitie: so they ought in all difficulties & hard occurrences to undergo the weightiest burdens first, and be the foremen and leaders in all dangerous adventures whatsoever. For if a man would enjoyne his inferiors to beare some grievous and heave load, let him first take it up himselfe, yea and impose the same upon his owne traine and companie: all the rest then, will be more willing and obedient to follow after, and do the semblable. And never will they grutch at any cost or charges, when they see their leaders and rulers take more upon themselves, than they are well able to weeld and susteine. To the end therefore that the people of Rome may be provided and furnished of a fleet rigged and trimmed, as our desire is, and that private persons may not thinke much, nor refuse to find rowers thereunto; let us first that are heere commaund our owne selves: let us, I say, that be Senatoirs, bring abroad in common all the gold, all the silver, all the brasse coine that we have, so as every man reserve rings only for himselfe, his wife and children: and a little tablet or lewell for his sonne, as a pendant to hang about his neck. Also let all them that have wives or daughters, receive still one ounce weight of * gold, and * one pound of silver: And as many as have borne office of State, and sitten in the yvorie chaire, keepe still the trappings and caparison of their horses, and two pound weight a peece, the one of gold, the other of silver; for to have a saltellar, and a little boll or cup, to sacrifice & offer unto the gods withall. As for the rest of the Senatoirs, let us leave them but one pound weight of silver, and no gold at all, and five thousand * Asses in coine, to every housholder a peece. All other gold, silver, and brasse money besides, let us forthwith bring abroad and present unto the Triumvirs or publicke bankers, before that we make or enact any decree of Senate: to the end, that our good example in this voluntarie benevolence and contribution, and our earnest endeavour to helpe the Common-weale, may stirre up and provoke the hearts and affections, first of those that are by calling gentle men and knights of Rome, and then forward the rest of the commons, to imitate and follow us with some emulation. This is the onely meanes which we that are Consuls have thought upon and devised, after much talke and conference together. Set to therefore, my masters, in the name of God, and lead the way: God will blesse your good beginnings. So long as the cittie standeth on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need to feare his private state; but it shall do well enough. Go the weale publike to wrecke once, and decay, let no man ever thinke to save his owne. All the whole house liked so well of these motions, that not onely they gave their accord accord and consent thereto, but over and besides, yielded heartie thanks unto the Consuls for their good advice and counsell. When the Senate was dismissed, every man for himself brought forth his gold, his silver, and brasse money, and laid all together in commune; & that with such speed, striving a vie who could go before another, and have his name entred first in the publicke rolles and registers: as neither the foresaid Triumvirs were able to receive it fast enough, as it was tendred unto them; nor the ordinarie Clerkes and Notaries to set it downe in writing, & take note thereof accordingly. This consent and agreement of the Senatours, the knights & gentlemen of Rome in their place and calling seconded; and the commons for their parts were not behind. So without any constraint of law, without edict, without any exhortation made by the magistrate, the common-weale wanted neither rowers for to furnish the armadaes, nor money to pay the rowers. And thus when all things were provided necessarie for the warres, the Consuls went forth to their severall provinces. H

Never was there any time of this warre, wherein Carthaginians and Romanes together, had more triall of the alternative & variable change of fortune: never hung they more in equall balance, betwene faire hope and fearefull daunger. The Romanes, in their provinces tasted both of sweet and soure. In Spaine on the one side, they sped ill and lost: in Sicilie on the other side, they sped well and woon: so as their sorrow was interlaced still and medled with joy. Also in Italie, the losse of Tarentum turned to their woe and damage: but the keeping of the castle there with the garrison, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them meed and comfort for their sorrow. Also, their suddaine fright and feare, for the siege and assault of the citie of Rome, was salved and cured againe within a few daies after, by the forcing and winning of Capua: and all that heaviness and mourning turned into mirth and gladnesse. The affaires also beyond sea, were checked with interchangeable turnes and courses. Philp became their enemy in an ill time, and when they had little need thereof. Contrariwise, the Ætolians and Attalus the king of Asia the lesse, proved to be their new friends and loving allies: whereby even then fortune, seemed to smile on the Romanes, and by that overture, promised as it were, unto them the Empire of the East. Semblably the Carthaginians, as they lost Capua, so they woon Tarentum, and made a saving game of it. In like manner, as they tooke no small pride and glorie, in coming to the wals of Rome without resistance; so they were daunted & dismayed againe, that this their enterprise tooke no better effect in the end: and held themselves much disgraced and dishonoured, that whiles they sat themselves before one gate of Rome, there was an armie of Romanes led forth at another, and sent into Spaine. And even in Spaine also, the greater hopemen had there, that upon the death of two so noble and valiant Generals, and the defeature of two as puissant armies, the war was come to a finall end, and the Romanes driven from thence for ever: the more spight it was, and the greater griefe and vexation they conceived againe, when by the valour of L. Martius a tumultuarie captaine, chosen in hast they knew not how, those former victories turned to vanities, and came to just nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, & all things doubtfull & wavering in suspence, both on the one side and the other. Their hope all one as it was at first: their feare, the same still, neither more nor lesse. So as betwene hope and feare, they fared, as it the warre at this time were new to begin.

Anniball above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua being more hotely and eagerly assaulted by the Romanes, than manfully and faithfully defended by him, had divered & turned away the harts of many States of Italie from him. For neither was he able to hold them all with sufficient garrisons, unlesse he would dismember into many small portions, and mangle by peece-meal his armie; which to do then, was no good policie: nor he thought it safe & good, to withdraw his garrisons from thence, & leave the fidelitie of his allies at libertie, either to depend upon fickle hope, or to sway with suddaine feare. And (as he was by nature covetous and cruelly minded) he resolved at length upon this course, to make spoile of those cities which hee was not able to keepe, and so to leave them wast and emptie for the enemy. This designement was not so dishonest and shamefull in the first enterprise, but it proved as bad & hurtfull to himselfe in the effect and conclusion. For he lost the hearts cleane, not onely of those that were the parties grieved, and suffered these indignities, but also of all others besides. The present calamitie and losse touched but some few: but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Romane Consull behind hand for his part, to sollicite and sound those cities, from whence he saw some light appeare, and any hope to gaine them unto him.

There

A There were in Salapia two noble men above the rest, Dasius and Blasius. Dasius was friend to Anniball, Blasius (so farre as he might with safetie) affected and favoured the Romanes. And by entercourse of secret messengers, had put Marcellus in some good hope of betraying the citie; but without the helpe of Dasius the plot could not be compassed and effected. Wherefore, after much musing and long deliberation, after many staies & delaies, at length he resolved (for want rather of better counsell, than upon any hope to speed) to addresse himselfe to Dasius, & acquaint him with the matter. But Dasius not onely misliking utterly & abhorring the thing, but also carrying a secret enmitie to the partie himselfe, the onely eye-sore and concurrent that he had, striving to be greater than he, disclosed all to Anniball. Whereupon, both were sent for, and convenient peremptorily before him. As Anniball was sitting upon the Tribunal seat, giving audience and dispatch to certaine other matters; and that hee might anone the better attend unto Blasius and the action intended against him: whiles the plaintife & defendant stood apart by themselves from the rest of the people a good way, Blasius went in hand again with Dasius, and sollicit-ed him for to deliver the citie to the Romanes. With that, Dasius (as if the matter had beene too too apparant) cried out and said, That he bashed not to breake unto him and move him, even in the presence and sight of Anniball, for to practise treason & betray the citie. Anniball and all they that were there present, gave little credite unto Dasius: and the more audacious the thing it selfe was, the lesse likelyhood it caried with it of a truth. Every man supposed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envie, and cancred malice, that caused Dasius to charge upon him that crime, which because there was no witnesse to the contrarie, he might untruly devile and more freely enforce against him. And so for that time, they were both discharged the court. But Blasius never gave over to follow still this bold enterprise, but beat still upon this one point, shewing how good and commodious the thing would bee, both to themselves in private, and to their countrie in common, untill hee had wrought him so, and woon him to graunt, that the Carthaginian garrison, (& those were Numidians) together with the citie Salapia, should be rendred unto Marcellus. But without much bloudshed they could not possibly be thus betrayed & delivered: for they were the most hardy and valiant horsemen by farre, of all the Carthaginian armie. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a suddaine unprovided, and had no use of horses within the citie, yet with such weapons, as in such a suddaine tumult and uprore they could catch and come by, first they assaied and gave the venture to breake through and escape away: and when they saw that they could by no meanes save themselves and get forth, they fought it out to the last manfully, even unto death: so as there were not of them above fiftie left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And surely, the losse of this cornet of horsemen, was a greater damage unto Anniball, than the forgoing of Salapia: for never from that day forward, had Anniball the upper hand in cavaleric, which was the onely service whereby ever before he most prevailed.

Much about the same time the castle of Tarentum was streightly distressed for want of victuals, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Romane garrison had, which lay there, and the captaine thereof M. Livius the Constable of the castle, was in the provision sent out of Sicilie. For the safe convoy whereof, along the coast of Italie, there rid at anker a fleet whereof of twentie saile before Rhegium. The Admirall of this fleet appointed to waite these victuals from time to time, was one Decius Quintius, a man of obscure birth and base parentage, howbeit, for many worthie acts and feats of armes, much renowned in martiall glorie.

At the first he had the charge but of five ships, whereof two of the greatest, which were three banked gallies, were allowed him by Marcellus: afterwards, upon his good service, when hee had born himselfe bravely in many conflicts, he had three more committed unto him, & those were of five banks of oares, untill at last himselfe, by calling upon the confederat cities, as Rhegium, Velia, and Pastum, for the ships due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a pretie Armada, as is above said, of twentie saile. As this fleet had disankered and was gone from Rhegium, Democrates with the like Armada for number of Tarentine ships, encountered almost five leagues from the citie of Tarentum, at a port called Sacriportus. It fortuned at that time, that the Roman Admirall, litle looking for any battell, came forth under saile onely, but about Crotone and Sibaris, he had furnished his shippes with rowers also, and so his fleet for the bignesse & talnesse of the vessels, was well appointed, and sufficiently armed & manned. And even then it happened at one time, that both the boisterous wind lay, and the enemies also were withip kenning, so as they had scarce time ynough to fit their tackling, to make readie their rowers, and to set in order their fighting men, against a skirmish that was so neere toward. There was not lightly scene a greater conflict, fought more hotely and fiercely betwene two roiall Armadaes that affronted one another, than between these small fleets. For why, the battell was for a greater matter, than all their ships came to. The Tarentines mainteined the fight more eagly, because they were desirous to recover their castle out of the Romans hands, as they had done their citie, after one 100 yeares almost, during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof: hoping thereby, if they could be maisters of the sea once by some fortunate and victorious battell, to cut off and intercept all hope of victuals from the enemies. The Romanes on the other side bestirred themselves as lustily, that by keeping the possession of the castle, all the world might see, that Tarentum was not lost by force, cleane strength and valour, but betrayed by stealth and trecherie. H So they sounded the battell from both parts, and ran affront one at another, with the beakes and stemmes of their prowes, and neither staid rowing amaine forward, nor suffered their enemy to part or goe aside from them, untill they closed and grappled their ships together, by the meanes of yron hookes like hands. And so neere they buckled, in hote and furious medley, that not only they discharged shot aloofe one against another, but also they coped together (as it were) foot to foot, at hand strokes with sword fight. Their prowes and for-ships stucke grappled together, while the pousps and hin-deckes were driven about with contrarie oares of the aduerse part. So neere and so thicke withall stood the ships, and within so narrow a rounge, that scarce one dart light into the water in vaine, and did no harme. With their beake-heads they assailed one another, as it had been on land fight, and so close they were, that the souldiours might passe out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two ships there were above all the rest, that mainteined a notable fight, and in the vauntguard and forefront of the battell, invetted one another most furiously. In that of the Romanes was Quintius himselfe in person, & in the other of the Tarentines, was one Nico, surnamed Peco, a man not only odious unto the Romans, for the publick quarrell betwene both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private spight and rancour, as banding with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Anniball. This Nico espying Quintius both fighting & also encouraging his men withall, charged him at unwares; & ran him quite through with a partiufane: who was not so soone fallen forward headlong upon the fore-deck, armour and all, but the Tarentine following the traine of his victorie, and seeing the ship disordered & troubled for the losse of their leader, lustily came forward, and borded her; laid about him manfully, K and put by the enemies out of his way, untill the Tarentines were maisters of the prow and fore-castle. Whiles the Romanes had much adoe (so thrumbed they were and thrust together disorderly) to defend and keepe the poupe and hind-decke; with that, another gallie of the enemies appeared on a suddaine, and charged the hind-part. So the Roman ship in the midst between both, was boarded on every side, and taken. Whereupon all the rest were greatly terrified, seeing the Admirall-ship was woon by the enemy: and they fled on all hands. Some were sunck in the deepe sea, some made hast with their oares, and skudded to the land, but anon were a prize and prey to the Thurines and Metapontines. But of the hulkes and Carickes, which were fraught with victuall, and followed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies: the rest shifting and turning their sailes crosse, this waies and that waies, according to the inconstancie of the wind, recovered the maine sea. L

But about Tarentum at the same time, their fortune was nothing so good. For whereas there went out of the towne upon a foure thousand men a foure foraging, for to purvey corne, Livius, Constable of the castle and captaine of the garison, spying his time (as hee waited ever for all opportunities) made out of the said castle 2000 armed souldiours, under the leading of C. Persius a valourous and industrious man: who set upon the Tarentines straggling out of order, and dispersed in wandering wise over the fields; and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountered them; the rest, which were but few left of so many, he chased to the towne: for they made hast in great feare thither, & were let in at the gates standing halfe shut, for feare least at the same randon the towne should have been lost. So the Tarentines and Romans, when they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were winners by land, the Tarentines at sea: and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corne, which was presented to their eyes, but they never tasted thereof.

At the same time Levinus the Confull, after a good part of the yeer was gone about, arrived in

A in Sicilie, greatly expected and looked for, as well by the old allies as the new: and the first thing of all other and most important, he supposed, was together with this new peace, to settle & compose the State of Syracuse, so much disordered and out of frame. After that, hee led his legions to Agrigentum, where only there remained the reliques of warre; which cittie was kept by a strong garrison of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his first designs, Hanno chaunced to be the generall over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and reposed all his hope in Mutines and the Numidians. This Mutines had raunged all over Sicilie at his pleasure, and raised booties out of the territories and lands of the Romanes associates, & by no force or policie could he be intercepted of his passage backe to Agrigentum, nor yet bee pinned within the cittie, but that he would issue forth whensoever hee listed. This glorie of his, because now it checked (as it were) the same and honour of the Generall, turned the man at length to displeasure and danger: so as, what good service soever was atchieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, nor joyously accepted, in regard of the person, who was a pricke alwaies in his eie. Whereupon in the end hee gave away the captainship of Mutines from himselfe, and bestowed it upon his owne son: thinking, that together with his government and command, hee should loose all his authoritie and reputation also among the Numidians. But it fell out farre otherwise. For the more that hee was in disgrace and disfavovr with Hanno, the greater grew the old favor and love of the Numidians toward him. Neither could hee himselfe endure any longer the unworthie wrong and indignitie offered unto him: and therefore in revenge he presently dispatched certain secret messengers unto Levinus, with credence, that hee would betray and deliver Agrigentum into his hands. By the mediation of these intercouriers, there passed sufficient securitie and assurance between them: and the matter being concluded, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were possessed, and had the guard of that gate that openeth toward the sea: after they had either driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the citie, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midst of the citie, even to the market place, with banner displayed, & with great tumult and noise, Hanno supposing it was nothing els, but a seditious uprising of the Numidians (like as they had done sometimes before) came forth as to appease and stay a mutinie and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude a far off, than the Numidians were: and hearing withall the Romans to shout, with the manner wherof his ears had D been well acquainted beforetime, heeooke him to his heeles ere hee came within the dart-shot. And being let out at a backe poslerne gate, taking with him Epicides, hee recovered with some few other the sea side, where, as good hap was, they light upon a small barke or pinnace: and so leaving Sicilie to the enemies, for which there had been much strife so many yeares together, they passed over into Africk. The multitude besides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmish either begun or intended, fled like blind men they will not whether: and finding all waies made up, and no passage forth, they were miserably slaine: and hewen apieces about the gates. Levinus being possessed of the towne, caused all the cheefe men and rulers of the citie, to be beaten with rods, and to lose their heads: all the rest together with the pillage hee sold in port-sale, and the monie that was reised thereof, hee sent to Rome.

E When the newes of this misfortune of the Agrigentines was blowen over Sicilie, all at once turned Romanes, and Anniball lost all. For in short space there were 20 townes betrayed and yeelled, sixe forced by assault, and to the number of 40 voluntarily surrendered to the devotion and protection of the Romanes. The principall noble men of which States, after that the Consuls had either rewarded or punished according to their severall demerits, and compelled the Sicilians generally to lay by armes and weapons, and to take themselves to the plough, for to eare, till, and sow their grounds; to the end that the lland might bring forth fruite, not only to susteine and mainteine the naturall inhabitants thereof, but also to ease the price of corne and victuals in the citie of Rome, and throughout all Italie, like as it had done many times before: hee transported over with him into Italie a rable and damned crew of unruly people from Agatirna. Some foure thousand there were of them, a confused multitude of all sorts, a very mish mash and sinke of vile and wretched persons, most of them Outlawes, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the lawes of their cities where they lived. And being fled their countries, some for one fact, some for another, they chaunced all upon like fortune to fort themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will flye together,) and at Agatirna, they made choise like out-lawes, lawes, to live by robbing and spoiling: and this was their only profession and trade. Levinus G thought it no good policie to leave behind him these good fellows in an Iland, which began but now upon new peace to knit and unite againe; for feare least they would minister matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good use of them among the Regines, for to foray and rove about the Brutians countrie: for such they stood in need of, and had laid for a companie which were acquainted with theeving and stealing. And so this yeare made an end of the war in Sicilie.

of the

P. Scipio L. Deputie and Generall in Spaine, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his ships to sea and set them afloat, and by an edict summoned all the aides of the allies to repaire to the Rendezvous at Taracon; gave order and commandement, that as well the ships of warre as of charge and burden, should from thence set forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the river Iberus. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter harboroughs, should there meete together, himselfe accompanied with five thousand of his allies put himselfe on his journey to his maine armie. Being thither come, he thought it good to make some speech to the old souldiours especially, as many as remained alive after so great diffitures and overthrowes, and when he had assembled them all together to an audience, in this wise he spake unto them. Never was there new Generall before my selfe, that could by good right, and in regard of desert, render thanks unto his souldiours, before he had employed them, and made triall of their good service. But as for me, before I ever came within sight of this province, before I entered my government and saw the camp, fortune hath obliged me, and made me beholden unto you. First, for your kinnesse and zealous affection to my father and to mine unkle, both while they lived, and when they were dead. Secondly, in that when the possession of this province was lost; after so great foyles and overthrowes, ye have by your vertue and valour recovered the same againe, and kept it entire to the behoofe of the people of Rome, and my selfe, the next successor in place of soveraigne rule and command. But for as much as our full purpose and present resolution is, by the leave, favour, and power of the gods, not so much to hold the possession our selves and abide in Spaine, but to dispossesse the Carthaginians that they may have no footing nor abode at all there: and since the thing that we go about, is not to stand keeping the banke of Iberus, for to stop the passage of the enemy; but to geve the attempt to passe over our selves by force: yea and therewithall to transport the warre over with us into his owne country, and to come home unto him. I feare me greatly, least this will seeme unto some of you a greater designement, and more audacious enterprise of mine, than may either suite and sort with the fresh remembrance of those late defeataures, or stand well with my young and unripe age. The foyles and unfortunate foughten fields in Spaine, can be of no man in the world forgotten later than of my selfe, whose father, whose unkle, were within the space of 30 dayes there slaine, to the end that sorrow upon sorrow, funerall upon funerall, one mournfull death after another, should unfortunately be heaped upon our house & familie. But as this desolate estate and defect almost of all my house and name (wherein I onely, in manner, am left alive of my race) woundeth my heart and make it bleed, as often as I thinke of it: so the publike fortune and vertue of the Commonweale, reviveth my spirit againe, and will not suffer me to dispaire totally of the state of this Empire: considering the destinie and providence of the gods, whereby it is a thing given unto us, and our lucke hath ever bene, that howsoever we have received overthrowes in all great warres and dangerous battailes, yet in the end, we have gone away with the victorie. I omit to speake of old examples, of Porfena, of the Gauls, & Samnites: and I will begin at the Punicke warres. How many armadaes and fleetes, how many brave captains, how many valiant and puissant armies were there lost & miscarried, during the former? And what should I say of this in our daies? In all the defeataures and overthrowes, I was either present myselfe in person; or if I were not in any of them, yet I am sure, I was hee that felt the smart of them, more than any man else whatsoever. The river Trebia, the mere Thrasymenus, the towne Cannæ, what are they else, but the very sepulchres and tombes of the Romane armies there hewne in peeces, and of their Consuls slaine. And thereto, the generall revolt of Italie, the rebellion of Sicilie, the falling away of the greater part of Sardinia. Moreover and besides, this last affright and terror, namely the Carthaginians campe pitched betwene Anio and the walles of Rome, and Anniball scene well neere, as conquerour at the very gates of our cittie. In these so great ruines and adverse distresses of our state; yet the vertue alone and valour of the people

A of Rome hath stood upright, sound, and immutable: yea and hath raised up againe and set on foot, all that which lay along on the ground. You onely, my valorous souldiours, were the first, that after the discomfiture of Cannæ, under the leading & good fortune of my father, withstood Aidruball in his journey and expedition toward the Alpes, purposing to go downe into Italie; who if hee had joyned with his brother Anniball, certainly by this day, there had remained no memorie of the Romane name. And in very truth, these affaires falling out so prosperously, made a mends and recompence for all the former losses. But now through the goodnes of the gods, all things prosper and go well forward: and the affaires of Italie and Sicilie both, mend daily, & are every day better than other. In Sicilie, Saracose & Agrirentum are wonne and wholly ours: the enemies be driven out of all the Iland, & the state is reduced into the forme of a province, subject to the people of Rome, & under their obeisance. In Italie, the towne of Arpi is recovered by surrender, the cite of Capua is forced by assault. Anniball himselfe, having measured all the way, (but in fearefull hast and in manner of a flight) as long as it is from Rome to the Brutians countrie (in high Calabria), is there driven up into the furthest angle and corner thereof, nothing more wishing and praying for at gods hands now, than to be able to retire and get away safe out of his enemies land. What thing then were lesse becomming, my hardie souldiours, than this, If you who have sustained and upheld the decaying and down-falling estate of the Romane Empire in this province, you (I say) together with my two parents (whom for the reverence that I owe to them, give mee leave to make equall, and to honour with that name) at what time as calamities and losses, happened huddle one in the necke of another, and the gods themselves seemed to take part and stand with Anniball; should now let fall your courages and be fainthearted, because in those provinces afore said, all things go well to our hearts desire and great contentment. As for the late misfortunes & adversities which have hapned here, would to God they had passed over without sorrow, as wel of my part, as of yours. But for the present, the immortal gods, protectors and governors of the Romane Empire, who inspired into the minds & hearts of all the Centuries, to wish and chuse me to this place of soveraigne honor, even the same gods by auguries and auspices, by all tokens of the birds either by flight or sight, yea and by visions also in the night season, do portend, signifie and promise unto me, all good speed and happie successe: yea and mine owne mind giveth me, (which ever hitherto, hath bene to me the truest prophet, and never deceived me) that all Spaine is ours: and that within short time, the whole Punicke name and nation, being expelled & driven out from hence, shall fill all seas & lands with their shamefull and dishonorable flight. That which my spirit and soule of it selfe prefageth, the same doth reason also conclude by most certaine and infallible demonstration. The allies and subjects here of the Carthaginians, oppressed and wronged by them, have humbly by their embassadors craved our aid and succour. The captaines Generall of their forces, being at difference and oddes all three among themselves, inso much as they had like to have departed and revolted one from the other, have distracted and dismembred their forces into three parts, and bestowed them in three severall countries, most removed and distant asunder. And no doubt, the like fortune is readie to fall upon their heads, which lately was our undoing and overthrow, upon the same occasion. For even as we before were forsaken of the Celtiberians, so are they now abandoned of their allies. Besides, they parted & divided their armies asunder: which was the only cause, that brought the utter ruine and destruction upon my father and unkle. And be yee sure, that their intestine discord and dissention, will never suffer them to joyne friendly and unite againe in one. And thus singled as they are, they cannot possibly withstand our puissance. Now my souldiours, for your part, do but favour the name of the Scipions: do but affect and love me, the issue and offspring of your noble Generals, budding forth againe (as it were) out of the old stocke, cut downe to the roots. Go to, old souldiours, & redouted servitors, with bon-courage set over the river Iberus a new armie and a new captaine: passe over with them into those lands, which ye have often conquered, and wherein yee have atchieved, many valiant and memorable acts. And for my selfe, I will so endeavour and effect, that as yee now agnize in me, the resemblance of my fathers and uncles visage and countenance, the same feature, proportion, and lineaments of the bodie: so I will shew and represent unto you, the true patterne and portraiture of their spirit, wit, faithfulness, & vertue, even as the expresse and lively image taken and drawn from their owne selves: in such sort, as every man may say, That captaine Scipio is either risen from the dead, or new borne againe. Having by this oration, incensed and inflamed the courages of his souldiours, and left Syllanus with a guard of three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, for the defence of that coast; hee transported over the river Iberus, all the rest of his forces, amounting to the number of five and twentie thousand foot, and 25 hundred horsemen. There he was advised by some about him, seeing the Punicke armies were departed into three countries so farre remote and diffie asunder, to let upon and assaile that which was next: but he doubting and fearing least by that means he should draw them altogether, and knowing that he was not able alone, to match & make his part good with so many hosts at once, determined in the mean while, to be doing with new Carthage, and to besiege and assault it. This citie, as it was rich and wealthie in it selfe, so it was full of all the enemies furniture and provision for warre. There was their armour kept, there was their money laid up, there remained the hostages of all Spaine. Besides, as it was feared commodiously, to crosse over from thence into Affricke: so it stood upon a convenient and large haven, able to receive and harbour the greatest navie at sea, and the onely haven (if I bee not deceived) of all that coast and tract of Spaine, which boundeth next upon our sea. But no man was made privie to his determination, nor knew whither they should take their journey, save onely Lalius. Hee being sent about with the armada, had direction so to temporise & guide his course by saile and ore, that at one and the selfe same instant, both Scipio might present his land forces in the view of Carthage, and the fleet enter the haven. So they departed from Iberus, and within seven daies came before the citie of Carthage, both by sea and land. His campe hee pitched on the north side of the citie: which he entrenched and fortified on that outward back-part, that stood farthest from the citie: as for the forefront, it was by naturall situation of the ground, defended surely enough. For the site of Carthage is in this sort. There is a gulf or creake of the sea, in the middle coast and river well neere of Spaine, opposite most to the South-west wind, running and retiring in length within the land halfe a mile, but lying out in breedth somewhat more. In the very mouth of this creeke, there is a little Iland from the open sea; which saveth, sheltereth, and defendeth the haven from all other winds, but onely the South-west. From the inmost nooke of this bay, there beareth out a promontorie like a demie Iland, which is the very hill or cape whereupon the citie is built. The same on the East side and the South, is compassed with the sea: from the West, it is enclosed with a lake or standing mere, which also spreadeth somewhat toward the North, of an uncerteine depth; which altereth according to the tide, and as the sea either ebbereth or floweth. Now, there is an elbow or banke of firme ground, somewhat lesse than a quarter of a mile over, that joyneth the citie with the maine or continent. To that side (notwithstanding it had been no great peece of worke there to fortifie) the Roman General cast no trench, nor raised any rampier: either upon a brave & haucie mind, to shew the enemy how confidently he trusted in his owne strength; or because, whensoever he advanced to the walls of the citie (as oftentimes hee tooke occasion so to doe) hee might have open recourse and regresse againe into the campe. But when the utter side, which required fortifications, was finished, he set the ships in order within the haven, making a shew, as if hee would besiege them also on the water side. And when he had gone through all his armada, and given the captaines of the ships in charge, to looke wel to their centinels and watches in the night (for that commonly enemies at their first besieging, make what attempts and adventures they can in every place) hee returned into his campe. And because hee would not onely yeeld his souldiours good reason of this his designement, in that he began warre first and principally with the besieging of that citie; but also encourage them, and put them in good hope of the winning and conquest thereof, hee assembled them together, and discoursed before them in this manner.

Scipio to his souldiours.

My valiant souldiours and trustie friends, If any man here thinketh, that yee are brought hither to assaile a citie onely, and there an end: he rather maketh reckoning of your present pain and travell, than casteth the profit and commoditie thereof ensuing. For yee shall in very truth give the assault to the walls but of one citie: but in that one citie yee shall be maisters and conquerors of all Spaine. Here lie the hostages of all their Nobles, their Princes, and States. And no sooner shall yee be lords of them, and have them in your rule and custodie, but presently, all that now is under the hands of the Carthaginians in Spaine, will be surrendered unto you, and at your devotion. Here is all the money that the enemies have: without which, like as they are not able to maintaine warre, (as who wage and entertaine all their armies for pay) so it will mightily speed us (if we light upon it) in gaining the hearts of the barbarous people. Here are their engines and attillerie, here is their armour, here is their tackling and provision for their navie, and all other

A other munition and furniture for warre: wherewith we shall both furnish our selves, and disfigure the enemy. Gaine we shall over and besides, not onely right faire and beautifull, but also a most rich and wealthie citie: yea, and more than that, of right great importance and consequence, in regard of a goodly and surpassing commodious haven: by means whereof, we may be provided both from sea and land, of all things needfull and requisite for the warres. Which, as they will be of great moment to us that shall have them, so they will be the greater losse to the enemies that shall forgoe them. This is their castle for strength, their garner for come, their treasure for monie, their armourie, their arsenal: and in one word, their very store-house of all things whatsoever. Hither is the direct passage and streight cut out of Affricke, here is the onely port & harbour for shipping, betweene the Islands of Gades, or Gebraltar, and the mountaines Pyrenaei: from whence all Spaine overlooketh (as it were) and commaundeth Affricke. But knowing that you are well appointed already, and prepared to the service, I will say no more but this: Now for the honour of the Romanes, let us goe courageously to it, and with all our might and maine assault new Carthage. And when they all with one accord cried unto him, so to doe indeed, and that no other thing was first to be done; then he advanced before Carthage, then hee gave commaundement to assaile it at once, by land and sea. Mago the captaine of the Carthaginians on the other side, when he saw preparation made by water and land to give the assault for his part ordered his forces and disposed them in this manner. To make head against the Romans on that side where they lay encamped, hee opposed two thousand townesmen: with a guard of five hundred souldiours he kept the citadell: other five hundred he placed upon a little hill belonging to the citie which looketh to the East: all the other multitude whatsoever, hee appointed to make resistance in other places, where any outcries, shouts, or suddaine alarmes should be given. Then having set open a gate, he sendeth those forth, whom he had arraigned in that street which leadeth directly to the camp of the enemies. The Romanes (according as they were commaunded by their leader himselfe) in the beginning gave ground a little & reculed, to the end, that during the time of skirmish & confict, they might be neerer to the supplie of succors, which were to be sent to second them from behind. And verily at the first they stood to it stoutly on both parts, & there was no ods perceived. But afterwards, the Romanes being still freshly re-enforced from out of the campe, not only discomfited the enemies, & put them to flight, but pressed on them so hard, as they fled disordered and out of array, that if Scipio had not founded the retreat, it seemed, that they would have entermingled themselves pell-mell with those that ran away, and rushed into the citie with them. Within the citie throughout there was no lesse feare than in the battell. Many courts of guard and other places were abandoned, the courtein of the wals was left naked, & every man made what shift he could to leape downe & escape. Which when Scipio perceived (who now was turned to a mount which they call Mercurius Tentates) and namely, that the walls were void of all the defendants, he commaunded all his souldiours to issue forth of the camp, to set forward to the assault, and to bring ladders to skale. Himselfe in person, defended with the shields of 3 tall lustie yong men going before him (for by this time they let flie afresh from the walls a mightie voley of shot of all sorts) approached the citie. There he exhorted, encouraged, & commaunded them to do what was requisite in this service. And that which made most to enkindle the courages of the souldiours, he was there personally as an eye-witnesse and beholder of each mans valour or cowardise. Whereupon, they stuck not to run upon the very shot, and to receive many a wound: and now nothing could keepe them back; neither the strength of the walls, nor the armed men that stood thereupon, but they scaled avie, who could mount upon the walls first. At the same time, that part of the citie also which the sea beat upon, began to be assailed by the ships. But from thence, it should seeme, they made more ado with houting and hurrying, than effected ought by any forcible assault. For whiles they came close to the walls with their ships; whiles they put forth their ladders and their souldiours; whiles every man laboured to gaine the land, the neere way he could: what with their striving and hast-making, they hindred one another. And by that time Mago had filled the walls full of armed men, who let flie arrowes, javelines, darts, and all kind of shot, whereof they had gathered together exceeding great store. But neither men, nor arrowes and darts, nor any things els defended the wall so much as the very wall it selfe. For few ladders they had that could reach up to the top: and the longer any of them were, the more weaker also they were. Whereupon, by reason that they who were climbed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and discharge the ladder, & yet some

or other still clambred up after, the ladders being overcharged with the weight, brake in peeces. G Some againe there were, that notwithstanding the ladders under them held still and stood unbroken, yet when they looked downe from on high, their eyes so dazeled, and were overcast with a mist, that they lost their sight, and fell from the top to the ground. Thus when ladders here, and men there, came tumbling down, and the enemies upon their good speed grew to be more hartie and hardie, the retreat was founded: which gave to the besieged within the towne not hope onely of present rest and intermission of so great labour and toyle, but also assured them in manner, for the time to come, that the citie was tenable against all skalades, although it were invested therewith round about. And as for fabricks and mounts to be raised and planted against it, they were not only difficult and hard to be performed, but also would aske some long time: and minister in the meane while, space sufficient for the other Generals of their owne to come to the H rescue. But scarce was the first assault fully ceased, when Scipio commaunded other fresh and unfoiled souldiours, to take the ladders of them that were wearied alreadie and wounded, and with greater violence to give a new Camisado. Himselfe, so soone as he understood that it was ebb and low water, having bene advertised by certaine fishermen of Taracon (who sometimes with light boates used to rowe, and otherwhiles when their vessels touched the ground, to wade all over the lake upon firme ground) that men might easily passe to the walls on foot: thither to that place he brought all his souldiours to the assault. It was now almost noonetide of the day; and besides that the water of it selfe naturally fell with the ebb into the sea, there was a good round northren wind arose, which drave the water out of the lake (which now was well fallen) I after the tide, and discovered such shallows, that whereas in some places thereof they went up to the navell, in some againe they waded scarce knee deepe. Which albeit Scipio knew well to be an ordinarie thing in naturall reason, and therefore with good forecast had made provision accordingly to take that advantage, yet he turned it to a miraculous and prodigious accident, attributing all to the immediat handie-worke of the gods: as who to give passage and footing to the Romanes, had turned back the course and current of the sea, discharged lakes of their water, and opened wayes unto them, that never before were troden with the sole of mans foot: and therewith he willed his souldiers to follow Neptune, the guide and leader of the way, and to passe boldly through the mids of the lake close to the very walls. On the land side the assailants had exceeding trouble in standing under the walls: for not only they were hindered by reason that the curtine was so high; but also as they went, they lay open and under their shot, and were K wounded both wayes, so as their flanks and sides were more annoyed as they approached under, than their faces and forefront of their bodies. But on the other part, as they went quietly and easily through the mere to the wall, so they climed forward as securely to the very top thereof. For neither was it strongly fortified with bulwarkes, nor raised to any height by industrie and art of man, as being suppoled by naturall situation of the place, and the standing lake besides, strong enough and sufficiently defended: nor any gard of armed men were there in watch and ward, opposed against the assailants: whiles every man was busie, and wholly intended to helpe there, from whence some daunger was seene. The Romanes being thus entred the cittie over the walls without any skirmish, marched from thence with what speed they could, unto that gate, about which all the fight and hote medley was alreadie begun: for there not only all their minds were L bent and amused, but also their eyes and eares were occupied and possessed; whiles some fought, others looked on & encouraged the fighters: in such sort, that there was none of them all once perceived or knew, that the citie was taken & surprised behind them, before the darts flew about their eares & light upon their back parts, and untill they had the enemies both before & behind. Then not onely the walls were taken (when the defendants upon a twofold feare, were driven to abandon them) but also the gate from withinforth and without, began to be broken downe: and anone, after continuall running and beating against it, the leaves thereof perforce flew apieces, because there might bee nothing to impeach or let them in their entrance: then the armed souldiours brake in most furiously. Many alreadie had skaled the walls, and gotten over, but they turned and betooke themselves every where to massacre and make havock of the townemen. M But the maine battoll, which entred in at the gate with their captains, orderly by companies and rankes in their array, marched forward through the middest of the citie to the market place. From whence Scipio might see the enemies flee two waies, some to the forresse upon the hill aforesaid, which standeth to the East, and was kept with a guard of five hundred souldiours: others into forced by Scipio.

A into the citadell, into which Mago himselfe, with all the armed men in a manner, who were driven from the walls, had retired and fled for to save himselfe. Whereupon he sent a part of his forces to win the said hill, and himselfe in person led the rest to the castle. And as the fort upon the hill was taken at the first assault and onser given, so Mago, after he had a while made some means to defend the castle, seeing all places full of enemies, swarming every where, & no other hope, yielded himselfe, the citadell, and the garison. Vntill the castle was surrendred and given up, there was nothing but murdering and killing all over the citie, and not one spared that seemed to be fourteen yeares old and upward, if they came in their way. But then, upon the sound of trumpet the execution ceased, and the Conquerours fell to saccage and pillage, which of all forts rose to a mightie thing. Of free borne, such as were of male sexe, there were taken prisoners upon 10000. B Then, so many of them as he found to be naturall citizens of Carthage, he dismissed and let goe free, and restored unto them not onely the citie, but also their owne goods, which the first furie and rage of warriours had left untouched. There were of Artificers and handicraftsmen, some two thousand: those by an edict he pronounced to be bond, and adjudged them as confiscate, to serve the Commonweale of the people of Rome: yet with some hope, that shortly they might obtaine their freedome againe, in case they performed good service, and shewed themselves diligent in all ministries and offices of warre. The rest of the multitude of inhabitants, such as were able and young lustie men, as also the stout and sturdie bondmen, he awarded them to the shippes, for to furnish up the number of gally-slaves and rowers, and with the eight shippes of warre, which hee tooke captive in the haven, hee encreased his owne Armada. Besides all this C multitude, there were also the hostages of the Spaniards above writte, of whome hee tooke as great care, and as good regard, as if they had bene the children of Allies and associates. A mightie deale of warlike artillerie and ordinance was there found and seized one. Of Catapults of the greatest size 120, of a lesser sort 281. Balists some greater, some small; of them 33, of these 52. Of Scorpions and Cros-bowes to shoot quarrels as well great as small, and likewise of defensive armour, and offensive weapons, a huge deale, and a marvellous quantitie. Militarie ensignes 74. Of gold and silver there was a mightie masse brought unto the Generall. Golden cups or bolles there were 276, every one weighing almost one pound. Of silver tried, wrought, and coined, 18300 pound weight: and much plate and vessell of silver. All this C. Flaminius the Treasurer, received either by weight or tall. Of wheat there was 40000 Modij, of barley D 270000. Of barks and shippes of burden, there were in the haven woon by force, and taken, 113. Some were fraught with corne, armour, brasse besides, and yron, saile-cloth, and hempe; or spart for cables and ropes, also with timber for shipwrights. Carthage the towne it selfe, in so great store of wealth and warlike provision, was the least of all other. That day Scipio, having committed the charge of guarding and keeping the citie, unto Laelius and the mariners, brought back the legions into the camp, & commaunded the soldiours to refresh their bodies with food and rest, wearied as they were, and over-laboured in one day with all manner of toile and work that belongeth to war-service: as who, had both fought a battell in the field, and also taken so great paines, and undergone so much hazard and danger, in assaulting and forcing the citie; yea and after it was woon, had fought with disadvantage of ground, with those that were fled into the castle. E The next day, after he had called both souldiours and mariners together, first he rendered laud and praise, yea, and thanks unto the immortall gods, who in one day had not only made him lord of the most mightie and wealthie citie in all Spaine, but also had laid up for him there against his coming, all the riches wellneere of Africk and Spaine: whereby as the enemies now had nothing left them, so he & his had all things plentiful. Then he commended the vertue and valour of his souldiours, whom neither the falyng out of the enemies could fright, nor the mightie height of the walls skare, nor the blind and untried foulds of the lake could once dismay, nor the situation of the castle seated upon an high cliffe terrifie, ne yet the castle it selfe most strongly built and fortified, was able to daunt and make afraid, but that they would passe F over all and breake through all. And therefore albeit every one of them deserved at his hands all rewards, yet the principall honour of a murall crowne and garland, belonged properly unto him that first skaled and mounted over the wall. Come he forth therefore (quoth hee) and shew himselfe, who taketh himselfe worthie of that gift, and let him claime his due. Whereupon there were two that put in for it, and demanded the same, Q. Trebellius, a Centurion of the fourth Legion, and

and Sex. Digitus, a servitor at the sea. Neither strived these parties themselves so hotely about the matter, as the love and favour of them set all the whole armie divided into legionarie fouldiours, and servitors at sea, in an heat of contention, to labour for him that belonged to their side, and was a member as it were of their bodie. C. Lelius Admirall of the fleet, went with the failers and sea men. M. Sempronius Tuditanus was altogether for the legionarie land-fouldiours. This debate was like to breede a skab, and to raise a very mutinie in the host. Whereupon Scipio pronounced that he would appoint as Delegates three Commissioners, to sit upon the cause who should take the depositions of witnesses, and give their verduict accordingly, whether of these two persons entred over the wall first into the towne. Now because C. Lelius and M. Sempronius were advocates to the one partie and the other, he therefore adjoynd unto them a third person, one P. Cornelius Caudinus, to go as an indifferent mediatur between them two: and gave order and commaundement, that those other three commissioners abovesaid should sit together, and heare and determine the controversie. When as the matter grew to a greater heate of contention, by reason that men of such marke and worth, were acquainted with the action, and had their hand in it, who were not so much advocates to plead, but moderatours and judges to beate downe a side; C. Lelius, rising out from the court, came to the tribunall seat unto Scipio: and informed him that the manner of proceeding in this matter in question, was without all good order, modestie and reverence; and so handled, that they were like to go together by the eares, and try it out by knocks. But, be it quoth he, that no blowes be dealt, yet it is a most shameful example and detestable precedent, that the honor & guerdon due to vertue, should be caried by fraudulent coven and ungodly perjurie. For quoth he, the legionarie fouldiours stand of the one hand, the sea servitors on the other, and readie they be to sweare on both sides all the othes of God, and to that rather which their will and affection carieth them to, than which in their conscience they know to be true. By which guilt of forswearing and perjurie, they will not only bring a curse and vengeance upon themselves and their owne lives, but also upon the ensignes, standards, and very Aegles, yea and their religious militarie oth and sacrament. Thus much I thought good to give you advertisement of afore-hand, & that by the advise of P. Cornelius; and M. Sempronius. Scipio after he had highly praised Lelius, called the fouldiours to an assemblie, and there with a loud voyce pronounced and sayd thus; I am sufficiently enforced upon certaine relation, that Q. Trebellius, and Sex. Digitus scaled the wall both together, and therefore I award as well to the one as to the other a murall garland, in token and testimonie of their singular vertue. Then he rewarded the rest also, according to every mans desert and valorous service. But above all other, he honoured C. Lelius Admirall of the fleet, not only in matching him equally with himselfe in all commendable parts and qualities, but also in presenting him with a coroner of beaten gold, and thirtie oxen. Then he gave commaundement that the hostages of the cities and States of Spaine should be called forth. What a number were of them, I am abashed and loth to set downe in writing: for as much as I find in some Chronicles, that they were upon some three hundred; in others 725. The like varietie there is of other matters, amongst fundry writers. One writeth that the Punick garison were ten thousand: another 7000: and a third comes with his two thousand, and no more. I meet with one record which reporteth, that there were 10000 taken prisoners: and another, that there were above 25000. Of Scorpions or Crosbowes, great and small, I should say there were gained some 60; if I would take for mine author Silenus, a greeke writer: but if I follow Valerius Antias and go by him, I should tell you a tale of sixe thousand of the greater sort, and thirteene thousand of the smaller. See how little rule they had of their tongues to over-reach, or stay of their pens to set downe so lowd lyes upon record. Nay, they are not well agreed so much as upon this point, who were the great Capitaines and commaunders. Most of them say that Lelius was L. Admirall: there be againe that would have M. Iunius Syllanus to be the man. And Armeis was capitaine of the Punick garison; and yielded to the Romanes, if ye list to beleve Valerius Antias: but by the testimonie and credit of others, it was Mago. Moreover, the records accord not about the number of ships that were taken, nor of the weight of gold and silver, neytr of the summe of money that was raised of the pillage. To conclude, if we must needs beleve some one or other, the meane betwene is the best, and carieth most likelihood of the truth.

But to retorne againe to Scipio: When he had called forth the hostages into his presence, first he bad them all in generall to be of good cheere: for why? they were now in the hands of the people

A people of Rome, who ever desired to bind men unto them by favours and good turnes, more than to awe them with feare and dread: and to have forain nations knit and joyned in faithfull amitie, rather than held in subjection by heavie servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writing of their severall cities, he also reviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents & friends to come and receive every man their owne. If haply any embassadours of their cities were present, he restored unto them their owne hostages without delay: for all the rest, he gave expresse charge to C. Flaminius the Treasourer, to see unto them in all kind, courteous, and liberall usage. Whiles he was busy in taking this order, there hapned to come from among the hostages, even out of the mids of the companie, an aged gentlewoman, the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great lord of the Ilergetes. Shee shed teares, and fell downe prostrate at the feete of the L. Generall: and withall began to beseech him most instantly, to give a more speciall charge, concerning the custodie of the women-fex: and to recommend them to their keepers, for to be regarded with a carefull eye, and to be kept and attended on more tenderly. Why? quoth Scipio, I warrant thee good woman, they shall want for nothing that is meet for them. Then replieth this Dame again, We stand not so much (quod she) upon these termes; for a little thing God wot may serve and content them in this poore estate and low condition: my care is for another matter, when I consider and behold the young and tender age of these maidens here. As for my selfe, I am now past date, and without danger of that injurie, which our sexe is subject and exposed unto. Now there stood about her, the daughters of Indibilis, virgins in the fresh prime and floure of their age, and passing faire and beautifull withall; besides some other ladies as nobly borne as they: who all, honored her as their naturall mother that bare them. Then Scipio, I would (quoth he) in the ordinarie course as well of mine owne discipline, as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no one thing among us should suffer abuse, which elsewhere in any place of the world is held inviolable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honor of Rome: but to have a more speciall eye that way, your owne vertue also & worthineffe bindeth me: who in the mids of these your calamities and miseries, have not forgotten your womanly cariage & the honour of your sexe. And therupon he delivered them over to the custodie of a man of approved honestie & integritie, commanding him to gard them with no lesse reverence, modestie, & continencie, than if they were the wives or mothers of their neere friends that gave them entertainment.

After this, there was presented unto him by his soldiours, a damofell & virgin of ripe years, taken also prisoner: but so well favored & surpassing in beautie, that wheresoever she went, every mans eye was upon her, in admiration of so rare and perfect a creature. Scipio having enquired of her countrie where shee was borne, and likewise of what parents shee was descended; among other things learned, that shee was espoused & affianced to a yong Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Allucius. Forthwith he sent home to her parents and foresaid spouse, for to repaire unto him: and in the meane time, he understood that her husband that should be, was wonderfully enamoured of her, and readie to die for her love. So soon as the yong gentleman was come, Scipio entred into more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the maiden, and in these tearmes he entertained him. I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your selfe. Come on therefore, let us yong men both, devise and common together more freely, and not be too nice, coy, and bashfull one to the other. After that your espoused wife taken captive by our fouldiours, was brought unto me, and that I heard of the exceeding fanfic and affection that you cast unto her, I beleevd it full wel: for her singular beautie deserveth no lesse. Now, for as much as my selfe, if I might be allowed to use the pastimes of youth (I meane no otherwise than in honest & lawful love) & were not called away by the common-weal, & employed wholly in other affairs of state, I would think to be pardoned and held excused, if I had an extraordinarie liking to a spouse of mine owne, and loved her extreemly. I must therefore needs favour and tender your love, which is the thing I can, considering that I may not the other in any wise. Your sweet-heart and best beloved I have entertained, as well, and as respectfully, as she should have bene with your father and mother in law, who are her owne kind and naturall parents. Reserved she hath bene & kept for you alone, that you might receive her at my hands, unspotted and untouched, and a present becoming me and you both. In lieu and recompence therefore, of this boone and gift which I now bestow upon you, I require at your hands againe this onely promise

The rare continence and civility of Scipio

11 wife and faithfull covenant, that you will bee a friend and well-willer to the state of Rome. And if 12 you take me in deed to bee a good and honest man, such, as these nations and people here, have 13 knowne my father and uncle to have bene before me: know you thus much, that in the citie of 14 Rome there are many more like unto us: and that there cannot at this day, a nation in the world 15 be named, which you would wish lesse to bee an enemy to you and yours, or desire more to en-16 tertaine as your friend. The young gentleman being abashed for very modestie, and yet right 17 glad and joyfull withall, held Scipio by the hand, called upon all the gods, and besought them in 18 his behalfe, to thanke and recompence him therefore, since it lay not in his owne proper power, 19 in any proportion or measure to be thankfull and make requital, either as himselfe could wish, or 20 as Scipio had deserved. Then were the parents & kinsfolke of the maid called for: who seeing the 21 damosell freely rendred and given them againe, for whose raunsome and redemption they had 22 brought with them a sufficient summe of gold: fell to intreating and requesting Scipio, to vouch-23 safe for to accept the same at their hands, as a gift and token of their good will: assuring him, that 24 in so doing, they should take themselves no lesse bound and beholden unto him, than for the re-25 storing and delivering of the virgine untouched and undefiled. Scipio seeing them so earnest and 26 importunate, promised for to receive it, and withall, commaunded that it should be laid downe 27 at his feet: and calling Allucius unto him, Here (quoth he) over and besides all your other dow-28 rie which your father in law must pay you, have from me thus much more money to mend your 29 marriage with, take this gold therefore to your selfe, and keepe it for your owne use. And so after 30 this rich reward given, and great honour done unto him, hee was dismissed, and departed home 31 with much joy and hearts content: where he made report unto his countreymen and people, of 32 the praise-worthie vertues of Scipio, and the favours from him received. Saying moreover, there 33 was come into Spaine, a young man resembling the immortall gods in all respects; who as well 34 by bountie, liberallitie, and bestowing benefits, as by martiall prowes and force of arms, is in the 35 very way to win and conquer all. So when he had assembled and mustred all his vassails and ten-36 nants, he returned within few daies, accompanied with a traine of foure teene hundred of the best 37 and most choise horsemen of his countrie.

Scipio keeping Laelius still with him, untill by his advise and counsell, hee had disposed of the captives, hostages, and other prizes and pillage: after hee had settled all in good order, appointed a Galeace of five bankes of oares, wherein he embarked the prisoners, with Mago and some fifteen Senators besides, who together with him were taken, & sent them to Rome with a messen-38 ger, to carrie tidings of this victorie. Himselfe determined to sojourne a few daies in Carthage, 39 which time he spent in training and exercising his souldiours, as well of land service as at sea. The 40 first day, he caused the legions to runne too and fro in their armour, foure mile out in length. The 41 second day, he commaunded them to scoure and furbush their harnessse & weapons before their 42 tents. Upon the third day, they joined & encountered in battell wise, & practised to fight with blunt 43 wasters and bastons; yea and launced one at another darts & javelens, rounded at the point end 44 with bals, in maner of foiles. The fourth day they rested and reposed themselves. On the fift day, 45 againe they ran at turnement, as before, armed. This order they kept, exercising, laboring, and 46 resting by turnes, so long as they abode at Carthage. And thus much for the Legionarie souldi-47 ours. The sea servitours and mariners used in calme water and still weather, to row up into the 48 sea, and there to make triall of the nimblenesse and agilitie of their ships, representing shewes of 49 sea-fight and skirmish. Thus without the citie, they enured their bodies, & quickened their spi-50 rits and courages, both on land and water. Within the towne, there was nothing heard but pre-51 paration of warre furniture. All the publicke shops and worke houses, full of smithes, engineers, 52 and all other artificers for the purpose, plying their worke, and never going from it. The Gene-53 rall himselfe, as supervisor, with equall and indifferent care oversaw all. One while he would bee 54 with the armada in the harbour: another while, he conversed among the legions, and turnoid 55 with them. A time he would set by, for to visit the workes about the walles, & see how they went 56 forward. Otherwile he would be in the shops aforesaid, among the multitude of the carpenters 57 and smithes, and other artificers, viewing what they did there; and in the arsenal and ship-docks, 58 observing and marking how much they went forward, day by day, striving a vie as they did, who 59 could do most and quit himselfe best. Having thus set them a worke, repaired the wals which he 60 had battered and shaken, and placed certaine guards there, for the defence of the citie; he tooke 61 his journey to Taracon: and all the way he was visited and plied with fundrie embassages. Some 62 of

A of them hee answered and dispatched as hee was in his journey: others he put off, to give their attendance at Taracon: for thither he had summoned all the allies and confederates, both new and old, to meet him. And in manner, all the cities and States on this side Iberus, and many also of the farther province of Spaine there assembled.

The Carthaginian captaines and commanders at the first for the nonce, suppressed & stopped the rumour of the winning of Carthage. But when the thing was too too apparent, & could not be hidden and smothered, they used all the words they could to elevate it, and make the matter lesse than it was. To wit, that by a suddaine invasion and expedition of the Romans in one day (as it were) by stealth, it chanced that one of the cities of Spaine was surprisid, that the insolent and foolish yong man bearing himselfe prodigally proud, & jocound beyond all measure, would B seeme to make up the measure of so small a catch that he hath gotten, with a great shew of a brave victorie: but when he shall heare once, that there are three Generals comming toward him, and three victorious armies of enemies, he will soone pull in his hornes: he will then tell us another tale, when presently he shall call to remembrance with greefe of every vain in his heart, the death of father, of uncle, and other progenitors. These and such like speeches, they gave out among the people and common sort, knowing in their own conscience what a blow they had caught, and how much their strength was decayed by the losse of new Carthage.

THE XXVII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIVS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Citie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the seven and twentieth Booke.

1 Numerius Fulvius the Proconsull was slaine, and with his armie utterly defeated by Annibal at 2 Herdona. But Cl. M. arcellus the Consull had better fortune in a battell against him, before Nu- 3 mistro. From whence Annibal dislodged and departed by night. M. arcellus pursued after him, and 4 ever as he fell off followed him hard still, untill he gave him battaile. In the former fight Annibal 5 had the better, but M. arcellus in the latter. Fabius M. maximus the father being Consull, had the 6 Tarentines yeelded up unto him by treason. In Spaine, Scipio fought a battaile with Asdruball 7 the sonne of Annibal, at Betula, and was the field. Among others there was a boy taken prisoner 8 of triall blood, and of incomparable beautie: whom he sent with rich gifts unto M. arcellus his uncle by the mother. Clau- 9 M. arcellus, and T. Quintinus Crispinus the Consuls, who chanced to goe out of their campe, to discover as espials the 10 countie, were forelaid by an ambusc of Annibal, and entrapped. Where M. arcellus was slaine: Crispinus fled. In this booke 11 containeth also the wars and exploits atchieved by P. Sulpitius the Pretor, against Philip and the Acheans. The Cen-12 sor held a solemn survey and numbring of citizens, and purged the citie. In which survey there were found of Romanes ci-13 zens 337108. By which account it was seen, how many the people of Rome had lost, by the adverse fortune of so many 14 battailes. Asdruball, who with an armie had passed over the Alpes for to joine with Annibal, was slaine, and with him 15 56000 men besides, by the conduct of M. Livius the Consull, but not without the equall good service of Cl. Nero the other 16 Consull: who being appointed to make head against Annibal, left the campe so, as the enemy was not ware thereof, and 17 with an elect power of battie men, environed and enclosed Asdruball about, and so defeated him.

Thus

Hus stood the affaires in Spaine. In Italie the Consull Marcellus having recovered Salapia by composition, wan by force two towns from the Samnites, Maronea and Meles. Where there were slaine three thousand of Anniball his souldiours, who had bene left there in garrison. Some good portion of the pillage was shared amongst the souldiours. Of wheat betides, there was found there 240000 measures called Modij, & of barley 110000. But the joy from hence was not so great, as the losse and dammage received within few daies after, not far from the citie Herdonea. Cn. Fulvius the Pro-consull lay there encamped upon hope to regainethat citie, which after the defeature at Cannæ, had revolted from the Romanes: a towne neither seated in a place of suretie, nor yet well furnished and manned for defence. The captaine thereof (Cn. Fulvius aforesaid) was by nature ever negligent, but growne much more retchlesse now, presuming upon a vaine hope that he had of them within, in that he perceived how the townsmen alreadie began to faile in their devotion & faithfull allegiance to the Carthaginians, especially after they heard, that upon the losse of Salapia, Anniball was departed out of those parts into the Brutians country. Anniball had intelligence of all this brought unto him from Herdonea by secret messengers, which, as it caused him to have a carefull eie to the saving and keeping of a friend citie, so it ministred good hope unto him for to surpris his enemye at unwares and unprovided. Whereupon with his armie lightly appointed, hee tooke long journeys, and made hast to Herdonea, so as hee prevented almost the fame and bruite of his coming. And to strike the more terrour into his enemye, hee thither marched in battaile array. The Romane Generall, as adventurous and bold as he every way, but nothing at all so polliticke nor so strong, brought his forces forth in more hast than good speed, and gave him battaile. His fifth legion, and the left wing or cornet of Cavallerie, began the skirmish, & charged hotely. But Anniball had given his horsemen direction, that when the Infanterie was in the midst of skirmish, with mind and eie wholly occupied that way, they should wheele about and fetch a compasse, and whiles some of them assailed the camp, the rest should play upon the back of their enemyes: himselfe iterating estoones unto his men the name of Cn. Fulvius, for likenes sake, because two years before in the very same quarters, he had vanquished another Cn. Fulvius who was Pretour also, assured them of the like successe now in this conflict. And verily this conceit and hope of his, proved not vaine and frustrate. For when as in close fight and skirmish of the footmen, many of the Romanes were fallen downe and slaine, but so, as yet the ranckes stood unbroken, and the ensignes upright, behold, a suddaine fresh charge of the horsemen on their backe, and a great shout of the enemyes withall descried and heard from the campe, first discomfited the sixth legion, which being marshalled in the second battailon, had bene put in disarray before by the Numidians, and then the fifth, and so consequently, even those that fought in the forefront of the vaward before the ensignes. Some fled amaine, others were killed in the midst betwene, where Cn. Fulvius himselfe with twelve Tribunes or knight marshals were left dead in the place. Of Romanes and Allies how many died in that medley, who is able to set downe for certaine; seeing in some records I find the number fiftene thousand, and in others not above seven thousand.

The conqueror Anniball, was maister likewise of the camp and all the pillage there. As for the towne Herdonea, because he understood for truth, that it minded to have revolted unto the Romanes, and would not continue fast in their fidelitie, if his backe were once turned: after hee had conveyed away the multitude of the inhabitants to Metapontum & the Thurians, he set it on fire and burnt it quite. The nobles and principall citizens, who were known to have had secret talke and conference with Fulvius, he put to death. The Romanes, who out of so great an overthrow escaped, made shift by divers and sundrie waies to flic, halfe naked as they were, to Marcellus the Col. into Samnium. But Marcellus nothing dispaied and affrighted at this so great defeature, addresseth his letters to the Senate at Rome, with advertisement of the losse of the captaine generall, and the armie at Herdonea: giving them yet to understand, how himselfe, even hee who after the Cannian field had tamed and daunted Anniball, as lustie and proud as he was upon that victorie, was minded presently to encounter him, and make him take no long joy and pleasure, wherein now he so vaunted and exalted himselfe.

And at Rome verilie, as they mourned much for the losse past, so they feared as greatly the future

A future daungers. The Consull having passed out of Samnium into the Lucanes countrie, sate down before Numistro, in the very sight of Anniball, & there in a plaine encamped himselfe, notwithstanding the enemye was possessed before of the hill, and had the vantage of the ground. And for to make more shew of his owne confidence, and how little he feared, hee first brought forth his men, and marshalled them in order readie to bid battaile. Anniball so soone as he saw the ensignes advanced forth of the gates, staied not behind. And they arranged their battailes in such manner, as that the Carthaginians with the right wing tooke up part of the hill, & the Romanes displayed their left wing in length, to the very walls of the towne. After they had continued fight from the third hower of the day unto night, and that the vaunguards on both sides were wearie with maintaining of skirmish so long; then the first legion of the Romanes, with the right wing of their horsemen, the Spanish soldiours also of Anniball his part, the Balearian slingers likewise, together with the Elephants, began to fight, whiles the rest were alreadie in hote conflict, and close together. For a long time the medley thrunk not of any hand. The first legion of the Romanes was seconded with the coming in of the third: & among the enemyes likewise, there came in new souldiours that were lustie, in place of the foiled and wearied. Whereby, of a lingring and long skirmish, there began all on a suddaine, a new, hote, and cruell battaile, by reason that their courages were fresh, and their bodies in heart. But the night parted the fray, and left the victorie doubtfull in the midst. The morrow after, the Romanes from sun-rising stood arraunged in the field until it was fare day: and seeing none of the enemyes appeare and shew themselves, they fell to gather up the spoiles by leaseure, & heaped up in one place all the bodies of their own men that were slaine, and made one great fire, and burnt them to ashes. The night ensuing, Anniball dislodged secretly without any noise, and departed into Apulia. And Marcellus, so soone as daylight discovered the flight of his enemye (leaving his hurt & wounded people at Numistro with a small guard, and L. Furius Purpurio a Colonell to be their captaine) followed him by his steps, and at Venusia overtooke him. There for certaine daies, passed some sallies from the guards of both armies, whiles both horse and foot one with another, rather made slight skirmishes, than any set battailes; and lightly the Romanes had alwaies the better hand. From thence the armies were conducted through Apulia, without any memorable fight at all, by reason that Anniball in the night season ever set forward, seeking some opportunitie of forelaying & entrapping his enemye; and Marcellus never followed but in broad daylight, and sent out his espials before to cleere the coasts.

In this meane while Flaccus spending the time at Capua, in making port-sale of the noble mens goods, and in setting and letting out to ferme, the land which was confiscate and forfeit to the common wealth of Rome (and all for a rent of corne) there hapned a new complot and practise which lay hidden for the time, to be detected and come to light, to the end that he might never want one matter or other to take occasion for to plague and torment the Campanes. He had taken order that his souldiours should remove out of the houses within the town, partly for that as well the tenements of the said towne within as the lands without, should be rented forth: and partly for fear least the exceeding pleasantnes and delectable seat of that citie should effeminate his armie, as it had done the host of Anniball before time: and commaunded

E them to bu. ld themselves about the gates and along the walls, cottages and sheds in warlike fashion, and only to serve for souldiours. These were most of them made of hurdles and boards, some watted and wound with reedes, and all of them thatched with straw and stubble, as it were of purpose to minister fuell for fire. Now there were some hundred and seventie Campanes had conspired at one certaine houre of the night to set all a fire: and the principall heads and chieftaines were certaine brethren of the Blosij: and it fortuneth that by some of the same house and familie the conspiracie was disclosed. Whereupon at once the gates were made fast by the commaundement of the Proconsull: and the alarme being stricken up and sounded, all the souldiers ran together. All those that were partie or privie to the intended treason, were apprehended, and after rigorous examination had by torture, they were condemned and executed: the informers were made free, and had each one a reward of 10000 pecces of brasse called Ases.

When the Nucernines and Acerranes made mone that they wanted place of habitation, for as much as Acerræ was in part burnt, and Nuceria utterly rased and destroyed: Marcellus referred them over to the Senate of Rome, and sent them thither. The men of Acerræ had leave graunted to re-edifie againe their owne edifices which were burned: But they of Nuceria, according ding to their owne desire, were translated to Atella, and the Atellanes commanded to remove unto Calatia, there to dwell.

Amids the managing of many and weightie affaires, which falling out variably one while well, another while ill, builed and amused the minds of men; yet the Romanes forgot not the castle of Tarentum: for M. Ogulnius and P. Aquilius, went as embassadors into * Ætolia, for to buy up corne, to be conveighed and brought to Tarentum: and a thousand souldiours out of the citie armie, wherof the number of Romanes and Allies was all one, were sent with the sayd corne thither to lye in garison.

Now was the summer at an end, and the time drew neere of the Consuls election. But the letters of Marcellus unto the Senate (wherein he signified that it was not for the good of the Commonwealth to depart one foote from Anniball, whom he himselfe pursued still at heeles, and so much the more hotely, because he fell off and forbare to fight :) set the LL. of the Senate into a great perplexitie, for feare either to call away the Consull from the warres, especially now in the mids of his best service, or to be without Consuls the next yeare. But it was thought in the end the best course, that Valerius the Consull, although he were not in Italie, but beyond sea, should rather be sent for, and called forth of Sicilie. So by order from the Senate, there were letters dispatched unto him, from L. Manlius the Pretour of the citie, together with those other letters of M. Marcellus the Consull: to geve him to understand, what the reason was, why the LL. called him rather out of his Province, than his colleague and companion in government.

At the same time there fortunied Embassadors to come unto Rome from King Syphax, recounting what prosperous warres their king had fought with the Carthaginians, assuring the Senate, that their lord and maister, as he was not a greater ennemie to any nation than to the Carthaginians, so he was not more readie to friend any state than the Romanes: saying moreover, that he had sent aforetime his Embassadors into Spaine unto the Romane Generals Cn. and P. Scipions, and now was most willing to seeke for the amitie and friendship of the Romanes even at the very fountaine and well head. The Senate not only returned answer to those embassadors in most gracious & courteous termes, but also addrest embassadors of their owne with rich gifts unto the king, and by name, L. Genutius, P. Petellius, and P. Popilius. The presents which they caried, were a side robe, and a kirtle of purple, an yvorie chaire, a boll or cup of beaten gold, weighing five pound. These Embassadors had in commission and charge, presently after they had dispatched with the king, to visit other princes and great lords of Affrick: and for to bestow on them also, they caried robes purpled and embrodred with purple, and golden bowles of three pound weight. Likewise there were sent as farre as Alexandria (in Egypt) unto K. Ptolomeus and Cleopatra the queene, M. Atilius, and M. Ailius as embassadors, for to call to remembrance, and renew the old friendship: and to them also they presented gifts, namely unto the king a long robe and a kirtle of purple, with an yvorie chaire: unto the queene a rich mantle of Baudkin, wrought with sundrie colours, with a vaile of purple.

In this summer time, whiles these foresaid matters passed, there were from out of the cities and countrie townes adjoyning, many prodigious sights, and fearefull tokens reported. At Tuscullum, there fell a lambe, having an udder yeelding milke: the louver or lantern of the temple of Jupiter was stricken with lightning, and in manner all the rouse uncovered. And much about those daies at Anagnia, the very soyle and ground before the gate thereof, caught fire with lightning, and for one day and night burned so, without any matter of fuell: and the foules and birds of the aire forsooke their nests which they had built in trees of the grove consecrated to Diana, neere unto the carrefour or crosse waie of Anagnia. Neere unto Tarracina there were scene in the sea not farre from the haven, serpents of an huge and wonderfull bignesse, to leap up above the water, and to disport and play like fishes. At Tarquinij, a swine farrowed a pig with a mans face. Also in the territorie of Capena, about the grove and temple of Feronia, there were foure statues sweat much bloud a day and a night. These fearefull tokens were by a decree of the Prelats purged and expiate, by greater sacrifices. And a solemne Supplication proclaimed one day at Rome in every church and chappell before all the shrines of the gods: and another day in the territorie of Capena, at the said grove and chappell of Feronia.

M. Valerius the Consull, called by the foresaid letters of the Senate, after he had recommended the charge of the province and the armie, unto Cincius the Pretour; and sent M. Valerius Messala the Admirall of the navie, with a certaine number of ships into Affrick, as well to fetch

A in prizes, as to espie and learne what the people of Carthage did and went about: himselfe with ten saile tooke the seas, and having a prosperous fore-wind arrived at Rome. And being come, presently he assembled the Senate, where he declared what acts and deeds he had performed in his province, namely, Whereas for the space almost of threescore yeares there had bene warre in Sicilie both by land and sea, and the same oftentimes fought with great losse and many defeats; that he now had brought those troubles to an happie end, and set the province in quiet. That there was not in all Sicilie one Carthaginian left; nor one Sicilian, of all them that for feare had bene chased and driven out from thence, but was returned and there replanted; that they were all brought home againe to their owne cities to inhabit, to their own lands, to plough and sow; that now at last, the fore-let and wast ground was husbanded againe, and made fruitfull, not only for the profit and commoditie of the occupiers and tenants thereof, but also for the most assured reliefe and sustentation of the people of Rome, both in warre and peace. After this, Mutines, and the rest who had deserved any thing well of the citie of Rome, were brought into the Senat: unto whom, both all and some (for the credit of the Consull, and to discharge him of his promise unto them) there were rendred all sorts of honorable recompense. Mutines also was enfranchised citizen of Rome, and a Bill was preferred in that behalte to the people, by the Tribune of the Commons, and with the graunt and auctoritie of the Senate.

During these affaires at Rome, M. Valerius Messala arrived in Affrick with a flecte of 50 sayle, and being landed one morning before day, sodainly and unwares to the people of the countrie, made a roade into the territorie about Vtica: and having forraid it farre and neere, taken many men and women prisoners, and raised a great bootie of all sorts of things besides, returned to the Armada, and crossed the seas back for Sicilie, and arrived againe at Lilybæum upon the thirtieth day after he loosed from thence, and tooke the seas first. Of the captives (after streight examination) he learned thus much (which also he set downe orderly in writing, and sent unto the Consull Levinus, that he might be acquainted likewise with the state of the affaires in Affrick) namely, that there were in Carthage five thousand Numidians, under the conduct of Masaniissa the sonne of Gala, a most forward young man, and a right valiant warriour; that there were other souldiers also throughout all Affrick waged and levied for money, readie to be transported and sent over into Spaine unto Asdraball, to the end that he with a most puissant power, might with all speed passe over into Italie, and joyne his forces with Anniball: that in the effecting of this designement, the Carthaginians were assuredly persuaded of the victorie. Moreover that there was a mightie navie a rigging and decking for to recover Sicilie againe, and as they verily thought, it should passe the seas very shortly.

These newes being red by the Consull, so troubled and disquieted the Senate, that they thought there was no tarying for the ordinarie election of Magistrates, summoned and called by the Consull, but that they should nominate a Dictatour of purpose to assemble that solemne Session, and the Consull immediately to returne againe into his province. But hereupon grew some debate and question for a time, while the Consull said, that he would nominate and create Dictatour M. Valerius Messala, who was then in Sicilie, and Admirall of the flecte: but the LL. replied againe and said, that a Dictatour might not be elected or declared without the territories of Rome, and those were all within the limits and marches of Italie. But after that M. Lucretius (a Tribune of the Commons) had put this controversie to question before the Senate for to be cast and decided by their opinions; then the Senate graunted out a decree, That the Consull before he departed from the citie, should put up a bill or supplication unto the bodie of the people, that it would please them to elect a Dictatour: and whom soever they by their suffrages chose, him should he pronounce and declare for the Dictatour: and in case the Consull refused so to do, then the Pretour of the citie should propose the same unto the people: and if not he neither, then the Tribunes should propound it unto the Commons. But when the Consull denied flatly to put it unto the people, being a thing merely belonging to his authoritie and place, and likewise expressly forbad the Pretour to do it: then the Tribunes of the Commons took the matter upon them, whereupon the commons graunted, that L. Fulvius who then was in Capua, should be nominated Dictatour. But the night before that very day that this assemblie of the commons was to be holden, the Consull departed privily, and tooke his journey toward Sicilie. The Nobles thus being disappointed and destitute, thought good to send letters unto Marcellus, for to lend his helping hand now unto the Common-weale, thus forsaken and abandoned done by his colleague, and to declare him for Dictatour, whom the people had by their voices elected. So Q. Fulvius was pronounced Dictatour by Marcellus the Consull: & by vertue of the said act of the commons, P. Licinius Crassus the Arch-prelat, was by Q. Fulvius nominated Generall of the Cavallerie.

The Dictatour after he was come to Rome, sent Cn. Sempronius Blaesus his Lieutenant, whom he had at Capua, to the armie into the province of Hetruria, in stead of G. Calpurnius the Pretour: whom by his letters he moved to take the government of Capua, and his armie there. And himself sent out precepts for the solemne elections of Consuls, against the first Comitial day that hee might by law. But by reason of a contention that grew betweene the Tribunes of the Commons & the Dictatour, it could not passe & be performed. For the centurie Galeria of the younger sort, which by lot had the prerogative of giving their first voices, elected for Consuls Q. Fulvius, and Q. Fabius: unto whose election no doubt, the rest of the Tribes called forth in right course and lawfull order would have inclined, but that C. and L. Arianus, the Trib. of the Com, came betweene with their negative voice: who said, it stood not well with civillie, that one man should continue ever still in magistracie, and besides, that it was a more shamefull example and foule precedent, that himselfe should be created Consull, who assembled the election: & therefore, if the Dictatour would admit of his owne name, and allow himselfe eligible, they would not suffer the assembly to continue any longer: but if there might be some other propounded besides him, they would not hinder the proceedings thereof, untill all was finished. The Dictatour leaded in the behalfe of the election, & maintained the cause by the authoritie of the Senate, by the graunt and act of the Commons, and by sundrie examples of former times. For when Cn. Servilius was Consull, at what time as Flaminius the other Consull, was slaine at Thrasymentus; by order graunted out of the Senate, there was a bill preferred to the Commons, and the same passed by their voices, That so long as the warre continued in Italie, it might bee lawfull for the people to chuse and create Consuls againe, as often as they pleased, whom soever they would, out of the number of them that had bene Consuls. And as for examples (quoth he) in this case, I can alleadge both old and new: to wit, long ago L. Posthumius Megillus being Interrex, was even in that very election which he called and held, created Consull himselfe, with Cn. Iun. Bruleus: and of later daies Q. Fabius likewise, who verily would never have accepted of the Consullship, and suffered it to be hung upon him so continually, if he had deemed it to be against the good of the common-weale. After much debate and long alteration, interteined with sundrie like speeches, at length the Dictatour and the Tribunes agreed to this point, and agreed of this issue, That they would stand to the award & judgement of the Senat. The LL. of the Senat were all of this mind, that the present condition of the common-weale, required no lesse, but that the state and the affaires therof, should be managed by old & experienced captains and Generals, and such as were skilfull in feates of armes. And therefore they utterly misliked, that the election should be hindered and disturbed. Thus the Tribunes relented, and the election went forward and was finished. So there were declared Consuls, Q. Fabius Max. the fift time, Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time. Then were created Pretours, L. Veturius Philo, T. Quintius Crispinus, C. Hostilius Tubulus, and C. Aurunculeius. When the magistrats were once elected for the year, Q. Fulvius resigned up his Dictatours roume.

In the very end of this summer, a Carthagian fleet of fortie saile, under the conduct of Amilcar the Admiral, passed over into Sardinia, and at first invaded and wasted the territorie of Olbia: then, after that P. Manlius Volsus the Pretour there, shewed himselfe with an armie, they set a compass about, and failed to the other side of the Iland, and forsook the lands about Caralita: and so returned againe into Affricke, enriched with prizes and booties of all sorts.

In that year, divers priests died at Rome, and new substituted in their roumes. C. Servilius the Prelate or Pontifex, was invested and enstalled in stead of T. Otilius Crassus. In like manner T. Sempronius Longus, the son of Caius, was chosen Decemvir, deputed for holy ceremonies, in place of T. Sempronius Longus, the sonne of Titus. M. Martius the K. of Sacrificers departed this life: and M. Aemilius Pappus likewise the grand-Curio or Priest of the Curia: but to succede them, were no priests deputed that year. In this year also were Censors created, to wit, L. Veturius Philo, & P. Licinius Crassus, the High-priest. As for Crassus Licinius, had neither bene Consull nor Pretour, before hee was made Censor, but stepped straight from his Aediles roume, into the place of Censor. But these Censors neither made choise of new Senatours, nor yet did any publicke

A publicke act: the reason was, because L. Veturius died, wherupon Licinius also gave over the Censureship. The Aediles of the chaire L. Veturius, & P. Licinius Varus, exhibited the Roman games, and renewed them againe one daie more than ordinarie. The Aediles of the Commons, Q. Catinus, and L. Porcius Licinius, set up in the temple of Ceres, the molten images of brasse, which were made of the money taken for fines and amercements; and represented the plaies and pastimes to their office belonging, right stately and with great furniture and preparation, as the wealth and plentie of those times would afford.

In the end of this year, C. Laelius the Lieutenant of Scipio, arrived at Rome, the foure and thirtieth day after that hee lofed and tooke sea at Taracom. And as hee entred the citie with a mightie traine of captives, he set the people on running out of all parts, to see that sight. The morrow after, he was admitted into the Senate-house: where he related, that new Carthage the head citie of Spaine, was forced and woon in one day; that divers cities which had revolted, were received upon surrenders, and other new entred into societie & friendship with the people of Rome. And by enquire of the captives, they found their intelligences to agree in manner with the advertisements & tidings contained in the letters of M. Valerius Messala. But the thing that troubled the lords most, was the voiage of Asdruball into Italie, which hardly was able to withstand the forces of him and Annibal together, Laelius being brought into the generall assembly of the people, discoursed of the same points which hee had related in the Senate-house. And the Senate, in regard of the happie successe of P. Scipio, graunted by a decree, a solemne procession for one day; and gave order that C. Laelius with all convenient speed should make hast againe, & repaire C into Spaine with the very same ships that he brought from thence.

The winning of Carthage I have set downe in this year, having the warrant of many writers: and yet I am not ignorant, that some there bee, who have affirmed that it hapned the next year following. But me seemes, it was an unlikely matter, that Scipio should spend one whole year in Spaine, in doing just nothing.

Now when Q. Fabius Max. was Consull the fift time, & Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time, on that very day upon which they entred their office (which was in the Ides of March) both of them by decree of the Senate, had the government of the province Italie: but so, as their jurisdiction was set out by the countries: so as Fabius should war about Tarentum, and Fulvius in the Lucanes and Brutiens countries, M. Claudius continued still in government one year longer. The D Pretours had their provinces parted betweene them by lot: unto Caius Hostilius Tubulus, fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, but to L. Veturius Philo, over foreigners, together with Gallia. Titus Quintius Crispinus ruled Capua, and C. Aurunculeius governed Sardinia. The armies were divided among the provinces in this wise: Vnto Fulvius were assigned the two legions which M. Valerius Levinus had in Sicilie: Vnto Q. Fabius, those in Hetruria, which were commaunded by C. Calpurnius. The citie armie was appointed to succed those legions in Hetruria: & C. Calpurnius was ordained to sit in the government of that province, & to have the leading of that armie which Q. Fulvius had. It was agreed moreover, that T. Quintius should be lord President of Capua, and have the charge of the armie there. And that C. Hostilius should receive the jurisdiction of C. Lectorius the Pro-pretour, over the province at Ariminum, and likewise his armie. Vnto M. Marcellus the same legions were allowed, wherewith he had warred so fortunatly when hee was Consull. Vnto M. Valerius and L. Cincius (for they also continued one year more, governors in Sicilie) was the armie remaining after the battaile at Cannæ, graunted: and they were commaunded to supply and make up all the companies thereof, out of those souldiours that were left of the legions of Cn. Fulvius. For the Consuls caused them to be fought out and gathered together, and sent them into Sicilie: and disgraced them with the very same kind of ignominious soulderie, in which the Cannians served: as also those, who remaining of the armie of Cn. Fulvius the Pretour, had bene thither sent by order from the Senate, for anger and despite that they fled like as the other. Vnto C. Aurunculeius, the same legions were given by decree in Sardinia, wherewith P. Manlius Volsus had ruled & governed that province. And P. Sulpitius having his government proroged for one year longer, was commaunded to rule Macedonia with the same legion and armada still. Thirtie Galleaces of five bankes of oars, were appointed to bee sent out of Sicilie unto Tarentum, to Q. Fabius the Consull. With the rest of the navie, it was agreed and order set downe, that M. Valerius Levinus, should either himselfe passe over into Affricke, for to forey & spoile the countie, or send L. Cincius, or M. Valerius Messala, whither of them he would.

For

For the government of Spaine there was no alteration, save only this, that Scipio and Syllanus had their commission continued, not for a yeare as the rest, but untill such time as they should be called from thence by order from the Senate. Thus were the provinces divided, and thus were the forces bestowed for this yeare.

Among other affaires of greater importance, the Election of the high Curio, or chiefe parish preist, who was to be elected in the room of M. Aemilius late deceased, renewed & set on foot again an old contention [betweene Commons and Nobles.] For the Patritij denied, That C. Manilius Attilius (who was the onely man of the Commons that stood for it) was eligible, and therefore not to be pricked; for as much as never any before him, obtained that sacerdotall dignitie, but one of Senatours calling. The Tribunes being called unto for their assistance, referred the matter to the Senate. And the Senate put it unto the people, for to be decided by them. So C. Manilius Attilius was the first Commoner that ever was created Maximus Curio, [i. the Grand-superintendent over all the Curiae in matters of religion.] And P. Licinius the Arch-bishop, constrained C. Valerius Flaccus to bee installed and inaugurate the flame of Jupiter, against his will. And C. Licinius was created Decemvir for holie rites and ceremonies, and for sacrifices, in steed of Q. Mutius Scaevola late deceased. The cause and occasion of inaugurating that Flamin by constraint and compulsion, I would willingly have concealed and smothered in silence, but that the ill name, wherein he was, turned afterwards to good fame and reputation. This Flaccus for his carelesse, loose, and riotous demeanure in his youth, in regard of which vicious course of life, he was odious to his owne naturall brother L. Flaccus, and other his kinsfolke, was for the same cause chosen Flamin, by P. Licinius the said Arch-bishop. This man, so soon as his mind was employed about church-matters and religious ceremonies, so suddainly all at once altered his life, and cast off his old behaviur, that there was not one of all the young men in Rome in more account and credite, nor better liked of the cheefe of the Nobilitie and LL. of the Senate, as well those of his owne house and linage, as others that were straungers unto him. And when hee saw himselfe grown generally into this good opinion and reputation among men, he began to have a very great conceit of his owne partes and worthinesse, in so much, as hee brought up an old custome againe, and was so bold as to take his place in the Senate house (a thing, that for many yeares space had been intermitted and discontinued, in regard of the base unworthinesse and insufficiencie of the former Flamines.) When he was entred into the Senate chamber, C. Licinius the Pretour willed him to goe forth, as being no place for him, and therewith drew him out: whereupon the Flamine called for helpe of the Tribunes of the Commons, pleading the ancient right and preheminance of that priestly dignitie, and alleading, that C. Flaminius in times past enjoyed that place, together with the pall, or embroidered rich robe, and the yvorie chaire. The Pretour on the other side came upon him againe and said, That right was not grounded upon old examples past all date, set out of Chronicles time out of mind: but he would needs have it to be carried by the most fresh practise of the newest and latest custome, affirming, That by prescription of the time, either of our fathers or grandfathers daies, there was no Flamine of Jupiter usurped that priviledge. The Tribunes, who were to moderate this question, gave their judgement thus, That if a thing were forelet, and discontinued through the supine negligence of some Flamines, it was worst for themselves; & they deemed it no reason, that it should hurt or prejudice the whole Priesthood. Whereupon, the Pretor himselfe forced not greatly upon the point, nor stood much with him, and so they admitted the Flamine into the house, with great consent of the Nobles, as well as of the Commons. And all men thus conceived of it, That the Flamine had obtained the thing, rather in regard of his sanctimonie and holinesse of life, than in the right of his sacerdotall dignitie.

The Consuls before that they went into their provinces, enrolled two legions of citizens, for to supplie and make up sufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The old citie armie, Fulvius the Consull committed unto C. Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, (and brother he was besides to the Consull) for to be led into Hetruria; with direction, that the Legions already in Hetruria should be brought to Rome. And Fabius the Consull caused the residue of the armie of Fulvius to be sought up and rallied, which arose to the number of 3336: and commaunded his sonne Q. Maximus to lead them into Sicilie, unto M. Valerius the Pro-consull, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirtie galliaces aforesaid, bearing five ranckes of oares. The withdrawing of these Legions out of the Island, nothing diminished nor abridged the garisons of A of that province, either in strength or shew. For besides the two old legions, well and sufficiently fulfilled and furnished, he had a great power as well horse as foot, of Numidians, such as were fled from the adverse part unto the Romanes: and tooke up and levied besides for new souldiours, even those Sicilians also, who had ben of the armie of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valour, and skillfull Warriours. These foraine aids, when hee had put to each of the Romane legions, hee kept still the forme of two complete armies. With the one he gave order to L. Cinquus to defend that part of the island, which had been the realme of king Hierax; with the other, he maintained the rest of the Island, divided sometimes by the confines of the Romane and Punick dominions. There was a fleet also rigged and trimmed, consisting of severie ships, for to guard and defend all the maritime coasts, along the tract of the sea side. Himselfe in person, with the horsemen of Mutines, rode about all the province, for to visit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were tilled & well husbanded, which lay forelet and untilled, and to commend or chastise and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of corne, thus farre forth did good, that the province was able both to send good store to Rome, and also to convey unto Catana sufficient to maintaine the armie, that was to lie in standing campe that summer about Tarentum.

But the souldiours who were transported over into Sicilie (and for the better part they were Latines and other Associates) were like to cause a great rising and commotion: whereby we may see, that of small occasions and beginnings oftentimes, arise great matters of important consequence. For the Latines and Allies in all their Diets and counsels at home, began to mutter and grumble, That now for tenne yeares space they were with continuall musters and payments of souldiours wages consumed and spent, that there was not a year in manner went over their heads, but it cost them some great losse and overthrow in battaile. Many were slaine in the warres, other died of diseases. So that a citizen of theirs, if he were taken and prest ones by the Romanes, for to be a souldiour, was more sure to perish, than if he were taken prisoner by the Carthaginians: for the enemie sent their captives backe againe gratis and without ranfome, home into their countrey; the Romanes posted and packed them away out of Italie, as confined to a place of banishment (to speake truly) rather than appointed to serve in warfare. For, see how the souldiours, remaining after the field of Cannæ, have continued there, and waxen old these eight yeares alreadie, and no doubt, there were they like to lay their bones, before that the enemie (who never so flourished, nor was so strong as now) would depart from thence. In case then that old souldiours returne not into their countrey, and new still be chosen, within a while there would be none left behind. And therefore best it were for them, before they were come to extreame povertie & desolation, presently to denie the people of Rome that, whiles somewhat is left, which shortly they must be driven to doe of very necessitie when all is gone. And if the Romanes see their Allies once agree together, and take this course, they will then verily bethinke themselves, and grow to some teames of making peace with the Carthaginians. For otherwise, be sure as long as Anni-ball hath a day to live, Italie will never be cleare of warres. These and such like speeches passed in their Diets aforesaid. There were at that time thirtie Colonies of the people of Rome: and whiles the Embassages from them all were at Rome, twelve of them denied the Consuls flatly, and said they were not able any longer to find either men or money. And those were these, Ardea, Nepes, Sutrium, Circeij, Alba, Caracoli, Suessa, Sora, Seria, Cales, Narnia, Interamna. The Consuls amazed at this strange and unexpected accident, being desirous to drive them out of that mind, and to skare them from so detestable a resolution, supposed they should prevaile more by chastising and rebuking, than by faire and gentle dealing: and therefore told them againe, That they had presumed to speake that unto the Consuls, which they againe were abashed and could not find in their hearts, to deliver and relate in the Senate house. For surely (say they) this is not a refusal of souldierie and ware service, but a very meere revolting from the people of Rome, and no better than an open rebellion. Therefore, they were best to return againe speedily into their severall Colonies, & to consult with their neighbors and countymen, while the matter remained yet all whole, as men who had rather let fall some words rashly at adventure, than resolved indeed to attempt & commit so heinous an act: yea, and to tell them, and put them in mind, that they themselves were neither Campanes nor Tarentines, but meere Romanes, from them descended, and of their race; from thence sent as Colonies, into the lands that were woen by conquest, for to breed increase and multiplie; and to admonish them, That whatsoever duties duties children owe to their parents, the same they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them any kind and naturall affection, any remembrance of their aunient native country: and to exhort them to consider better of the matter, & to lay their heads together anew. For as much as those designements of theirs, tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the victorie of all unto Anniball. When the Consuls one after another had delt and bene in hand with them a long time in this manner: and the embassadors nothing moved with their words, made answer againe, That neither they knew what other message to bring home; nor their Senate what new counsell to take: since that they had not any more men to be mustred for fouldiours, nor money to be payed for wages: the Consuls seeing them so stiffely and obstinately bent, made relation thereof before the Senate, whereupon every man was stricken into so great feare and trouble of mind, that many of them gave out, that the empire of Rome was come to an end. The like, say they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and surely all our confederates and allies are combined and agreed to betray the citie of Rome unto Anniball. But the Consuls comforted the Senate, and bad them be of good cheere, saying, That all the other Colonies besides, would continue loyall and fast in their dutie and allegiance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there might be embassadours sent amongst them, to rebuke and chastise them, and not to speake them faire and intreat them by way of prayer, would no doubt have a respective reverence of the majestie of the Romane empire. Now when the LL. of the Senate had committed the ording of this matter wholly unto them for to manage and handle, according as they should thinke good for the weale publick: after they had thoroughly sounded the hearts and minds of all the rest of the Colonies, they called and cited all the embassadors, and demaunded of them whither their fouldiers were in readinesse, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Sextilius of Fregellæ, made answer in the behalfe of eightene of them, That not only their fouldiers were readie according to the forme of the covenant, but also if more were needfull, more they would allow, and whatsoever els the people of Rome imposed upon them, and wished them to performe, the same would they streine themselves to do, to the utmost: for, as yet they had people store, and a purse good enough: and as for their heart, it was much better than their abilitie. The Consuls after they had made a short speech unto them by way of a preamble, saying that they thought it not sufficient for their desert to be commended from their mouth only, unlesse all the LL. generally in the Senate house, gave them condigne thanks with one voyce and common accord, willed them to follow after them thither. The Senate having thanked them, in as honorable termes as they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the Consuls, to bring them forth also in the face of the whole people of the citie: and before them, among other singular favours and kindnesse which they had shewed both unto them and also unto their auncestors, to make reherfall of this late good desert of others, which they affourded unto the Common-wealth: to the end, that now also, after so many ages and lives of men past they should not be forgotten and buried in silence, nor defrauded of their just prayse and due commendation. And these were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the citie of Rome: The Signines, Nolanes, and Norbanes; the Satriculanes, Brundusines, and Fregellanes; the Lucerines, Venusines, and Adrians; the Firmanes, and inhabitants of Ariminum. And from the other sea side the Pontianes, Pestanes, and Costanes: and of midlanders, the Beneventines, Efferlines, Spoletines, Placentines, and the inhabitants of Cremona. Vpon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the Romane state at this time rested and stood maintained: and these all were highly thanked both in the Senate, and in the assemblie of the people. As for the other twelve Colonies, which had refused to do their obedience, the LL. of the Senate gave expresse commaundement that they should not be so much as once minded or named: and that the Consuls should neither geve them their dispatch, nor reteine them still, nor so much as speake unto them. This silent kind of rebuke without word giving, seemed to stand most with the majestie and grandeur of the people of Rome.

Whiles the Consuls were diligent in providing and making readie all other things requisite and meete for the warres, it was thought good to bring abroad the vicefmarie gold [to wit, the twentieth part of all their tributes and revenewes] which had bene laid up and reserved apart in a more secret closet of the citie-chamber, against an hard winter (as they say) to serve for what need soever the common-wealth should stand in. So there was taken forth foure thousand pound weight

A weight of gold, whereof three hundred pound was geven to the two Consuls apiece, and so likewise to M. Marcellus, and P. Sulpitius the Proconsuls: and to L. Veturius the Pretour, unto whose lot the province of Fraunce befell. And Fabius the Consull had an addition besides himselfe above the rest of one hundred pound weight of gold, for to be caried into the castle of Tarantum. The rest of the gold they disbursed for to make readie payment downe upon the naile, unto them that undertooke to provide apparell for the armie in Spaine, which to their owne fame and the honor of their Generall, served there in the warres.

Moreover it was thought good that before the Consuls departed unto their Provinces, the prodigious tokens should be purged and expiate. On the Albane mount there were smitten with fire from heaven the image of Jupiter, and a tree standing neere unto the temple: likewise the lake at Hostia, the well at Capua, and the church of Fortune: and at Sinuessæ, the wall and gate of the towne. These I say were blasted with lightning, and smitten with thunderbolts. There were some also brought word, that the water at Alba ran bloud. And at Rome within the sanctuarie of the chappell of Fors Fortuna, a little image that stood upon her coronet, fell of it owne accord from the head of the goddesse into her hands. And at Privernum, it was for certaine reported and known of a truth, that an Oxe spake, and that a Vulture or Gripe flew into a shop in the market place, when it was full of people. And at Sinuessæ there was an infant borne of doubtful sexe, betweene male and female, (which the common sort call Androgynoi, as for the most part greeke names, admit more easy composition of two words than the latine) and there it rained milke, and a man child was borne with an Eliphants head. These strange and fearful signes were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater sacrifices: and a solemne procession in all the churches and chappels, with prayers and supplications, was proclaimed for one day. Besides, a decree was graunted, that C. Hostilius the Pretour should vow and set out the games and playes of Apollo, in such manner as of late yeeres they had bene vowed and set forth.

About the same time Q. Fulvius the Consull held an assemblie for the creation of Censors, and elected Censors were M. Cornel. Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who neither of them had ever bene Coss. And by a graunt or commission from the Senate, there was a bill preferred unto the Commons, and the same passed, that these Censors should set and to ferme let the territorie of Capua. The revew of the Senate and choise of new Senatours was hindered and stayed, by reason of a contention betweene the two Censors, who should be the president of the Senat.

Now the choosing of him lay in Sempronius his hand. Howbeit Cornelius alleadged, that the custome and tradition of forefathers should be followed, namely, to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living, had borne first the office of Censor. And that was T. Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius replied againe and said, that as the gods had geven him by lot the first place, so they had graunted him free libertie to choose whom he would. And therefore he would elect Q. Fabius Max. whom at that time he was able to prove to be the principall man of all the citie, without exception, and take Anniball himselfe for the judge. After much variance and contesting of words, at length Sempronius by relenting and permission of his colleague, elected Q. Fabius Max. the chiefe Senatour. Then the Senate was changed, and new Senatours chosen, and eight were overpassed and left out, among whom was L. Caelius Metellus, he that gave the infamous and shamefull counsell, to abandon Italie after the defeature at Cannæ. In noting likewise and disgracing the knights and gentlemen, the same cause was considered of, and tooke effect, but very few there were of them, that were touched with that infamie: but all those horsemen belonging to the Cannian legions who were in Sicilie (and no small number there was of them) had their horses taken from them: And to aggravate this sharp punishment and note of disgrace, they were plagued also with time of long warfare: for so many of them as had served with horse allowed by the citie, should not reckon upon the yeeres passed already, but were to follow warfare 10 yeere forward, and find themselves horses. Moreover these Censors after diligent search & survey, found out and met with a great number of those that ought to have served on horseback: and looke how many of them were fixteene yeeres old & upward at the beginning of the war, and had not bin employed in the warres, those all they disfranchised, & made Ararii, or contributaries. After this they bargained by the great, for the repairing and reedifying againe of those edifices which had bene consumed by fire about the Forum, [or market place] namely, the seven shops, the [fish] shambles, and the kings hall, or royall gallerie.

Thus when all things were finished which were to be done at Rome, the Consuls set forward to

to the warres. And first Fulvius went before to Capua: and some few daies after, Fabius followed: G who befought both his owne colleague by word of mouth most earnestly, and also Marcellus by effectual letters, to make sharpe warre upon Anniball, and to keepe him occupied, while hee failed Tarentum: which citie, if it were once taken from the enemy, he were then driven out of all, and having no place to put his head in, nor which he might make account to stand fast & truste unto him, he should have no reason at all, once to stay in Italie. Hee dispatched also a messenger to Rhegium unto the capitaine of the fort and garison, which by Launus the Consull was there placed against the Brutij: and those were eight thousand men. The greatest part of them, was of those good fellows, and that damned crew, whereof we spake before, who used to live by robbing & stealing, & were broght thither from Agaturna out of Sicilie. Vnto whom there were adjoynd many of the Brutij also fugitives from thence, and as good as themselves every way, H both for audaciouesnesse, & also, for needinesse, to set upon any bold adventure whatsoever. This power of men he commaunded should be lead to wast and spoile the Brutiens countrie first, and then to lie against the citie Caulonia, and to assault it. They having performed this service, not onely willingly and chearfully, but also with greedinesse; having also chased away and risted the husbandmen and peasants of the countrie, assailed the citie with all forcible means. Marcellus stirred up and provoked by those letters of the Consull: and having a good opinion of his own, that of all the Romane capitaines, there was not one so able to match Anniball as himselfe, left his wintering standing campe, so soone as ever there was forage and grasse in the countrie, tooke the field, and encountered Anniball at Cannusium. Now was Anniball in hand with the Cannusines, and solicited them to revolt. But hearing once that Marcellus approached, hee dislodged from thence. The countrie thereabout was plaine and open, without any covert places to bellow an ambush, and to lay traines in, therefore he began to retire himselfe from thence, into the wood-land parts. Marcellus tracked him still, and followed him hard at heeles, and encamped close unto him: and ever as hee had fortified and entrenched himselfe, he brought forth his men into the field, readie for battaile. Anniball entertaining small skirmishes, with certaine comes and troupes of horsemen, and with light appointed footmen, that launced darts and javelines, thought it not necessarie yet, to come unto a pight set battaile, and venture all upon one throw. Howbeit he was drawne to a fight, maugre his head, howsoever he labored to avoid it. For being gone afore one night, Marcellus overtooke him upon a plaine and open ground: and as hee was pitching his tents, he kept him from fortifying, by charging his pioners and labourers on every side. VVherupon they came to a very battel, & fought with all the forces they had on both sides: and when it grew toward night, they departed asunder on even hand: but before it was darke they had encamped not farre one from another, and in great hast made shift to fortifie themselves. The next morning by day light, Marcellus came forth into the field with all his power: neither refused Anniball the challenge, having with many words comforted and encouraged his soldiers, to remember Thrasymenus & Cannæ, to cut the comb & beate down & tame this fell stomacke and lustie courage of the enemy: who preaseth still (qd. he) and seeketh upon us, not suffering us to march on quietly in our journey, nor to pitch our tents: giving us no leave to breath ourselves, nor time to looke about us. There is not a morning, but so soone as the sunne is up in the horizon to give light to the world, the Romane armie is out in the field, to give us battaile. If we could draw bloud of him once, and set him out of the field with bloud about his eares, he would for ever after, fight more quietly, and take better leisure with him. With these and such like comfortable words and effectual remonstrances, they were well animated; as also provoked seeing themselves thus molested by the enemy, who day by day, never ceased to challenge, and brave them still: whereupon they began a fierce and cruell battaile. They had now continued fight above two houres; and then began the Romane Cavallerie from the right wing, and the extraordinarie souldiours that flanked the maine battaile, to give ground and dismarch. Which Marcellus perceiving, he brought forward the eighteenth legion in the vaward. And whiles some recule backe fearfully, others come forward but slowly, the whole battaile was put out of order, and disarayd; and so at length it was discomfited: and for that feare surmounted shame, they turned their backs and fled away agood. Slaine there were in the conflict and in the rowt together, some 2700 citizens and allies one with another: among whome, there were foure Romane Centurians, and two Colonels, Marcus Licinius, & Marcus Fulvius. Of militarie ensignes, there were foure lost of that right wing which first shrunke & lost ground; and two others of that legion

A legion which came to succour their fellows that gave backe and reculed. Marcellus after that he was returned into the campe, welcommed his souldiours with such a bitter & sharpe Oration, that the very words of the Generall in his anger and wrath, were more heave & grievous unto them, than the medley it selfe, which they had unfortunately endured all the day long before. I yceld praise yet, and render thanks to the immortal gods, (quoth he) as I may in such a case, that our enemies having vanquished & conquered you in the field, and driven you in so great feare to run headlong within your trenches & gates, came not with all at once to assaile the camp. For surely in the same fearful fright that you forooke battel, you would likewise have abandoned your tents & pavilions. VVhat fearfulness is this? Whence commeth this terror? VVhat means this oblivion of yours? How commeth it to passe, that ye should so forger al on a sodain, both your own selves, & them with whom ye have to fight? VVhy surely, they are the same enemies and no other, whom the summer past, you did nothing but either vanquish & overcome, or else pursue and follow in chase: whom for these certain daies past, ye have bene redie to tread on their heels as they fled and ran away before you both by day & night; whom in light skirmishes ye have discomfited; whom no longer ago than yesterday, you suffred neither to march forward, nor to pitch their campe. I forbear to speak, & I passe in silence those things which in good right ye may stand upon and make your boast. I say nothing of that wherof ye ought to be ashamed and displeased with your selves, namely, how but even yesterday, ye brake off the fight on even hand, and retired out of the field, when the enemy had gotten no advantage? VVhat hath this one night, or what hath one day cut you off? Aye either your forces in this mean time abridged & diminished, or your enemies augmented & encreased? Now surely, me thinks, I speak not to mine own armie, nor to Roman souldiers. Only yee carrie about you the same bodies and armor, that ye were wont. For if ye had borne the same minds and hearts with you, should the enemies ever have seene your backs? Should they have taken either banner from any companie, or ensigne from cohort and squadron? As yet the enemy never vaunted and made boast of the defeature of our Romane legions. You are the very first, that this day have given him the honour of discomfiting and putting to flight our armie. Then they all cried out, and besought him to pardon that daies default, and to make triall once againe of his souldiours courages, when and wheresoever hee would. Mary and that I will (quoth he) my souldiours: I will put you to it: even to morrow I will bring you abroad into the field, and after yee have gotten the victorie, yee shall obtaine that pardon which now yee crave. D So he gave order that those cohorts which had lost their ensignes, should have their allowance of barley in stead of wheat: and as for those Centurions of the bands or companies, whose banners were lost, them he degraded in this manner: Hee caused them to bee disarmed, and their skaines to be drawne naked and taken from them, and so let them go & shake their eares. And withall, he made proclamation, that the next day they should all present themselves in readines, as well footmen as horsemen. Which done, hee dismissed the audience, and they all confessed and acknowledged, that they were justly and worthily thus checked and rebuked: and that there was not that day one man in the Romane armie, setting aside the Generall himselfe onely, but he was bound to make amends and satisfaction, either with spending heart-bloud, or atchieving a noble victorie. The morrow after, they all shewed themselves unto him in their armor, & well appointed, according to his commaundement. The Generall commended them for their forwardnes: and gave them to understand, that he would set those in the forefront of the vaward, which the day before began to run away, as also those cohorts likewise that lost their ensignes. And now he gave them warning, & charged them all to fight it out lustily, to win the field: & to endeavor & straine themselves, both all and some, that the news of yesterdayes flight came not to Rome before, & prevented the fame of this daies victorie. Then he willed them to go to their meat, & to strengthen their bodies: that in case the fight should hold long, they might be able to endure to the end. Now when al was said & done, that might encourage & stir up the hearts of souldiours, they went out & advanced their ensignes into the field. Annibal being advertised hereof, Now beleve me (qd. he) we have to deale with an enemy indeed, who is of that nature, that he can neither brooke his good fortune, nor away with bad. If hee hath woon at any time, he pursueth those whom he hath vanquished, cruelly. Contrariwise if he have lost, he beginneth to fight with the conquerors againe right freshly. Then he commaunded the trumpets to found, & brought forth his power in battell array. A field was fought there on both hands more sharpe a good deale, than the day before. The Carthaginians strived to keepe the honour and reputation of yesterdayes service: the Romanes strai-ned to wipe away the ignominie and shame of that daies foile. On the Romanes side, the Caval-lerie of the left wing, and those cohorts which had lost their ensignes, fought in the vauntguard, and the twentieth legion was marshalled and ranged in the right point of the battell. L. Cornelius Lentulus & C. Claudius Nero had the leading of both these wings. M. Marcellus himselfe commanded the maine battell, and withall his personall preference encouraged them, as a witnesse of their valour and courage. Now, when as the fight had continued long, and the victorie enclined no way, Anniball commaunded the Elephants to be put forth upon the very forefront of the battell, to see if that object might possible work some terror and confusion among the Romans.

 And at the first they disordered the ensignes and troubled the ranks: so as, partly by treading under foot, and partly by scattering them for feare, that were about, they had laid naked & open the battell in one part; and in more places than so had the Romanes fled, but that C. Decinius Fla- vus, a Colonell, having from the first band of the Hastarii, caught up the banner in his hand, commaunded the companie thereto belonging to follow him; and thither hee led them where the foresaid Elephants were gathered round, and made foulest worke, and charged them to sling their darts and javelins at them. All this shot light sure, and missed them not, yea, and some stucke in them: and no marvel, for the beasts were neere at hand, the bodies great and standing thick in a plump together. But as they were not all wounded, so they that had the darts set fast in their backs and sides, were as reagic (such is their nature, dangerous to meddle withall) for to hurt their owne maisters, as the enemies; and all turned upon their fellows that were unhurt, and drave them backe. So as now, not that entire band onely, but every souldiour for his owne part, who was able to reach the head (as it were) of the Elephants as they fled, did his best to launce javelins and short darts at them. And so much the more furiously ran the beasts upon their owne, and made a farre greater havock there, than they had done among the enemies; by how much more fiercely feare and fright set them agate, and sent them forward, than the will of their maisters that sate upon them, was able to rule and restrain them. The Roman footmen espying this advantage, came forward with their ensignes and banners upon that bat-taillon, which was put in disarray by the running to and fro of these unruly dumbe creatures, and without much adoe and farther skirmish, put them to flight, after they were once broken out of their ranks, and set in a flight. Then Marcellus sent his Cavalierie after them, to pursue them as they fled, and to follow the chase, and never gave they over hunting and coursing them, untill they had lodged them in great feare within their camp. For besides all other things, which made them thus scared and affrighted, there chaunced two Elephants to fall downe in the very gate and entrance thereof, so that the souldiours were forced to rush into it over the trench and ramp-pier. In that place was the greatest slaughter made of the enemies. For there were slaine eight thousand men, and five Elephants. Neither had the Romanes a bloudlesse victorie of it: for of the two legions, there died fast upon 1700, and of the Allies more than 1400. Besides, many a citizen and confederate fore wounded. And Anniball the next night dislodged and departed. Mar- cellus although he was desirous to follow upon him, yet he could not for the multitude of his hurt men. The espials that were sent out to pursue him in his march, brought word back the next day, that Anniball tooke his way into the Brutians countrie.

Neere about the same time, the Hirpines, Lucanes, and Volscientes, after they had delivered up the garrisons of Anniball, which they had in their cities, yeelded themselves also to Q. Ful- vius the Consull, & were received to merie with great clemencie by the said Consull, after some rebuke given them in words onely for their trespass and error past. The Brutians also had the like hope of pardon, when as Vibius and Pacius, two brethren, of the noblest house of that nation, came from them to sue for the same condition of yeelding and surrendring themselves, which was graunted unto the Lucanes.

Q. Fabius the Consull, woon by assault a towne in the Salentines countrey called Manduria.
 Prisoners were taken there, 4000, and some good store of other pillage. From thence he went to Tarentum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay against the citie. Those ships which Livius had for to waite the convoy of victuals, hee partly charged with engines, and other ordinance to assault townes withall, and partly furnished with artillerie, with stones, and shot of all sorts: the ships of burden likewise, and not the gallies onely which were guided by oares; to the end, that some might bring engines and ladders unto the walls, and others aloofe from out of the ships, wound and hurt those that defended the citie. These ships were ordained and appointed from the open

A open sea to assault the citie. And cleare was the sea of all danger from the Punicke navie, which was sent unto Corcyra, at what time as Philip minded to assaile the Ætolians. In this mean while, the assailants of Caulonia, a little before the comming of Anniball, for feare lest they should be surprisid, betook themselves to a little hill; which as it was (for the present danger) a place of safetie, so it wanted all things els. Fabius, as hee lay at siege about Tarentum, was much helped to the achieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to speake of, and of small moment in it selfe. The Tarentines had a garison of the Brutians, sent from Anniball to defend the citie. The captaine of this garison was greatly enamoured and readie to die for the love of a woman, who had a brother that served in the armie of Fabius the Consull. He being certified by letters from his sister, of this new acquaintance that shee had with that forrainger and straunger, so B wealthie and so honorable a person among his countrimen; conceived some hope by means of his sister, that her lover might be brought to any thing; & wrought as they would: and so acquainted the Consull with his conceited hope. And this seemed no vain imagination. Whereupon the young man was sent to Tarentum in habite and qualitie of a fugitive, and by the mediation of his sister, grew into some favour with the captaine aforesaid: and at first practised secretly to underfetele and sound his mind, and afterwards seeing the weakenesse and inconstancie of the man, he prevailed with him so much, through the flattering speeches and allurements of the woman, as to betray the keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge. After that the manner how, and the time when this plot should be put in execution, was agreed upon, the said sould-iour was let out of the citie closely by night in a place betweene the corps de guard, and enfor-C med the Consull what was done already, and in what sort every thing was to be done. Fabius at the first watch, after he had given a token and watchword to them in the castle, and to those likewise that had the keeping of the haven, himselfe set a compass about the said haven, and lay as closely as he could to that part of the citie which lieth to the East. Then all at once the trumpets sounded from the castle, from the haven and ships, which in the open sea did neere at hand. Great shouting there was, and much adoe for the nones from all these quarters, whereas indeed there was least danger or none at all there. In the meane season the Consull kept his men in. Whereupon Democrates, who had beforetime bene Admirall of the Armada, and whose chaunce it was to have the guarding of that place, against which the Consull lay close, seeing all thereabout quiet ynough, and no stirring at all, and hearing all other parts to ring againe and resound with D such al armes as otherwise it seemed the citie was taken and woon, and fearing least if he sat still and bestirred not himselfe, the Consull would make some Camisado, and give the assaie to enter the citie with banner displayed; withdrew his guard toward the castle, from whence was heard the greatest and most terrible noise. Fabius, when hee perceived once by guessing at the time, as also by the silence it selfe in that place (for where but a while before they kept much adoe, raising up one another, & calling to arm, there now all was hush, and not a word) that the guards were had away from thence, he commaunded that the ladders should bee brought to that side of the wall, where the brocher and broker both of the treason, had brought word that the cohorts of the Bru-tians were quartered & kept their guard. Thus on that part was the wal woon, by the means of the Brutij, who were readie to helpe and take them up, & so they got over into the citie. Then was the E next gate broken open, that the armie might come by companies under their severall colours.
 Whereupon they set up a shout, and a little before breake of day, they marched as far as into the market stead, and met with none to make head against them, & caused al them that fought at the castle and the haven, to turne upon them. There, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmish, rather fought hotely than maintained thorowly. For the Tarentine souldiours were nothing comparable to the Romanes, either in courage of heart, or goodnesse of armour; in skill and knowledge of warre, or in lustinesse and strength of bodie. And therefore when they had onely shot their darts, even before they came to handstrokes, they turned backe and slunk away through the lanes of the citie, wherewith they were well acquainted, some to their owne home, and some to their friends houses. Two of their captaines, Nico and Democrates, fought F manfully, and were slaine. Philomenes, who was the principall head that wrought the revolt unto Anniball, fled out of the skirmish as fast as ever his horse would carrie him: but a while after his emptie horse was seene and knowne wandering astray in the citie, but his bodie could never bee found. It was commonly beleevd, that he slung himselfe headlong from his horsebacke, into a certaine open pit. As for Carthalo, captaine of the Punicke garison, he cast away his armour and weapon, weapon, and as he was coming to the Consull with a goodly tale, recounting and remembering G his fathers friendship and intertainment to the Romanes, there hapned a souldiour to meete him and strike off his head. Then by some or other in every place, the Carthaginians and Tarentines both went to wrack, and were killed without mercie and regard, as well unarmed as armed. Yea, there were many of the Brutians also fell upon the edge of the sword, were it that they were mistaken, or for an old grudge and in-set hatred; or to suppress and extinguish the bruit and rumor that went of betraying the towne: to the end that Tarentum might seeme the rather woon by assault and force of armes. Then from murder and slaughter, they fell to sack and spoile the citie. There were taken prisoners by report thirtie thousand head of slaves: a mightie masse of silver tried and coined: of gold 87000 pound weight. Images and painted tables or pictures, so many, as very neere amounted to the number of the ornaments of Syracusa. But Fabius of a braver mind, abstained from that kind of prize & pillage, which Marcellus forbare not. For when his Scribe or Secretarie asked him, what his pleasure was, should be done with the images (and the Statues they were of the gods, of a mightie bignesse and proportion, portraied every one in their owne habit like warriours:) Mary (quoth he) let the Tarentines have their angrie gods still among them, for me. After this, the wall which devided the citie from the castle, was dismantled, rased downe, and laid even with the ground.

Whiles these things hapned at Tarentum, Anniball (after they had yeelded themselves unto him that besieged Caulonia) hearing of the siege and assault of Tarentum, went night and day and made all the hast he could, with a running march, to reskue and succour the citie: but hearing by the way that it was forced and gone, Ah, I see well, quoth he, the Romanes also are not without their Anniball. In good faith, so was Tarentum woon, and so lost againe, by treacherie and treason. But because he would not be thought to turne back and flie, in the very same place where he made stay he sat downe, and encamped almost five miles from the citie: and after he had abode there some few daies, he retired himselfe to Metapontum. From thence he suborned two Metapontines, and sent them to Fabius at Tarentum, with letters devised from certaine principall men of that citie, wherein they promised to betray Metapontum and the Punick garrison into the Consull his hands, upon assurance made unto them, that all former trespasses and offences should be forgiven and forgotten. Fabius supposing all was truth and plaine-dealing, appointed a certaine day when he would come to Metapontum, and sent his letters also to those principall citizens, which letters were brought unto Anniball: whereat he was right glad and tooke great contentment that his fraud sped so well, and that Fabius also might be entraped, caught, and overtaken by his wily fetches as well as others: and thereupon laid an ambush for him in the way not farre from Metapontum. As Fabius (before he should go out of Tarentum) attended to know what the birds signified, he observed once or twise that they approved not his journey. And when he killed a sacrifice, thereby to know the will of the gods, the Sooth-sayer, or bowell-prier gave him warning, to take heed of the deceit of his enemies, and beware of wait-laying. The Metapontines, seeing that he came not at the day appointed, were sent againe to hasten him forward, and to encourage him to come: who were all sodainely at once apprehended, and for feare of farther torture, disclosed the practise of the ambush.

In the beginning of that summer wherein these occurrences hapned, after that Scipio had bestowed the whole winter, in winning and reconciling the harts of the barbarous people, partly with gifts and rewards, and partly with enlarging and sending back their hostages, and the prisoners: there came unto him one Edesio, a noble and famous captaine of the Spaniards. His wife and children were in custodie with the Romanes: but besides that occasion which brought him to Scipio, there was another cause, even a generall inclination of all their minds, that chanced I wot not how, which withdrew and estranged whole Spaine from the Carthaginian empire, unto the Romain. The same reason moved Indibilis also and Mandonius, the greatest LL. and Princes no doubt of all Spaine, to leave Asdruball, and with all the power they could make of their followers and vassals, to depart into the mountaines standing just over his camp, from whence they might from hill to hill continually retire themselves in safetie to the Romanes. Asdruball perceiving the puissance of his enemies to grow and increase still more and more by little and little, and his owne to diminish; and foreseeing, that unlesse he made some hardie adventure and prevailed that way, all would be naught, and fall to the ground, as it was beginning already to reele, determined to put it to a battaile with all speede possible. Scipio also was sharp set, and the more

A more desirous of fight, as well for the good hope, which the successe of his former affaires confirmed and encreased; as also because, before the armies of his enemies should joine together, he was more willing to fight with one Generall and one armie, than with all them joynly at once: and yet he had well amended and encreased his forces politickly of purpose, against the worst, in case he should be driven to fight with many of them together. For, seeing there was no use of ships, because all the river & seas along Spaine, were cleared of the Carthaginian navie, he withdrew his fleet up into the harborough at Tاراcon, and joyned his sea-servitours to his land souldiours. For armour he had store enough, which was either taken in the pillage of Carthage, or newly made after the winning of the towne, by so many Artificers and Craftsmen that he kept there hard and close at worke. With this power, Scipio in the beginning of spring departed from Tاراcon (for now by this time was Laelius returned from Rome, without whose companie he was not willing to enterprife any service of great moment and importance) and led forward against the enemies. As he journeyed peaceably all over the countrie, and passed through the territories and confines of every citie and State, his Allies were readie to entertaine and accompanie him. Indibilis also and Mandonius among the rest, with all their power met him. Then Indibilis in the name of them both, spake, not like a sortish barbarian foolishly and inconsiderately, but rather with a modest kind of gravitie: more like one that excused his revolt & running from the adverse part upon constraint and necessitie, than made boast of catching and embracing the vantage thereof upon the first opportunite presented. I know full well (quoth he) that the very name of a fugitive revolt, as it is odious & detestable to old Allies, so it is suspicious to new.

C And I cannot greatly blame the manner of men in so doing, in case it be not the bare name, but the double dealing that causeth the hatred. Then he reckned up his owne good turnes and deserts done unto the Carthaginians on the one side: and recounted their covetousnesse and pride on the other side, together with their injurious dealings with himselfe and his people. And therefore quoth he, this bodie of mine onely hath conversed among them untill this day, but my hart & affection hath long since bene with them, where I believe verily, that right, justice and religion is regarded and mainteined: for even so do we flie as suppliants in humble manner to the gods also, when we can no longer endure the violence and wrongfull outrages of men. Befeeching Scipio this one thing withall, that this his starting from the enemy, and raunging with him, he would neither blame and condemne presently as a transgression, nor honor and commend as a good desert of his: but as he should find both him and the rest, by good prooffe from that day forward, even so to make reckoning of them accordingly, and not otherwise.

D Scipio made answer again, That in truth he would so do: neither would he take them for fugitives and runawaies, who judged that they were not bound in conscience to mainteine the societie and alliance with them as good & lawfull, who made no count at all to observe inviolable, any promise or dutie to God or man. Then were their two wives & children brought forth into their sight, and delivered unto them, whom they received, and shed teares abundantly for joy, and so for that day they were had to their lodgings. The morrow after, faith was plight and contracted betwene them, and the same confirmed by covenant; and they were dismissed to bring their forces, and to shew them before him: and so they quartered and lodged in the same camp with the Romanes, until by their guidance & direction they came unto the enemy. The armie of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Asdruball, neere unto the citie Batura. Before his camp, he kept certaine standing guards of horsemen. Upon them the light armed forlorne hope of archers and dartars of the Romaine hoast which went before the battaile to skirmish, likewise they of the forefront and vaward, charged forcibly with their shot; yet so contemptuously, and in skornefull wise, even presently upon their travaile in journey, and before they had chosen a peece of ground to encampe in, that it was soone seene what hart there was in both parts. For, the Cavallerie of the enemies fearefully fled, and were driven into the camp: but the Romanes advanced with banners displayed, hard to the very gates: and so for that day their stomacks were onely up and provoked to a fight, and then the Romanes pitched their tents.

F Asdruball in the night retired his armie to a mount, which in the top had a broad plaine. Behinde this hill there ran a river, the fore-front thereof, and the sides all about the skirts were compassed as it were with a steepe banke standing plumb upright. There lay under this hill top another plaine, lower than the other, which also was enclosed round about with the like banke, as difficult for ascent as the former. The next day Asdruball, after he law the enemies standing arraanged before their campe, sent downe his Numidian horsemen, the light armed Ilanders also of the Balears, and likewise the Africanes. Then Scipio rode about all the regiments, ensignes, and ranks of his armie, marshalled as they stood in battaile wise, and shewed unto them their enemies, how they despaired afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground, how they taking the vantage of the hills, braved and shewed themselves, presuming and trusting upon the place, and not upon their owne valour and strength of armes. Howbeit (quoth hee) Carthage had higher wals, and yet the Romane souldiours were able to scale and get over: neither hills nor castle, no nor the very sea, stood in their way then, nor stopped them of their entrie. And as for these high places which the enemies are possessed of, they happily may serve their turnes well, when they shall take their flight, and leape from off the steepe banks, and runne downe-hill apace, and so get away. But I trow, I shall debar them there, and lay a blocke in their way on every side. Whereupon he commaunded two squadrons, the one to keepe the streights of the valley, through which the river runneth: the other to beset the passage that leadeth from the cittie into the fields, and croseth overthwart the hill side abovesaid. Himselfe led the light appointed vancurriers, who the day before had discomfited the guards and wards of the enemies, to affront the light armed souldies, that were quartered in the neather brow of the hill. And first they passed through the roughes, & were not impeached nor hindered otherwise than by the difficult avenues. But afterward, when they were come within shot, at the very first, they were welcommed with a mightie voley of all sorts, pouring (as it were) like haile upon them. Himselfe answered them againe, and recharged upon them, letting drive and discharging the stones which lay strewed all over the ground, and were such in manner all, as might be welded and flung from them with ease. And not onely the souldiers, but lackies & horseboies, & such as followed the camp, were intermingled amongst the armed companies. And albeit the ascent up the hill was hard, and they were pelted and almost overwhelmed with darts and stones, yet being so injured as they were to clime walls, and resolute withall, they mounted up first to the top: and so soon as they had gotten some even ground, where they might have sure footing, they found the enemy, (who was light and nimble, and able to runne to and fro, and to save himselfe, and shift well when he was farre off, all the time that they skirmished alose, and plaid upon one another with light shot) now that they came to close fight, and to hand-strokes, not able to stand his ground: and so they drave him from his place, and with great slaughter chased him and set him backe to the very battaile, that stood upon the higher hill.

Then Scipio having given commaundement to these, for to follow on the traine of their victorie, and to enter up still upon the maine battaile of the enemies, parted the rest of his forces, together with Lelins, willing him to coast along and wheele about on the right hand of the mount, untill hee found some way of easier ascent himselfe on the left hand, fetched no long circuit and compass, untill he came crosse overthwart the flanke of the enemies. Hereupon first began their battaile to be disordered, wiles they were desirous to turne their wings, & to oppose their ranks and squadrons against the noises and shouts which rung every where about them. In this tumultuous trouble, Lelins also was gotten up: and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, because they would not be charged behind on their backe, the vaward of their part was displayed and lay open: and so the Romanes even of the middle battaile also, had a lane and spacious roume to get up and enter upon them: who never had beene able to have gained the ground, and woon the plaine above, (considering the disadvantage of the steepe banke) so long as the ranks had stood unbroken, and the elephants were opposed against them before the ensignes, in the forefront. Downe went the enemies now on every side, and were pittiously killed: and Scipio, who with his left wing encountered the right, charged and plaid especially upon the naked sides of the enemies. And so by this meanes, they had no way left them to flie and escape cleare.
For the Romane guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beset all the avenues.
And as for the gate of the campe, the Generall himselfe, and the other captaines and officers of the campe, had taken it up as they fled that way: besides the comberfome trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they feared no lesse than their enemies. So there died of them 8000. Asdruball who before the conflict, had made sure worke with all the money, and taken it with him, sent the elephants before, & having rallied as many as he could, of them that fled & escaped out of the campe, he made hast along the river Tagus, toward the mountaine Pyreneus. Scipio being now maister of the enemies campe, after he had given to the souldiours all

- A the pillage and spoile, but onely the prisoners, such as were freemen: when he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he set at libertie and sent them homewithout ransom. But as for all the Africanes, hee commaunded the Treasurer to make money of them. Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, as well those that before had yielded themselves, as they that were taken prisoners the day before, saluted him with great consent and generall voice, by the name and title of king. Whereupon Scipio, after silence made by the crier, said, That he tooke the name of *L. Generall or Commander, to be the greatest of all other names, by which his own souldiers used to call him. As for the title of King, howsoever in other places it was great and honorable, at Rome surely, it was odious and intolerable. For his owne part, the mind indeed hee caried of a king, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the nature of man, let them judge so in their owne hearts secretly, and please themselves with that stile: only he wished them to forbear the word and tearme thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarous as they were, perceived by this speech how haughtie and magnanimous hee was, who in the height of spirit contemned that as a base thing, wherat in admiration onely of the very title, all mortall men besides are amazed and astonied. After all this, he bestowed upon the Princes and great Potentates of the Spaniards, sundrie gifts. And of the horses, whereof he had taken in the field and campe great store, hee gave Indibilis the choise of three hundred where he would. When the treasurer was selling the Africanes, according to the Generall his commaundement, he hapned upon a yong springall and stripling, of rare and singular beautie: and hearing that he was of roiall blood, hee sent him to Scipio. And when Scipio demaunded of him who he was, and what countreiman, and wherefore at those yeares he was in campe among rude souldiours; I am (saith hee) a Numidian borne, (and with that his eies stood full of water) and in my countrie they call me Masanissa. Being left an orphan and fatherlesse, I was brought up with my grandfather by the mother side, Gala, the king of the Numidians. And with my unckle by the mother, Masanissa, who was lately come with a power of horsemen to aid the Carthaginians, it was my hap to saile over into Spaine. And never to this day, have I bene in any battel, by reason that Masanissa would not in regard of my tender age, suffer me in any hand to go to the warres. Howbeit that very day when the battaile was fought with the Romanes, unwares to my said unckle, I secretly got an horse under me, and armour upon my backe, and went forth into the field; where my horse chanced to fall, and cast me downe headlong on the ground: and so it was my fortune to be taken by the Romanes. Scipio gaue order that this Numidian youth should be kept safe, & so proceeded to finish matters that were brought before him, as he sat upon the Tribunall in marshall court. And after he was come back from thence into his roiall pavilion, he called the party again before him, & asked him, whither he were willing to returne againe to Masanissa. Whereat the reares gushing out of his eyes for joy, yea full faine (quoth he) and with all my heart. Then after he had given the yong gentleman a ring of gold, a coat embrodered with purple stud-wife, with a Spaniard souldiours cape, a golden clasp or button, & a brave courser, with all the furniture and caparison thereto belonging, he sent him away, and commanded certaine horsemen to safe-conduct and accompanie him, so farre as he would himselfe.
- E Then Scipio fell to consult about the warre. Some there were that advised him, presently to pursue Asdruball: but he supposing that to be a dangerous course, for feare least Mago and the other Asdruball should joine their forces to his, he sent onely a good guard to keepe the passage of the hill Pyreneus, and imploied the rest of the summer, in receiving homage and fealtie of other States of Spaine.
- Within few daies after the battell at Boetula, when as Scipio in his returne to Taracón, was gone past the chafe or Forrest of Castulo: Asdruball the sonne of Gisgo and Mago, the two Generals, arrived out of the farther province of Spaine unto Asdruball the sonne of Amilcar. But they came a day after the faire, and too late to helpe an overthrow past already: yet in very good time, to give counsell for the managing and executing of the warre behind. There, as they conferred together, concerning the disposition of the Spaniards, and how they stood affected in the counties of each province, onely Asdruball the sonne of Gisgo was of opinion, and perswaded That the utmost tract and coast of Spaine, which lieth upon the Ocean and Gades, was hitherto unacquainted with the Romanes, and therefore fast ynough and sure to the Carthaginians. But the other Asdruball and Mago, were of another mind, and agreed in this, That Scipio with his favours

vours and benefits had possessed the affections & hearts of all men already, both in generall, and also in particular, and that there would never be an end of sliding from them, and siding to the Romanes, before that all the Spanish souldiours were either remooved into the farthest parts of Spaine, or conueighed over into Fraunce. And therefore, albeit the Senate of the Carthaginians had not graunted out any such act and commission, yet there was no remedie, but that Asdruball must go over into Italie, where Anniball was the head of the war, & in whom lay the main chance of all; by which means also he might withdraw out of Spain all the Spaniards, far ynough from the naming and hearing of Scipio. For Asdruball his armie, as well by daily falling away and revolting to Scipio, as also by the late defeature much empaiored, was to be replenished again with new souldiours. Moreover, that Mago should deliver his armie to Asdruball the sonne of Gisgo, and himselfe in person crosse over into the Baleare islands, with a great summe of money, to wage new aids and succours from thence. And that Asdruball the sonne of Gisgo, with his armie should retire farther up into Portugall, and not encounter the Romanes at all in any hand. And that out of all the Cavallerie there should bee chosen out the very flower and strength, to the full number of three thousand, for Masanissa, and that he should raunge and overrun all the hither province of Spaine, partly to helpe the distressed Allies, and partly to spoile the enemies townes, and forray their lands. After these orders and directions set downe, the Generals departed asunder to the execution of these determined desingements. Thus yee see what were the affaires and occurrences of Spaine for that yeere.

At Rome the fame of Scipio grew greater every day than other. Fabius for the winning of Tarentum, albeit he gat it rather by craft and pollicie, than by force and vertue, was glorious therefore. The name of Fulvius began to age and decay. Marcellus grew also into an ill name & some obloquie, both for that at first hee had a foile, and also because hee suffered Anniball to raunge over Italie at his pleasure, and himselfe at midsummer had retired his souldiours to Venusia to take up there (as it were) their winter harborough. He had a sore adversarie in the citie, one C. Publicius Bibulus, a Tribune of the Commons: who from the very first time of that discomfiture, with continuall speeches and Orations brought Claudius into hatred and infamie with the common people, and now was in hand with them to deprive him of his government. Howbeit, the friends and kinsfolke of Claudius obtained thus much, That Marcellus leaving his lieutenant at Venusia, should repair to Rome for to make his purgation, & acquit himselfe of such crimes as his adversaries objected and laid against him: and that during his absence, they should not treat nor debate about his deprivation.

It hapned much about one time, that both Marcellus came to Rome (to meet with the shamefull slaughter that ran on him, and to save his honour) and also Q. Fulvius the Consull, about the new election for the yeere following. The question touching the government of Marcellus, was debated and handled in the lists or Circus, called Flaminius; and a great assembly there was, and much concourse of the Commons, and of people of all degrees and calling. The Tribune accused not Marcellus onely, but all the nobilitie: by whose fraudulent practise, and by whose cold and delayfull proceedings, it was come to passe, that Anniball now these ten yeeres had remained in Italie (as it were) in his province continually, where hee had led a greater part of his life, than at Carthage in his native countrey. And now (quoth he) the people of Rome tast the fruit, proceeding of proroguing and continuing of government still in one person. For see what is come of it; Marcellus his armie hath been twice defeated and fallen upon the enemies sword, and now forsooth is housed in Venusia for fire-burning. But Marcellus so confuted this accusatorie speech of the Tribune, by recounting his owne worthie noble acts; that not onely the bill preferred for the deposing him out of his rourne, was disanulled, and the necke of it broken, but also the next day after, all the Centuries with one generall voice created him Consull. There was joined with him companion in government T. Quintius Crispinus, who then was Pretour. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit, P. Licinius Crassus & Dives, who was at that time the Arch-bishop; P. Licinius Varus, Sex. Julius Caesar, and Q. Claudius Flamen.

During the time of this solemne parlement or session for the election of Magistrates, the citie was much disquieted for the revolt of Hetruria: C. Calpurnius who ruled that province as Propretour, had by his letters given notice, that the beginning thereof arose from the Arretines: and therefore immediately M. Marcellus the Consull elect, was thither sent with commission to looke into the matter, and (if hee thought it requisite) to send for his forces, and to translate

A. the warre out of Apulia into Tuscane. For feare whereof, the Tuscans puld in their heads, and were quiet.

The Tarentine Embassadors made suite for peace, and that together with their freedome they might enjoy their own lawes. And this answer was returned by the Senat, That they should come againe when Fabius the Consull was returned to Rome. The Romane Games, and also the plaies called Plebeij, were exhibited that yeere, and renewed one day apeece more than ordinarie. The Aediles of the chaire were L. Cornelius Caudinus, and Servilius Sulpitius Galba: but those of the Commons were C. Servilius, and Q. Cecilius Metellus. As for Servilius, it was denied, that hee had bene Tribune of the Commons before, or now Aedile by right and order of law, because it was now for certaine knowne, that his father (of whom the opinion went currant for ten yeeres that he was slaine by the Boians about Mutina, at what time as hee was Triumvir for the division of lands) was now living, and in the hands of the enemies in slavery and bondage.

B. In the eleventh yeere of the Punick war, M. Marcellus entred his Consulship the fifth time (so you reckon upon that Consulship which hee never bare through, because there was an error committed in his creation) and with him T. Quintius Crispinus. To both Consuls the province of Italie was assigned, and both armies of the Consuls the former yeere. There was a third armie then at Venusia, whereof M. Marcellus had the conduct. Of these three, they were to chuse two, which they would: and the third remaining, was to bee committed unto him, who was by lot to have the government of Tarentum, and the Salentines. The rest of the provinces were thus divided amongst the Pretours. P. Licinius Varus had the jurisdiction civile, and P. Licinius Crassus, (then Pontifex Max.) that of the foreiners, & to go whether soever the Senat should think good to send him. Vnto Sex. Julius Caesar befell Sicilie, & to Q. Claudius Flamen the citie of Tarentum.

C. Q. Fulvius Flaccus had his commission renewed, to continue in government for one yeere longer: and he was appointed to governe Capua, which had been the charge of T. Quintius the Pretour, and to have under his hand the command of one legion. Likewise C. Hostilius Tubulus remained still in office, and that as Pro-pretour he should succeed C. Calpurnius, and have the conduct of two legions. Moreover, L. Veturius Philo had his authoritie and government confirmed to him anew, that as Propretour he should sit L. Deputie in the same province of Fraunce, and have the same two legions as before, when he was Pretour there. The like decree that was graunted for L. Veturius, passed also in the Senate for C. Aurunculeius, and a bill was propounded unto

D. the people for the proroguing and continuance of his office, who as Pretour ruled the province Sardinia with the strength of two legions. And for the defence and guard of the said province hee had an addition of fiftie shippes of warre, which P. Scipio had sent out of Spaine. P. Scipio likewise and M. Syllanus, held still, by vertue of a decree, their provinces of Spaine, and commanded the same armies for one yeere longer. As for Scipio, he had direction to send over into Sardinia fiftie ships, out of those eightie which he had under his hand, either taken with him out of Italie, or woon from the enemy at Carthage, because there ran a rumour, that there was great preparation at Carthage, for a navie that yeere: and that the Carthaginians would take up, and fill all the sea coast of Italie, Sicilie, and Sardinia, with an armada of two hundred saile.

E. In Sicilie the government was divided in this maner, Sex. Julius Caesar had the leading of the Cannian armie: M. Valerius Levinus (for his government also was confirmed for a yeere longer) the charge of that fleet of severntie ships, which rid about Sicilie: with commission to ad thereto, those thirtie ships which the former yeer lay before Tarentum: & with this armada consisting of one hundred saile, to put over into Affricke, if hee thought so good, and there to forray and fetch booties. Over and besides, P. Sulpitius was for one yeere longer to continue in office, and to governe the provinces of Macedonie and Greece, with the force of the said navie which hee had before. As touching the two legions which remained about the citie of Rome, there was no alteration. Only the Consuls were permitted to levie and enroll a new supplie, as need should require. Thus the Empire and State of Rome for that yeere was mainteined with the power of 21 legions.

F. P. Licinius Varus the Pretour of the cittie, was charged to repaire those thirtie old ships, which lay at Hostia, and to furnish twentie new built, with sailers and mariners, that with this armada of fiftie saile he might be able to defend all the sea coast neere unto the citie of Rome. C. Calpurnius was forbidden to remove his forces from Arretium, before a successor came in his place. The same order was given to Tubulus, and to have especially a vigilant eye, that no commotion arose from thence. And then the Pretours went into their provinces.

As

For none might bee Tribune or Aedile, whose father was living.

As for the Consuls they were troubled in mind and made some scruple of conscience to go to their provinces, upon the report of some prodigious and ominous signes, and also because in their sacrifices they found not the gods so propitious and favourable unto them. For out of Campania newes came, that in Capua two temples, to wit, of Fortune and Mars, and also some tombes and sepulchres, were smitten with lightning: and besides (see how vaine and preposterous superstition, imputeth even the least trifling things to the hand of God) that certaine mice forsooth, in a chappell of Iupiter gnawed the gold. Also that in Casinum, a great swarme of bees settled in the very market place. Moreover, that the wall and one of the gates at Hostia was blasted and stricken with lightning. That in Cære, a gripe fled into the church of Iupiter. That at Volsinii, there was a poole flowed with blood. In regard of these strange and wonderous tokens, there was a devout supplication for one day. And for certaine daies together, greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, without any good token: and for a long time the grace and favour of the gods could not be obtained. But yet the fortune of the Common-weale stood still upright, and all this anger and mischief portended by those wonders, light upon the head of the Consuls alone, and their death excused all the rest. The Plaies called Apollinares in the yeere of Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claud. Consuls, had ben by P. Cornel. Sulla Pretour of the citie, first exhibited: after whom all the Pretours ever after did the like. But they vowed them a yeare before, and performed them upon a day uncertaine. The same yeare hapned a grievous plague both in the citie and in the countries about, which yet in the end turned rather to long and chronick diseases, than to sharp and deadly maladies. For this pestilence there was not only solemne going in procession, in all the high streets, carrefours, and crosse waies throughout the citie: but also P. Licinius Varus Pretor of the citie, was commaunded to propound unto the people, that the Plaies abovesaid should be vowed for ever against a set and determinate day. Himselfe therefore was the first that vowed them, and exhibited them upon the third day before the Nones of Iuly, and the same day ever after was observed and kept holiday for that purpose.

As the rumor of the Arretines revolt encreased daily greater, so the LL. of the Senate were carefull about it every day more than other. Letters therefore were sent unto C. Hostilius, that he should without delay take pledges of the Arretines: and C. Terentius Varro was sent with commission, to receive the said hostages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no sooner come, but Hostilius presently commaunded that one legion, which lay in camp before the towne, should enter the citie with banner displayed, and there he put sufficient guards in places convenient. Then having called and summoned the Senatours to appeare in the market place, he demanded of them hostages. And when the Senate requested but two daies respite to consider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they should deliver them presently, or els the next day hee would seaze upon all the Senatours children every one. Then he commaunded the Colonels, the captaines of the Allies, and the Centurions, to ward the gates, that none might go forth of the citie by night. But this was slackly and negligently executed, for seven principall Senatours, before the warders were set at the gates, escaped forth with their children before night. The morrow morning by breake of day, when the Senate began to be cited into the Common hall, these parties were missed, and their goods confiscate and sold in port sale. Of the rest of the Senatours, their children were taken hostages to the number of 120, and were delivered to C. Terentius, for to be conveyed to Rome: who when he was come into the Senate, made such relation of the matter, that the suspicion of their revolt was much more pregnant than before. And therefore, as if some insurrection had like presently to grow from Tuskane, C. Terentius himselfe was commaunded to conduct one of the two legions about the citie of Rome, unto Arretium, and there to lye in garrison with it for to keepe the towne in order. And it was thought meete that C. Hostilius with the armie besides, should survey and visit the whole Province, and to be carefull and circumspect, that no occasion nor opportunitie might be given unto them, that were minded to seeke alteration and to rebell. C. Terentius so soone as he was come to Arretium with the legion, when he called unto the Magistrates for the keys of the gates, and they made answer that they were but miscaft aside and could not be found; supposing that they were rather carelessly laid out of the way for the nonce, than lost by negligence, caused other keies and locks to be made, and set upon every gate: and tooke as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his owne hand. He gave especiall warning also to Hostilius as touching the Tuskans, and told him, that he should never

A hope to rest in securitie, that they would not rebell, unlesse he tooke order with them aforehand, that they possible could not rebell.

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senate about the Tarentines, even before Fabius, whiles himselfe excused and defended them whom he had conquered and subdued by force and armes: but others were mightily offended with them, yea and most of them gave out plainly, that they were full as faultie as the Campanes, and deserved no lesse punishment. And so there was an Act of the Senate graunted according to the opinion and advise of M. Acilius, that the towne should be held with a garison, and all the Tarentines kept from stirring out of the citie: and that the matter should further be debated and decided afresh another time, when the state of Italie stood in better termes of peace and quietnesse. And the like contention and variance was among the LL. of the Senate touching M. Livius Constable and Captaine of the Castle of Tarentum, whiles some were of mind to condemne him as in great fault, because through his carelesnesse and sloth, Tarentum the citie was betrayed to the enemy: others againe awarded him good consideration and reward, for that he kept the fort so well by the space of five yeeres, and by his meanes especially and by none else Tarentum was recovered: But some were of opinion betweene these and said, that the discussing and determination of that matter pertained properly to the Censors and not to the Senate: of which judgement Fabius also himselfe was. And this moreover he said withall, that he must needs confesse, that true it was, which Livius his friends in the Senate stood so much upon, and iterated so often, namely, that he was the only meanes that Tarentum was recovered: for in good faith, quoth he, it never could have bene regained if it had not once bene lost before.

C T. Quintius Crispinus one of the Consuls, went to the armie which Q. Fulvius Flaccus had, with a new supplie into the Lucanes countrey. But Marcellus still was staied behind, upon occasion of new scruples of conscience, and sundrie objects that troubled his mind, and kept a hammering in his head one after another. Amongst which, this was one, that having vowed in the Gauls warre at Clastidium, a temple to Honor and Virtue: the dedication of the said church was hindred by the Bishops, who said, that one chappell, by right and according to their ceremonies, served but for one saint, and could not be consecrated unto more. For in case it should be blasted and smitten by fire from heaven, or otherwise some prodigious token happen therein, hardly could the right expiation and purging thereof be performed, because it might not be known, to which of the saints or gods the sacrifice should be done: for by order one sacrifice could not serve twaine, unlesse they were some particular & especiall gods named. So there was faine to be another chappell built for Virtue: and great hast there was made for the rearing thereof, and yet it was not his fortune ever to dedicate those chappells. So at length he set forward and put himselfe on his journey with a supplie, unto the armie which he had left the yeare before at Venusia.

When Crispinus minded to assault Locri in the countrey of the Brutiens, because there went a great name of Fabius for the assaying and winning of Tarentum, he sent for all kind of artillery and engines out of Sicilie, and shippes also were brought from thence, for to batter that part of the cittie that lieth to the sea side. But the enterprise went not forward, because Anniball had remooved, with all his forces to Lacinium. And besides, the newes went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from Venusia, with whom hee was desirous to joyne: And therefore he returned out of the Brutiens countrey into Apulia: and so between Venusia and Brutia, the Consuls encamped severally, within three miles one from the other. Anniball likewise was retired into the same countrey, considering that the war was turned from Locri. There the Consuls (hote men of nature both) almost every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but if Anniball once met them (having two Consular armies joyned together) to make a dispatch of the warre once for all. Anniball because the yeare before, he had twice affronted Marcellus, and both given and taken the foile: like as he had great reason, as well to feare as to hope, if he were to encounter and fight with him alone: so he thought verily, that hee was never able to make his part good with both the Consuls together. And therefore laying off his lions skin, he tooke himselfe wholly to his olde foxes coate, and sought all meanes and opportunities to lay a traine for to entrap them. Howbeit there passed some light skirmishes betweene both their camps, with varietie of fortune and interchangeable success. By which, the Consuls thinking that they should hold out and keepe the enemies play, during the summer season, and yet yet nevertheſſe be able to aſſault Locri, wrate unto L. Cincius, that he ſhould take the ſeas, and croſſe over with his fleet out of Sicilie to the cittie of Locri. And to the end that the town might bee likewiſe aſſailed from the land ſide, they commaunded part of the armie which lay in gariſon at Tarentum, to bee conducted thither. Anniball having intelligence afore-hand of theſe things, by certaine Thurines, ſent forth certain of his forces to beſet the waies from Tarentum. And there under the ſide of the Petellian mount, he beſtowed ſecretly in ambuſh two thouſand horſe, and three thouſand foot. Vpon whome the Romanes (marching without their eſpials ſent afore them) chaunced to light, and were ſlaine to the number of two thouſand, and upon twelve hundred taken alive: the reſt were ſcattered and fled over the fields and forreſts backe to Tarentum. Now there was a litle hill betwene both the campes of the Carthaginians and Romanes, and the ſame all overgrowne with wood, which at firſt was poſſeſſed and kept, neither by one nor other: becauſe the Romans knew not the ſituation of that ſide which lay toward the enemies campe: and Anniball ſuppoſed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambuſh, than to encampe in: and therefore he ſent by night for that purpoſe, certaine troupes of Numidians, and beſtowed them cloſely in the mids of the wood, and not one of them ſtirred all the day long out of their ſtandings, for feare leaſt either their armour or themſelves might be eſpied a farre off. In the Romane campe, every man generally was of mind, and let not to ſay, that the ſaid hill waſt to be ſeized and fortified for their uſe, with a good fortreſſe built upon it, for feare leaſt if it were firſt gained by Anniball, they ſhould have the enemy as it were over their heads readie to annoy them. And Marcellus himſelfe was of the ſame opinion: whereupon, Why go not we our ſelves in perſon (quoth he to his colleague) with ſome few horſemen, to view and conſider the place, where our eyes ſhall be our judges; and ſeeing the ground once, wee ſhall reſolve more certainly what courſe to take? Criſpinus liked well of the motion: and ſo they went forward accompanied with two hundred and twentie horſemen; of which, fortie were Fregellanes, the reſt all Tuſkans. There followed after them, M. Marcellus, the Conſull his ſonne, and Aulus Manlius, two Colonels: alſo L. Arrenius and M. Aulus, two captaines of the allies. Some authors have ſet down in writing, that Marcellus the Coſ. ſacrificed that day; and when the firſt beaſt was killed, the liver was found without an head: howbeit in the ſecond, all things appeared that were wont to be ſeen. But in the head of that liver there ſhewed I wot not how, a kind of extraordinarie excreſcence: which the Soothſaier had no liking to, becauſe after thoſe inwards which ſeemed before ſhort, unperfect, & miſliking; now thoſe againe were ſeen too well fed and overgrowne. But the Conſull Marcellus was ſo hote and deſirous to fight with Anniball, that he thought himſelfe never encamped neere enough unto him. And even then alſo as he went forth out of the campe, he gave order to his ſouldiours to be readie at a ſhort warning, & have their cie upon the place; that preſently, if he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they ſhould diſlodge, truſſe up bag and baggage & follow preſently. Now there was a litle flat and plaine ground before the camp, from whence the way that led unto the ſaid hill, was on every ſide very open and evident to the eye: where there lay a ſkour or ſpie, ſet of purpoſe to diſcover any of the enemies gone farre from the camp, ſtragling & ranging abroad, either for ſewell or forage, that they might be intercepted: & nor for any hope of ſo great effect as fell out. This fellow gave a ſigne unto the Numidians, that all at once they ſhould ariſe out of their lurking and ſtaring holes. And they that from the top and ridge of the hill, were to riſe and ſhew themſelves affront, never appeared & made head, before that they had ſet a compaſſe about, for to ſhut up the paſſage at the back of the Romans. And then from all parts they began to ſtart up, and with a maine ſhout charged and ran upon them. The Conſuls now were in that valley, from whence they neither could poſſibly get up to the pitch of the hill, poſſeſſed aforehand by the enemy: nor had any place of ſafe retreat behind, for that they were environned and hemmed in on every ſide. Howbeit they might have maintained ſkirmiſh and held out a good while, but that the Tuſkanes began to run away, and put all the reſt in a bodily flight. Yet the Fregellanes, forſaken as they were of the Tuſkanes, gave not over, but fought manfully, (ſo long as the Conſuls ſtood on foot unhurt) and received the charge of the enemies, encouraging their people, and fighting themſelves right valiantly. But when they ſaw once both their Conſuls wounded, and Marcellus alſo run through with the puſh of a lance, and falling from his horſe readie to die: then they alſo (and few of them God wot remained alive) together with the Conſull Criſpinus (who was wounded with two javelines) and young Marcellus, who was himſelfe alſo fore hurt, fled away and eſcaped. There were ſlain in this ſkirmiſh, A. Manlius lius a Colonell, of the two captaines of allies, M. Aulus was killed out-right, and L. Arrenius taken priſoner. As for the Liſtours belonging to the Conſuls, five of them then fell alive into the hands of the enemies: the reſt were put to the ſword, or eſcaped with the Conſull. So there were three and fortie horſemen died either in the conflict, or in the flight, and eighteen taken priſoners. In the campe there was much ado, and crying out for to go and ſuccor the Conſuls, when they ſaw one of them, and the other his ſonne grievouſly hurt, and the poore remnant of that unfortunate expedition, comming toward the campe. The death of Marcellus was much pittied and lamented in many other reſpects, but for this eſpecially: that he, a man of that age (for he was now above threſcore years old) and who ſhould have had more wit: an old captaine & leader (I ſay) that ſhould have had more wiſedome & forecaſt, ſo unadviſedly had brought both his colleague together with himſelfe, and alſo in manner the whole common-wealth into ſo deſperat a danger. I ſhould make much circumſtance, and fetch many turnes and compaſſes about one point, if I would rehearſe all that writers have diverſly ſet downe, as touching the death of Marcellus. But to let all others go, L. Calpius delivereth the thing three manner of waies: the one by heareſay onely, and a generall report: the other, extant in an Oration of the praiſe of Marcellus, penned by his owne ſonne, that was himſelfe preſent at the action: the third, which Calpius himſelfe alleadgeth upon his owne knowledge, and after diligent enquire into the matter. But howſoever the voice and ſame varieth in ſome circumſtances, moſt of them jump in the occaſion, That he went forth of the camp to view the place: and all agree of the event, That he was entrapped and ſo ſlaine. Anniball ſuppoſing that the enemies were mightily terrified, as well by the death of the one Conſull, as the hurt of the other: becauſe he would take all advantage, & omit no good opportunitie offered, forthwith removeth his campe, and pitcheth upon the very hill where hee had fought. There hee found the corps of Marcellus, and cauſed it to be enterred. Criſpinus affrighted both at the death of his companion in government, and alſo at his own hurt received, diſloded in the dead time of the night following, and in the very next mountains that he could come unto, encamped and fortified himſelfe upon an high ground, and ſurely ſenſed on every ſide. There the two Generals of both parts, beat their braines, and occupied all their wits, contriving the one to lay traines, and the other to avoid them. Anniball together with the bodie of Marcellus, had gotten his ring or ſigne manuell. Criſpinus fearing that Anniball might practiſe ſome craftie fetch, and beguile ſome bodie by the meanes of that ſignet, ſent meſſengers to all the cities next adjoining, giving them notice, that his brother Conſull was ſlaine, and that the enemy had gotten his ſeale ring, and warning them, that they ſhould give no credite to any letters written in his name, or ſigned with his ſeale. This meſſage was not ſo ſoon brought to Salapia, but ſtreight after there came letters thither from Anniball, framed & ended in the name of Marcellus to this effect, That he would the next night that immediately followed that preſent day, be in perſon at Salapia; willing the gariſon ſoldiours to be in readineſſe, for to bee employed in ſome ſervice that ſhould be thought needfull. The Salapians perceived whereabout he went, and ſuppoſing that it was a perrillous plot, whereby Anniball ſought ſome opportunitie to bee revenged of them and to puniſh them, for anger, not onely that they were revolted from him; but becauſe they had killed his horſemen: they therefore ſending the meſſenger backe againe, (who was a Romane fugitive and renegate, and had fled from them to Anniball) to the end, that their ſouldiours might effect that which they were minded to doe, without the knowledge of the meſſenger, and not be eſpied by him; beſtowed all the townſemen along the walls and in ſundry convenient places of the town, to keepe a ſtanding corps de guard. The watch and ward they tended the next night very carefully, and about that gate where they ſuppoſed the enemy would come, they oppoſed the ſtrength and moſt able men of all the gariſon. Anniball neere about the time of the releefe of the fourth watch came to the citie. In the vaward marched certain Roman rebels and renegates, with Roman armor upon them: who when they were come to the gate, called up the watch, and ſpake all in Latine unto them, willing them to ſet the gates open, for that the Coſ. was come. The watchmen making ſemblant as if they were rouſed & awakened at their call, began to beſtir themſelves, to make haſt with much ado, as buſie as ever they might be. The Port-cullis which had ben let downe, ſtood yet ſhut. Then they began, ſome to heave & to weigh it from the ground with leavers & coleweiges, others to draw it up with ropes unto that height, that men might goe upright under it. The paſſage was ſcarcely made open, and ſet wide ynough, when the fugitive traitours, came ruſhing in at the gate avie, ſtriving who might enter firſt. And when there were almost fixe hundred of them gotten in, the rope was let goe, at which the port-cullies hung, and it fell downe with a mightie noise. The Salapians then, some ran upon the fugitive Romanes above said, carying their armour loosely & retchlesly, hanging upon their shoulders, as travellers and wayfaring fouldiours in a peaceable countrie of their friends: others from the turrets of the gate pelted the enemies with stones, and pushed at them with punchion poles, or with darts and javelins masked them. So Anniball caught in his owne snares, was faine to depart.

He went from thence to levie and raise the siege before Locri, which towne Cincius beleaguered fireghtly, and assaulted most forcibly, having raised fabrickes about it, and planted all kind of engines, artillerie, and ordinance against it, which were brought thither out of Sicilie. Mago who began already to distrust that he should not bee able to defend and keepe the citie, conceived now the first hope of better, when he heard once of the death of Marcellus. And then there came also a messenger with news, That Anniball having sent afore him the horsemen of the Numidians, followed after himselfe in person, as fast as hee could, with the power of the footmen. And therefore so soone as he perceived, by a signe given from the hill tops, that the Numidians approached, himselfe at once set the gate open, and suddainly sallied forth upon the enemy with great violence. At the first the skirmish was doubtfull, more because hee came upon them at unawares, than for that he was equall to match them in strength: but afterwards, when the Numidians charged them besides, the Romanes were so terrified, that they fled here and there in every place to the sea and their ships, leaving their fabrickes & engines wherewith they had shaken and battered the walls. So by the coming of Anniball the siege brake up before Locri.

Crispinus, after hee was advertised, that Anniball was gone into the Brutians countrey, commaunded Marcus Marcellus a Colonell or knight marshall, to lead away unto Venusia, the armie which had bene commaunded by his Colleague new deceased. Himselfe went to Capua with the legions, scarce able to endure the shogging and shaking of the horse-litter, for pain & griefe of his wounds. From whence he wrote letters to Rome, giving notice, That his brother Consull was dead, and in what daunger himselfe was. Signifying also, that hee could not himselfe come unto Rome against the election, because he thought he should not bee able to endure the travell of the journey: and besides, hee was in great care for Tarentum, least Anniball from out of the Brutians countrey would turne thither with all his power. Moreover, he gave the Senat to understand, that it was requisite there should be sent as Embassadors or Agents unto him, men of wisdom and discretion, whome hee might conferre with, and acquaint with his will and mind, as touching State-matters. The reading of these letters, caused them much to lament and mourne for the death of the one Consull, and greatly to feare what would become of the other. Therefore they not onely dispatched Q. Fabius the sonne, unto the armie in Venusia, but also sent unto the Consull three commissioners, Sex. Julius Caesar, L. Licinius Pollio, and L. Cincius Alimentus who but a few daies before was returned out of Sicilie. These had in commission to signifie unto the Consull from the Senate, that in case he were not able himselfe to come to Rome against the election, he should nominate within the Romane territorie a Dictatour for to assemble the people for the said election: also that their pleasure was, in case the Consull went to Tarentum, that Q. Claudius the Pretour should withdraw his legions from thence into those parts, wheras hee might defend most cities of the Allies.

In the same summer M. Valerius tooke the seas, with a fleet of a hundred saile, and from Sicilie passed over into Africke: and having disbarcked and landed his men neere the citie Clupea, wasted the countrey all about, and met no armed men, to speak of, to make head & withstand his invasion. Then these rovers and forraiers retired in hast unto their ships, because on a suddaine there was a rumour blowne abroad, That the punicke Armada was coming, consisting of 83 saile. The Romane Admirall fought fortunately with them not farr from Clupea. And after he had boarded and taken eightene of their ships, and put the rest to flight, he returned to Lilybæum, with a rich land-bootie, and much pillage found in the ships.

The same summer Philip also sent aid to the Achæi, that earnestly besought his help: whom not onely Machinidas the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, grievously afflicted with warring upon their confines, but also the Ætolians, who having crossed the streights or narrowes, betweene Naupactum and Patra: (which the inhabitants there call Rhios) and set over a power of armed men, had spoiled their territorie. Moreover, there went a great rumour and speech, that Attalus king

A king of Asia the lesse, would saile over into Europe, because the Ætolians in their last parliament or generall Diet had conferred upon him the sovereign magistracie and rule of their nation. For these causes Philip came downe with a power into Greece, and at the cittie Lamia, the Ætolians encountered him with their capitaine Phylas, who for that yeere was created Pretour together with king Attalus in his absence. They had in their armie certaine aids from Attalus, and almost a thousand Romanes out of the Romane Armada, sent from P. Sulpitius. Against this capitaine and these forces Philip fought two battailes with prosperous successe, and in both slew very many of his enemies: and when the Ætolians were driven for feare from thence, into the cittie of Lamia, and within the walls thereof saved themselves, Philip retired his armie into Phalera. This is a place situate in the gulf of Malea, sometimes much peopled and frequented for the passing faire haven, and many good harboroughs, and safe rodes for ships, besides other speciall commodities as well of sea as land. Thither repaired sundry Embassadors from divers parts, to wit, from Ptolomeus king of Egypt, from the Rhodians, the Atheniens, and inhabitants of Chios, and all to treat about a pacification, to take up the waire betweene Philip and the Ætolians. And of neighbor-borderers there was in the behalfe of the Ætolians as peace-maker, Aminander king of the Athamanes. All of them were not so carefull and earnest for the Ætolians, who were more fierce, stout and imperious than the nation of Grecians naturally is: as they laboured this point, that Philip with his kingly soveragntie, to the prejudice of their libertie hereafter, should not be interested, nor meddle in the affaires and state of Greece. As concerning a peace, the constitution was put off and referred to the generall counsell of the Achæi: and C. for the said Diet or counsell, was a place appointed, and a certaine day set downe and published. And in the meane space, a truce obtained for thirtie daies.

Then the king departed from thence, and through Thessalie and Boeotia, came to Chalcis in Euboea, for to put by Attalus (whom he heard say to be coming with a navie for Euboea) from arriving in any havens, or landing in any place on the sea coast. Then leaving a guard behind for to withstand Attalus, (if happily in the mean season he should chance to passe over) he marched himselfe forward with some few horsemen, and light armed footmen, and came to Argos. There by the suffrages and voices of the people, the honour of exhibiting and celebrating the solemne games, called Heraei and Nemei, was recommended unto him, because the Macedonian kings give our and say, that they are descended from that cittie. After he had performed the solemnitie of the Heraei, presently he went from the very games and pastimes, to the counsell of his allies long before proclaimed, as is above said. Much debate there was for a finall end of the Ætolians war, that neither the Romans nor Attalus might have any occasion to come into Greece. But the Ætolians marred all this before the time of the truce was well expired: by occasion that they heard, that Attalus both was come to Ægina, and the Romane navie anchored at Naupactum. For being called into the counsell of the Achæi, in which the same Embassies were, who before at Phalera had treated for peace, first they complained, that some things had bene done, during the time of the truce, against the faith of the covenant and accord. But at last they flatly denied and said, That there could not possible bee an end of warres, unlesse the Achæi rendred Pylos unto the Messenians; and peace were graunted and restored to the Romanes, and likewise to the Athamanes, to Scerdileus, Pleuratus, and Archides. Whereat Philip was very wroth, and thought it a foule indignitie, that conquered persons should take upon them to article and capitulate with him their conquerour. But neither heretofore (quoth he) gave I audience to the treatie of peace, nor yeelded consent to truce upon any hope I had, that the Ætolians would ever be quiet: but to this end, that all confederate friends might beare witnessethat I sought meanes of peace, and they sought occasions and pickt quarrels for warre. So without conclusion of any peace, hee dissolved the Diet, leaving foure thousand fouldiours for the defence and guard of the Achæans, and receiving of them five ships of warre, (which if hee had joined to the armada of the Carthaginians, lately sent unto him, and also to those ships which were coming out of Bithynia from king Prusias, he determined to assaile the Romanes with ship-fight, who had a long time bene mightie maisters of the seas) himselfe presently from that counsell departed backe to Argos: for now the time drew neere of the games Nemei, which he was desirous to celebrate and honour with his presence. Whiles the king was occupied in the preparation of these games and pastimes, and solaced himselfe during these feastivall holidais, with more libertie of mind and repose, than he should, in time of war; P. Sulpitius having losed from Naupactum, arived with his fleete betwene Sicyone and Corinth, and wasted that goodly territorie, most renowned of all other for fruitfulness of all things. The noyse and rumor of this occurrence awakened Philip, and caused him to leave his disports: and so he tooke his Cavallerie with him in hast, & set forward, having geven order that the Infanterie should follow streight after: where he found the Romanes stragling here and there, all over the countrey, loden with bootie and prizes, (as who feared nothing in the world lesse) set upon them, and drave them to their ships. Thus the Romane fleet nothing wel appaied for the bootie they had gotten, returned to Naupactum. And Philip greatly augmented the solemnitie & magnificence of the games that were behind, by the fame of a victorie over the Romanes at that time, how mickle or little soever it was. And with great joy & mirth were those holidiaes kept: and so much the more, because the king for to please the people withall, laid aside the disdemie of his head, put off his purple robes and other princely & royal habit, and in outward port bare himselfe equal to others, and no better: a thing right acceptable and pleasing to free States, as nothing can be more. By which deede of his, he had geven great and undoubted hope unto all men, of libertie and freedome; but that he steined and marred all againe with his intollerable lust and loosenesse of life. For he used to go raunging up and downe with one or two of his favourites in companie, and did nothing else but haunt suspected houses by the sea side day & night in disguised maner: and thus by debasing himselfe to the meane estate of a private person, the lesse he was suspected and knowne, the more dissolute he was: and whiles he pretended unto others a vaine shew of freedome, he abused all to his owne licentiousnes. Neither paid his purse for all his pleasures, nor with flattering persuasions and faire speeches obtained he his desires: but to accomplish his wickednesse, he used oftentimes forcible violence: and dangerous it was both to husbands and parents, to be any thing streight-laced, and make it goodly by tedious delay and unseasonable severitie, to seeme but to stay the unbridled lust and appetite of the king. From one of the Princes also of the Achei named Aratus, he tooke his wife away called Polycratia, and upon hope and colour of marriage with the king, drew her away with him into Macedonie. Having thus with these leaud & wicked pranks passed the time of the solemnitie of the Nemean games, and some few dayes over and above; he went to Dymæ for to disizen the garison of the Ætolians, which they had sent for and received into the citie [of Dymæ] from the Eleans, Cycliades (who was the soveraigne or chiefe magistrat of that state) and the Achei, met the king at Dymæ: who as they hated the Eleans, because they dissented from the rest of the Acheians, so they were maliciously bent against the Ætolians, whom they were persuaded, to have stirred the Romanes to levie warre upon them. So from Dymæ they departed, and with joint armies passed over the river Larissus, which devideth the country of the Eleans from the territorie of Dymæ. The first day after they were entred the confines of their enemies, they spent in forraying. The morrow after, in battaile array, they presented themselves before the citie, having sent out their horsemen before them to make bravadoes before their gates, and all to provoke the Ætolians; a kind of people full of stomack, & readie enough to sallie forth & make excursions. Now were they not ware all this while, that Sulpitius with fiftene ships had crossed over from Naupactum to Cyllene: nor that he had landed foure thousand souldiers in the still time of the night (because they might not be seene to march) and entred Elis. And therefore, this sodaine and unexpected object put them in a terrible feare, when they saw & knew once among the Ætolians and the Eleans, the Romane ensignes and their armour. At the first, the king would have had his men to retire: but afterwards seeing the skirmish was begun already between the Ætolians and Triballi, (a kind of Illyrians) and perceiving that his souldiours also were put to it and charged, then the king also himselfe with his horsemen assailed the Cohort or Squadron of the Romanes. There his horse was with a dart shot through: and when he had once flung and cast the king forward over his head, there was a cruell and deadly fight on both sides, whiles the Romanes laid hard at the king, and the kings men protected and guarded his person. Himselfe fought right manfully above the rest, considering he was forced on foote, to mainteine skirmish among the horsemen. But afterwards, by reason of the great disadvantage, and seeing many about him sticken downe and wounded, he was caught away by his gard, mounted upon another horse, and so he fled and escaped. And the same day he encamped 5 miles from the citie of the Eleans. The next morrow he led all his whole power to a castle of the Eleans situate neere at hand, called Pyrgos: into which he had intelligence that a multitude of the country perisants for feare of being spoiled, were with

A their cattaille driven and retired. This confused, disordred, and naked companie he tooke captive at his comming, presently upon the first charge and onset that he gave: and with that bootie he licked himselfe whole againe, and saved the shameful diffature that he had received at Elis. As he was busy in sharing the prizes, and dealing abroad the prisoners (and there were of men some foure thousand, and of cattaille of all kinds one with another twentie thousand head) there came a post out of Macedonie with newes, that one Eropus had surprised Lychnidum, by corrupting for a peece of money the constable of the Castle, and capraine of the garrison there: and that he held in possession certaine borrough townes of the Dassaretians, and still raised the Dardanians to rebellion. The king therefore gave over the Achæan and the Ætolian warres: yet leaving two thousand five hundred armed souldiers of all sorts, under the leading of Menippus and Polyphantus for to defend his Allies, he went from Dymæ through Achaia, Boeotia, and Bebœis; and upon the tenth day came to Demetrias in Theffalia. Where other messengers also encountered him, bringing tidings of a greater insurrection: namely, that the Dardanians had invaded Macedonie, and were maisters of Orestis, and came downe into the plaines of Æstræum: and that the rumor was rise and went currant among the barbarous people that Philip was slain. The truth is, in that expedition wherein he fought at Sicyon with those that preyed and made spoile in the countie, he was carried by his hote and stomack-full horse under a tree, and there against a bough or arme thereof that stood out, he chaunced to breake a corner of the crest of his helmet at one end. That peece chanced to be found by a certaine Ætolian, and was brought into Ætolia unto Scerdiletus, who knew by the marke that it was the kings helmet: whereupon the fame of the kings death was divulged commonly abroad. After the departure of Philip out of Achæa, Sulpitius who was arrived with his navie at Ægina, went forward, and joyned with Attalus. The Achæi, not farre from Messene struck a fortunate battaile with the Ætolians and the Eleans. Attalus the king, and P. Sulpitius wintred in Ægina.

In the end of this year, Quintius Crispinus the Consul, when he had nominated for Dictator, L. Marcellus Torquatus, for to hold the solemn election of magistrats, & to set out the games, died of his hurt aforesaid. Some say he left his life at Tarentum: others in Campane. Thus both Coss. beinge slain without any memorable battaile; (a thing never seene afore in any other warre) left the common-wealth desolate, and as it were cleane fatherlesse. Manlius the Dictator chose for his Generall of the horse, C. Servilius, at that time Ædile curule. The Senate upon the very first day that the LL. were assembled, gave order to the Dictator, to exhibit the great Romane games, which M. Aemilius the Pretour of the citie, whiles C. Flaminius and Cn. Servilius were Coss. had represented & vowed for 5 years. Then the Dictator, both set them forth & also vowed them for the next five yeares. But considering there were two Consular annies without their Generals, so neere unto the enemies: the LL. of the Senate & the people set all other matters aside, and had a principall care above all things, to creat Consuls as soone as possibly they could: and such especially, whose vertue and valour should bee thought secured and safe enough, from Punicke craftinesse and deceitfull traines. For whereas during the time of all these wars, the over-hastie heads and hote spirits of the Leaders, had bene ever dangerous and hurtfull to the state: so in this very yeare, the Consuls upon immoderate desire to fight with the enemy, was fallen and plunged into a jeopardie and mischief ere they were aware. Howbeit the immortal gods had mercie and pittie upon the Romane name, in sparing the guiltlesse armies, and punishing the inconsiderate rashnesse of the Consuls, with the losse onely of their owne lives. And when the LL. of the Senate looked about every way, to see if they could spie out any to make Consuls of: above all others by many degrees, C. Claudius Nero excelled and was the onely Paragon. But a companion with him in the government they were likewise to seeke for. As for him, no doubt, they deemed him a singular man and a brave captaine: but yet more forward and egre, than the qualitie and occasions of this warre required, or to be marched with such an enemy as Annibal was. And therefore they thought good to joyne with him for his colleague, a sober, wise, & prudent man, who might temper and qualifie that fierce nature and disposition of his. Now M. Livius, many yeares ago had bene upon his Consulship condemned by the judgement of the people. Which ignominie and reproach he tooke so grievously to the heart, that he departed into the countie, and for many yeares together, forbore not onely the citie, but to converse and keepe companie with men. And almost eight yeares after his condemnation aforesaid, M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Valerius Levinus the Consuls, reduced him againe into the citie. But hee used to go in old and worne apparrell, letting the haire of his head and beard grow long, carrying in his very countenance and array, the fresh & notable remembrance of the disgrace before received. But L. Veturius and P. Licinius the Censors, compelled him to cut his haire, and lay away his vile and unseemly weed, to come into the Senate, and to meddle againe in civill matters and affaires of State. And yet in so doing, he would never proceed farther, than to say Amen to other mens opinions, and speake but one word, yea and nay: or else nothing at all, but shew his mind by passing on his feet to one side or other. Vntill such time as a kinsman of his owne, M. Livius Macatus, being in trouble, and his name and honour called in question, caused him to stand up in the Counsel-house and deliver his opinion. And when after so long discontinuance, he was seen and heard, once to speake, he turned every man his eye upon him, and ministred occasion also of speech in these tearmes, namely, That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, yea and hurt the common-weale much, in that during the time of so dangerous a warre, there had bene no imploiment of so worthie a person, either for his travaile and paines, or his advice and counsell. But to returne againe to the lords of the Senate: they knew well, that neither Q. Fabius, nor M. Valerius Levinus, could possibly be joynd as companion in government to C. Nero: forasmuch as it was not lawfull that both should bee chosen out of the Nobles or Patritij. And the same was T. Manlius his case also. Besides that, as he once refused the Consuls rowme, when it was offered unto him, so no doubt hee would not accept thereof the second time if it were tendered upon him. But if they should sort Marcus Livius and C. Claudius together, there would be an excellent couple of Consuls in deed. Neither stood the people against this overture, thus moved first by the lords of the Senate. The onely man in the whole citie, that denied it, was the very partie himselfe, unto whom this dignitie and honourable place was presented. VVho much blamed the levity & inconstancie of the citie: saying, that they had no pittie of him, when it was: namely, whiles he was in question & accused, & during the time of his trouble ware poore & simple garments: but now against his wil, they offered him a glittering white robe to stand for a Consulship. Thus (quoth he) they punish and depresse, thus they honour and advance the same persons. If they tooke me for a good & honest man, why condemned they me as they did, for a wicked one and a guiltie? If they found me naught and faultie, what cause have they to trust me with a second Consulship, who used the former so badly, which was committed unto me? As he argued and made complaints in this wise, the lords of the Senate reproved him, and replied againe: setting before his eyes the example of M. Furius, who in times past was called home out of exile: & when the state was decayed & lying along, set it upright again in her former place and pristine glorie. And like as the curstnesse and rigor of parents is to be mollified by patience, even so the hard & shrewd dealings of a mans countie, is to be dulced & mitigated by bearing and sufferance. So they all stucke close together, and chose M. Livius Consul, with C. Claudius. Three daies after, they went to the election of the Pretours. And there were created Pretours, L. Porcius Licinius, Caius Manlius, A. Hostilius, and C. Hostilius, both Catoes. When the election was finished, and the games celebrated, the Dictatour and Generall of the cavallerie surrendered their places. C. Terentius Varro was sent into Hetruria as Pro-pretor, to the end that out of that province, C. Hostilius should go to Tarentum, unto that armie which T. Quintius the Consul had. That L. Manlius should go beyond sea as embassadour, to see how the world went there: And withall, considering that in summer, there were to be solemnized the famous games at Olympia, which were celebrated with a most frequent resort and meeting of all Greece, in case hee might safely & without impeachment of the enemy, hee should visite that great assembly: to the end that if he could light upon any Sicilians, who were fled and banished their countie, or any citizens of Tarentum, confined thither & sent away by Annibal, they should repaire home againe into their owne countries, and know, that whatsoever they were possessed of, before the warres began, the people of Rome would restore the same, and make good againe unto them.

Because it was like to be a right dangerous yeare, and no Consuls were invested fully in the common-weale, all men depended upon the Consuls elect, and were desirous that they should with all speed, cast lots for their provinces: and every man was willing to know aforehand, what province each one should rule, & what enemy he was to deale withall. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-house, that the Consuls should bee reconciled and made friends, and Q. Fabius Max. propounded that first. For there had bene notorious enmitie and variance betweene them aforetime: and the calamitie of Livius made the same more grievous and unsupportable

A supportable unto himselfe; in regard that he was perswaded, how in that miserie of his, hee was despised of his adversarie. VVhereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twaine, and worke to be intreated. There needs (quoth he) no reconciliation, neither is it materiall & to any purpose. For they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in feare that their adversarie and concurrent shall grow great and be advanced by their default. Yet the authoritie of the Senate bare such a stroke with them, that they laid aside all malice and old grudge, & with one mind, consent, and counsell, administred the affaires of common-weale. Their provinces were not intermingled, nor their government extended into one anothers countie, as in former yeares, but distant asunder and divided by the remote frontiers and farthest marches of Italie. For unto one of them were assigned the Brutians & Lucans countie against Annibal: unto the other, B Gallia against Asdruball; who as the rumour and bruit went, was come forward neere unto the Alpes. Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetruria, he whose fortune was to go into Gallia, was to chuse which armie he would, and have besides, that other of the citie. And he whose lot should be to go into the Brutians countie, besides the new legions enrolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the armie of whether Consul he list, of the former year. Also Quintius Fabius the Pro-consul, had the charge of that armie which the Consul refused: and his authoritie was renewed for one yeare longer. As for C. Hostilius, whose province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetruria, they altered his province againe, to wit, Capua in stead of Tarentum. Vnto him was allowed that one legion which Fulvius the last yeare commaunded.

C Now encreased their care every day more than other, concerning the coming of Asdruball into Italie. And the Embassadours of the Massilians had brought newes first, that hee was passed over into Gallia: and that the minds of the Gaules were mightily cheered up by his coming, because the speech went, that he had brought a huge deale of gold with him, for to hire & wage souldiours for aid in the warres. Then afterwards, Sex. Antistius, and M. Retius, who were sent Embassadours backe with them from Rome, for to see whether it were so indeed, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had sent certaine of purpose guided by the Massilians, who by meanes of their especiall friends, the princes and lords of the Gaules, might learne the truth, and bring word backe accordingly. By whose report it was for certaine knowne, that Asdruball having levied already a puissant armie, was minded the next spring to passe over the Alpes: and that there was nothing els staied him, but that it had bene done already, saving onely the avenues of the Alps which were closed up with the winter snow.

D In the roume of M. Marcellus, L. Aquilius Papius was created Augur, and so consecrated. And likewise Cn. Cornelius Dolabella was inaugurat or installed king of the sacrifices, in stead of Marcus Marius, who died two yeares before. In this very same yeere the citie was purged, and there was a generall survey and numbring of the people, by the Censors taken, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. There were reckoned and entred into the Censours bookes of citizens, 137108. A smaller number by much ods, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annales, that this yeere first after that Annibal came into Italie, the Comitium was built over head and covered. And that the Romane Games were once renewed by the Ediles of the chaire, Q. Metellus, and C. Servilius: and that the other Games called Plebeij, were renewed two daies by Q. Manlius, and M. Caelius Metellus, Ediles of the Commons: who also offered three images, and set them up in the chappell of Ceres. And the solemne feastivall dinner of Iupiter was celebrated by occasion of those Games.

E Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time, entered their Consulship: who (because whiles they were but Coss. elect, they had cast lots for their provinces) commaunded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hostilius fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and forrainers; to the end, that the other three might go forth into their provinces. To A. Hostilius, was allotted Sardinia; to C. Manlius, Sicilia; and to L. Porcius Fraunce. In summe, the legions were in number three and twenty, divided into the provinces in this sort: to wit, the Consuls had two apiece, Spaine foure. The three Pretours for Sicilie, Sardinia, and Fraunce each of them twaine. C. Terentius in Hetruria commaunded two, Q. Fulvius in the Brutians country, other two, Q. Claudius about Tarentum, and the Salentines conducted twaine: and Caius Hostilius Tubulus at Capua, one. Last of all, two were enrolled for the citie. In the foure first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Marshals, but to all the rest the Consuls sent new to make up the defect.

Before the Consuls went forth, there was a Novendiall sacrifice celebrated, because at Veij it G had rained stones from heaven. And after one prodigious sight was once minded and spoken of, there were (as it is commonly seene) others also reported: namely, that in Minturnæ the temple of Iupiter, and the sacred grove of Marica was smitten with lightning; and at Atellæ the wall and gate likewise, was blasted with fire from heaven. The men of Minturnæ spake also of a more fearful and terrible thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of blood in their very gate. Last of all, at Capua a Wolfe entered the gate at night, and werried and dismembred one of the watchmen.

These wonderfull signes were expiate with sacrificing of greater beasts, and a supplication was holden for one day, by vertue of a decree from the Prelates. Then was the Novendiall sacrifice once againe renewed, because it was seene, that in Arministrum it rained stones. And mens minds were no sooner freed of one religious scruple, but they were troubled againe with another. For word was brought, that at Frulino there was an infant borne, as big as ordinarie a child is at foure yeeres of age. And the thing was not so strange for the bignesse of the bodie, as for that it was borne doubtfull, whether it were male or female, like as two yeeres before, at Sinuessa. The wisards that were sent for out of Hetruria, said, that this of all other was a foule and filthie monster, and that it should bee had forth of the dominion of Rome, and drowned in the deepe, so as it might touch no ground. Whereupon they put it alive into a coffer, and when they had carried it a good way into the sea, they flung it in. Moreover the Prelates made a decree, that certaine virgines in three companies, having nine apiece, should goe through the citie, & sing certaine canticles. And whiles in the temple of Iupiter Stator, the maidens were a learning their song by heart, devised and framed in verse by Livius the Poet, the temple of queene Iuno in the Aventine hill, was stricken with lightning from heaven. And when the Aruspices had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrones and dames of the citie, and that the goddesse was to be pacified with an oblation; they were (by vertue of an edict granted out by the Ædiles of the chaire) called all into the Capitoll, as many as had any house, either in the citie of Rome, or within ten miles every way. And they among themselves chose five and twentie, into whose hands all the rest should put some small portion of their dower. Of which there was made a faire and large golden bason, for to be presented unto Iuno: and it was brought into the Aventine: and withall, the dames offered unto her purely and chastly their sacrifices. And straighter the Decemvirs proclaimed a day for another sacrifice of the same goddesse, the manner and order whereof was this: There were two white heifers led from the temple of Apollo into the citie, through the gate Carmentalis: after them were carried two Images, representing Iuno, made of Cypresse wood: then went there seven and twentie virgines in long side garments, chaunting hymns and songs to the honour of Iuno. These songs in verse were peradventure commendable, and passed for good with those rude and grosse wits then living: but if they should be rehearsed nowadaies to our fine heads, they would seeme but simple stuffe, and composed without rime or reason. After this row of maidens, followed the Decemvirs deputed for sacred ceremonies, with chaplets & garlands of Baies, clothed in vesture & robes embroidered with purple. From the gate above named, they passed by the street Iugarius into the Grand place, & there rested this solemne pomp & train. Then these virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, sung a song, and daunced the measures, footing it artificially according to the note. From thence they went by the Tuscane street & Velabrum through the beasts market, & so forward into the Clivus Publicus, untill they came to the temple of Iuno. There the Decemvirs sacrificed two beasts, and the Images of Cypresse wood were offered and set up in the temple. When the gods and goddeses were duly pacified, the Consuls tooke musters more straightly and with greater precisenesse, than any man could remember in former yeeres. For both the feare of the warre was two-fold, by reason of a new-come enemie into Italie, and also there was lesse store of youth, out of which the souldiours should bee enrolled. Whereupon they compelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the sea side, who were said to have an especiall immunitie of warfare (by a sacred law) for to find souldiours: and when they denied, and stood upon their priviledge of exemption, they set them down a certain day, upon which every man should repair into the Senat, & shew what cards they had for their immunitie & vacation. Vpon the day appointed there presented themselves before the Senat these Communalities following, to wit, of Hoflia, Alfia, Antium, Anxur, Minturnæ, Sinuessa, and Sena, from the upper sea. When every one of these States exhibited and read their charter

* The same that
C. C.

A charter of immunitie, there was none of all them dispensed with, but they of Antium & Hoflia, in regard the enemie abode in Italie: and so the yong & serviceable men of those Colonies, were put to their oth and sware, that not above fortie of them should lie one night forth of the walls of their Colonie, so long as the enemie continued in Italie.

When all the LL. of the Senate were of opinion, that the Consuls were to goe forth to the warres with all speed possible (for that both Asdruball was to bee encountered comming downe the Alpes, for feare he should sollicite the Gauls on this side the Alpes; and the Tuscanes likewise who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration; and also Anniball was to bee kept occupied in his owne warre, that he might not goe forth of the Brutians countrie, and meet with his brother) onely Livius made some stay and drew backe, as reposing but small trust in the armies belonging to his owne provinces. And as for his Colleague, well he wist, that hee had the choise of two notable Consular armies, and of a third, wherof Q. Claudius had the charge at Tarentum. Whereupon hee had made some motion of calling the Volones [or voluntaries] againe to their colours, and to serve in the warres. The Senate graunted the Consuls a large and free commission, both to make supplie from whence soever they would, by chusing out of all the armies whome they pleased, and to make exchange with whome they would, yea, and to draw out of the provinces whomsoever, according as they should thinke it good for the Commonweale. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unitie of the Consuls. The Volones were enrolled into the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Some authors have written, that Scipio sent unto Livius from out of Spaine, a strong power of auxiliaries for that warre, to wit, C eight thousand of Spaniards and Frenchmen, two thousand legionarie footmen, and eightene hundred men of armes, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards: and that Marcus Lucretius brought these forces by sea: also that C. Manlius sent out of Sicilie foure thousand archers and slingers.

The feare and troubles in Rome were much increased, by occasion of letters sent out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Pretour: pourporting thus much, That Asdruball was removed out of his wintering harbours, and was passing over the Alpes: that there were eight thousand Ligurians levied and readie in armes, to joine with him so soone as ever he was come into Italie, unlesse some one were sent against the Ligurians, to prevent and keepe them otherwise busied with war. As for himselfe, he would with that weakie armie that he had, go forward, as far as he thought he might with safetie. These letters caused the Consuls to dispatch the musters in great hast, and to go forth into their provinces, sooner than they had purposed: with this intent, that both of them as well the one as the other, might in his severall province keepe the enemies occupied, and suffer them not to joine, and lay their forces together. And verily the thing that helped them most in this their designement, was an opinion and perswasion that Anniball had: For albeit he was assured that his brother would that summer passe over into Italie, yet when he called to remembrance what a toile he had himselfe, and how much trouble and travaile he endured in the passage, one while of the river Rhodanus, another while of the mountaines of the Alpes, and how for the space of five moneths together, hee was forced not onely to fight with the people, but to struggle also with the difficulties of the places; he never looked that Asdruball could so easily and so speedily passe over as he did: which was the cause that hee dislodged out of his wintering places so much the latter. But Asdruball found better expedition, and all things more easie and speedie than either himselfe hoped for, or others expected. For the Arverni, and other nations (by their example) both of France and also about the Alpes, not only received and interteined him, but also accompanied him to the warre. Over and besides, as he conducted his armie by those avenues which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had bene aforetime unpassable wilds and craggie rags: so against his comming, the Alpes were much more easie, by reason of twelve yeeres continuall passage too and fro those waies: and the nature of the paissants more civile and tractable. For the people before, being not used to any strangers and aliens, nor accustomed to see passengers or travellers comming into those parts, were in manner unfociable, savage and wild, and could not away with the societie of men. And at the first not knowing whither Anniball intended to go, they supposed that he came for to surprise their holds in caves and rocks, to take their fortresses, and to drive away their people and cattail as booties. But afterwards, the same that went of the Punick warre (wherewith now twelve yeeres Italie was plagued and vexed) had taught them sufficiently, that the Alpes were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians ginians to traueile through. And by this time well they knew, that two most puissant Cities and States, deuided and removed one from another by a great space of land and sea betweene, strived together and warred for their greatnesse and Soveraigntie. Vpon these occasions, I say, the Alpes were open and passable to Asdruball with ease. But looke what time he gained by speedie journeyes, the same he lost againe by stay about Placentia, whiles he lay there in vaine, rather besee- ging than assailing it. He was caried away with a persuation, that the towne seated upon a plaine and champain cuntry, might soone be forced and woon: and the great name that went of that noble Colonie, induced him to beleeeve, that by the overthrow and raising of that citie, he should strike a terror to all the rest. But in lying against that towne, he not only hindered himselfe much, but also stayed Anniball: who having heard that he was passed over the Alpes, and come downe into Italie, so much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to dislodge out of his stand- ing wintering camp. For he considered & cast in his mind, not only what a long & tedious peece of worke it is to beseege and assault cities, but also well remembered how himselfe after his victorie at Trebia, assailed to force that colonie in his returne from thence, but might not prevaile.

The Consuls being departed from the citie, and gone divers wayes as it were for two sundrie warres at once, distracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well in remembrance of those losses and overthrowes, which they had received at Anniball his first coming: as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favorable to the citie and empire of Rome, as to prosper the affaires of the State and Common-weale, at one time in both places. For until then, their successe had ben variable & alternative; and their prosperitie alwaies dilaid with seemblable adversitie: and againe, their losses were recompensed with equall gaines. For when in Italie the Common-wealth of Rome went one way downeward headlong to the ground at Thrasymenus and Canna: the fortunate warres another way in Spaine, set it upright againe. Afterwards, when in Spaine one overthrow and deffeature hapned in the neck of ano- ther, at what time as two noble Captaines were slaine, and two valiant armies in part destroyed; the happie and luckie hand in Sicilie and Italie, made up those breaches, and set the reeling state on foote againe. For why? the very distance of the place so farre remote (because one of the warres was mainteined in the farthest part of the world) yelded time and respite to breathe them- selves and gather new strength. But now, two warres at once are interteined within Italie, two most brave warriors and renowned Captaines enclose betweene them the citie of Rome: all dangers come huddle together: all the heave lode and whole burden beareth upon one and the selfesame place: and no doubt, but whither of those two Captaines first shall get a victorie, he will within few daies after joine his forces to the other. The fresh and lamentable remem- brance also of the very last yeere, wherein two Consuls lost their lives, mightily affrighted the harts of the people. So as, in these perplexities and troubles of minde, they accompanied the Consuls as they departed and went into their severall provinces. It is moreover in some records found, that when Q. Fabius adviced and warned M. Livinus being upon his journey toward the warres, not rashly and hand over head to give battaile to the enemy, before he knew his nature and qualities, he full of anger still and discontentments with his fellow citizens, made this an- swer, That so soone as ever he could have a sight of his enemies armie, he would fight: and being asked againe, why he would make such hast? Mary (quoth he) either shall I by victorie of mine enemies win singular honor and renewme: or by the overthrow of my fellow citizens gaine some harts-ease and contentment, if not honest in all respects, yet at leastwise such as they have deserved.

Before that Claudius the Consull was come into his province, C. Hostilius Tubulus accom- panied with certaine cohorts lightly appointed, encountered Anniball as he led his armie and marched by the utter confines and marches of the territorie of Larinum, which leadeth to the Salentines: and charging upon his disordered armie, put them to great trouble, slew foure thou- sand of his men, and caried away nine ensignes. Q. Claudius who had certaine garizons planted in all the cities of the Salentines cuntry, hearing of the enemies coming, had removed out of his wintering camp: and therefore Anniball, because he would not fight with two armies at once, by night dislodged out of the territorie of Tarentum, and withdrew himselfe into the Brutians cuntry: and Claudius turned with his armie to the Salentines againe. Hostilius in the way to Capua, met with the Consull Claudius at Venusia. There, out of both armies, the Consull picked forth fortie thousand choise footemen, and 2500 horsemen, for to warre with Anniball.

The

A The rest of the forces Hostilius was commaunded to leade unto Capua, and to deliver them to Q. Fulcius the Proconsull.

Anniball having assembled his forces from all parts, as well those which he had in camp du- ring winter time, as those that lay in garison in the Brutians cuntry, came as farre as Grumen- tum in the territorie of the Lucanes, upon hope to recover the townes, which for feare, had re- volted to the Romanes. Vnto the same place the Romanes Cos. making out his espials before to discover and cleere the waies, marched from Venusia, and about a mile and halfe from the ene- mie, encamped himselfe. The Carthaginians had fortified themselves, and cast a trench close in a manner to the walls of Grumentum: and betweene the camp and the Romanes was some halfe mile. A plaine lay in the midst: and on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and the right hand of the Romanes all along betweene, the hils overlooked them, bare and naked, and of nei- ther part suspected, by reason that they had no wood growing upon them, nor any lurking places to hide an ambush in. Into the plaine betweene they used to put out certaine bands and compa- nies from the Corps de guard of both sides, and made light skirmishes not worth the talking of. And it seemed that the drift of the Romanes Consull was to keepe the enemy in, and not to suffer him to go his waies. But Anniball desirous to be gone, entred the field with all his power in order of battaile. Then the Consull borrowing a litle of his enemies cunning, for that in so open hils there was lesse feare and suspicion of ambush, gave order that five Cohorts of horse- men, reinforced with as many bands of footemen, should by night get over those hils, and in the vallies behind, sit downe closely: with direction to T. Claudius Asellus a colonell of footemen; C and P. Claudius a captaine of allies whom he sent to conduct them, at a certaine time to arise out of ambush, and to charge the enemy: himselfe by day light led forth all his whole power as well foote as horse into the field. Within a while after, Anniball likewise put forth the signall of battaile: and all the camp over they set up a cry, running all about to their armour and wea- pons. Then footemen and horsemen both rushed avie out of the gates who could be soonest forth: and scattered as they were all over the plaine, made hast to the enemies. Whom when the Consull saw thus disordered, he commaunded C. Aurunculeius a Tribune or Colonel of the third legion, to put out the Cavallerie belonging to that legion, for to charge the enemy with all the violence he could: for that like sheepe they were sopsred over the plaine without all forme and fashion, and might be surprisid, discomfited, and beaten downe, before they could be D brought into array and set in order of battaile. Anniball himselfe was not come forth of the campe, when hee might heare the noyse of them fighting together and hard at it: and excited with this tumult, hee led in great hast all the rest of his forces against the enemy. By this, the vaward and forefront of his battaile was frighted with the horsemen of the e- nemies: yea and the first legion of the Infanterie and the Cavallerie of the right wing be- gan to charge. The Carthaginians disordered as they were, fought at a venture, as they chanced to meete either with footemen or horsemen. The conflict grew hotter, by reason of new sup- plies and fresh succours, and encreased still by the number of them that continually ran out to the medley. And surely Anniball, notwithstanding this tumult and troublesome feare, had set and marshalled his men in good order as they were fighting (which had bene no easie E thing to do, but that the armie was of old souldiours, and their captaine well experienced and beaten to it) if it had not bene for the shout of the cohorts and bands above-said, which they heard at their backs, as they from the hils behind ran downe upon them: and set them in great feare, least that they would thrust in betweene them and home, and so shut them out of their camp. Hereupon I say they were affrighted, and began to flye here and there. But the slaughter was the lesse, because the camp was neere, and farre they had not to run thither and save them- selves in this their fearefull fright. For the horsemen plaid upon their backs still, and gave not over: the cohorts from the open mountaines ran easily downe the hill, and charged crosse upon their sides and flanks. Howbeit, there were slaine more than eight thousand men, and above 700 taken prisoners: nine ensignes woon and caried away: of Elephants also (whereof there was little F or no use) in a sodaine and tumultuarie skirmish foure were killed, and two gotten alive. Of Ro- manes and Allies, there dyed two hundred. The next day after, Anniball stirred not. The Ro- mane Consull having brought his armie forth into the field, and seeing none to come abroad, and make head against him, commaunded the slaine enemies to be disarmed and despoiled, and the spoiles to be gathered up, and the bodies of his owne men to be brought together into a place place and buried. For certaine dayes after continually, he preassed so hard at the camp gates, G that he wanted but little of entring thither with banner displayed. In so much as Anniball at the third watch of the night, leaving behind him many fires burning, and divers tents standing, on that side especially which looked toward the enemies, and some few Numidians, to make a shew upon the Rampiar and at the gates; dislodged, and purposed to goe into Apulia. The next morning by day light, the Romane armie embarrailed, approached the trench and rampiar. The Numidians of set purpose shewed themselves in the gates and upon the rampiar: and when they had a good while dallied thus and plaied with the enemy, they mounted on horsebacke, and spared no horse-flesh untill they had overtooke their fellows. The Consull perceiving that all was quiet within the campe, and seeing not so much as those few appeare any where, who in the morning betimes had walked their stations, sent forth two horsemen into H the campe as espials. After he understood for certaine that all was safe, and the coasts cleare, he commaunded his ensignes to make an entrie. And staying no longer there, than whiles his souldiours ranne up and downe to pill and spoile, hee founded the retreat: and long before night, brought his armie back againe. The next morrow after, he set forward by the dawning of the day, & with long journeis, following his enemies by the voice of the countrie, & tracing them by their footsteps, hee overtooke them not far from Venusia. There also was a skuffling skirmish between them, and not so few as two thousand Carthaginians slaine. From thence Anniball ever marched by night, and journeyed through the mountaines, because he would give his enemy no vantage of sight, untill he came to Metapontum. From whence Hanno (for hee was captaine of the garrison there) was sent with some fewe in his traine into the Brutians countrie, to levie a new armie. And Anniball after he had joynd those forces to his owne, returned againe to Venusia, by the same way that he came from thence; and so forward he marched to Cannusium. Nero never left the enemy, but was readie to tread on his heeles, and as he marched himselfe toward Metapontum, hee had sent for Fulvius to repaire into the Lucanes countrie, because those parts should not be disurnished of defence.

In this mean space, there were foure French horsemen, and two Numidians, sent to Anniball with letters from Asdruball, after he was removed from the siege of Placentia: who having travailed in manner all the length of Italie, through the mids of the enemies, whiles they follow after Anniball in his retire unto Metapontum, missed of their waie, and light upon Tarentum: where they were encountered by the forragers of the Romans that raunged about the fields, & by K them were brought before Claudius the Propretor. At the first they entertained him with slim flams, with doubtfull and intricate answers: but when the feare of the racke and other tortures, had forced them to tell a truth, they confessed, that they had letters about them to deliver from Asdruball to Anniball. With those letters sealed as they were, they were committed unto L. Virginius a Colonell, for to be conveyed unto Claudius the Consul. And two troupes or Corners besides of Samnite horsemen were sent to guard them. So soone as they were come vnto the Consull, and the letters read by an enterpretour, and some examination taken of these captives: then Claudius considering that the common-weale was not now in that good case, nor the occasion such, that each governour needed no more, but to make warre by the ordinarie course of commission, within the compasse and limits of his owne province, with the helpe of his owne armie L alone, and against an enemy assigned unto him by the Senate: but that some unlooked-for adventures must be enterprised, some new designements and unexpected, put in execution, which when they are begun and attempted, might make no lesse wonder and feare among their owne friends, than terror among the enemies: & being once performed and done, might turn the former fear into as great joy and gladnes; sent the letters of Asdruball to the Senat at Rome: & withall, himselfe acquainted the lords of the Senate what he intended to do. And forasmuch as Asdruball wrote unto his brother to meet him in Vmbria, hee advised them to send for the legion at Capua to Rome, to take musters also at Rome, and to oppose that armie of the citie, against the enemy at Narnia. Those were the contents of his letters to the Senate. Hee dispatched likewise messengers before, through the territories of the Larinates, Marruines, Ferentines, and Pretutians, (by whom he meant to lead his armie) for to give notice, that all the inhabitants of those parts, should out of their villages and good towns, provide and bring forth victualles into the high waies, for to refresh his souldiours; also to come with their cart-horses, draught-oxen, and other beasts for carriage, together with waines and carts, that the wearied souldiours might ease themselves

A themselves thereby. Himselfe out of his whole armie, as well of citizens as allies, chose forth the floure and most picked men of all, to the number of six thousand foot, & one thousand horie, and gave it out openly, that hee minded to surpris the first citie that hee came next unto in the Lucanes countrie, and withall, the garrison of Carthaginians that lay there: and therefore commaunded them to be readie for the journey and expedition. Thus when he had set forward in the night, he turned his way into Picenum. And the Consull made no more ado, but with long journeyes highed him as fast as he could, and led his armie directly to his colleague, leaving Tatius his Lieutenant, to guard and commaund the campe.

At Rome, they were no lesse terrified and troubled, than they were two year before, at what time as the Carthaginians were encamped before the wals and gates of the citie. And men wist not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Consull, whether they B should praise or dispraise it. And it seemed that they would measure it and report thereof according to the event, than which surely, there is nothing more unjust and unequall. But thus they whispered, That the campe was left with an armie, and without their General, neere unto the enemy Anniball, yea and the same gueldest of all the strength and floure thereof: that the Consull pretended an expedition into the Lucanes countrie, when indeed he went toward Picenum and Gallia; leaving the campe by no one thing more safe and secure, than by the error and mistake C of the enemy, who is altogether ignorant, that the General is gone from thence; and part of the forces with him. But where would they be then, and in what taking should the campe be, in case that were knowne abroad; or if Anniball would either with his whole armie follow after Nero, being gone with no more than six thousand; or assault the campe, lest as it were for a prey D unto him, without forces, without conduct, and without the fortune and good lucke of the General to protect it? The old defeatures received in this warre, the fresh remembrance of two Consuls slaine but the last yeare, encreased mens feare. All which misfortunes hapned, when there was in Italie but one captaine General, and one single armie of the enemies. Now, of one warre of the Carthaginians there are made twaine: and two Annibals (as a man would say) be both at once in Italie, right valorous and renowned warriours. For even Asdruball also, was Asdruball his sonne as well as Anniball, as valiant and redoubted a captaine every way: as who for so many yeares together in Spaine, hath bene exercised in the Romane warres, and borne the name of achieving a twofold victorie, and defeating two armies, with two most noble and famous commanders: and as for expedition and speed in his voiage out of Spaine, and for raising the nations of Fraunce up in armes, he may make his boast much more truly than Anniball himselfe. For even in those very places, where Anniball had lost the greater part of his souldiours, E with hunger and cold, (which kind of death of all others is most miserable) this Asdruball hath received a power of armed men. Moreover, they that knew Spaine well, and the affaires which had passed there, said besides, That he had not to deale with Nero, as with a warriour whom he knew not already; for why? he had when it was, made a child of Nero, by a good token, That when Asdruball was by chance in a wood, and could not get out, was put to his shifts; but whiles he trifled out the time with Nero in booking deceitfull conditions and capitulations of peace, hee shewed him a couensing Carthaginian cast, gave him the faire slip, & escaped out of his hands. And to conclude, in all their discourses at Rome, they magnified every thing on the enemies part above all truth, and debased all their owne meanes of helpe beneath all reason: such was their feare, which interpreteth and construeth all to the worst.

Nero, when he had now gained so much ground, and was gone so farre from the enemy, as it had not mattered much if his designs had bene revealead and made known unto him, for any danger that might ensue therof; called his souldiours before him, & spake some few words to this or the like effect. Never was there designment (quoth hee) of any General in the field, in outward shew more dangerous, in deed & truth more safe & secure, than this of mine. I lead you to a certaine and assured victorie, even to that warre, unto which my colleague would not go before the Senate had allowed him to his full contentment, a greater power both of foot and horie, and the same better set out and more furnished, than if he should have gone against Anniball himselfe: and therefore whatsoever small poise and addition of forces you bring thereto, you shall way thereby the whole, and as it were weigh downe the ballance. For when the enemies readie embattailed to fight, shall heare (and before that time, I will take order I trow, that they shall not heare) that another Consull and another armie is come, no doubt the day will be ours, and they shall yeeld us the victorie. For it is a fame and name onely, that fighteth the field & determineth G battles. And small matters many times carrie away the game, and cause mens minds both to stoupe for feare, and to rise with hope. And verily, of a well foughten field you are they that shall reap the fruite and gaine the glorie. For alwaies it is seene, that a little helpe that commeth last, is more than all besides, and seemeth to effect the whole. And you see your selves, with what concourse, with what admiration, with what affectionate favour all men doe entertaine and regard you by the way. And in very truth, as they marched along in their journey, it was a world to see, how both men and women flocked out of all the villages of the country to see them, how they sorted themselves into companies and degrees to welcome them, and how as they passed as it were in a lane through them, they made vows in their name, they poured out their prayers in their behalfe, and dealt praises among them: calling them the very guard & defence of the Com- H monweale, the favours and redeemers of Rome and the Romane Empire: acknowledging that the lives and liberties of themselves and their children, lay in their right hands, and depended upon the force of their arms: praying to all the gods and goddesses, and to all the holy halows of heaven, to vouchsafe them a luckie journey, a fortunate fight, & a speedie victorie over their enemies: wishing heartily, that they might be bound and condemned (as it were) to pay & performe their vows, which in their name they had undertaken and promised: desiring earnestly, that as now they went along, & accompanied them with carefull minds for feare of the perill which they went unto, so after few daies they might meet with them upon the way with joyfull hearts, as they returne with triumph for their victorie. Every man for himselfe in particular invited them friendly, offered them franckely, entreated and besought them importunately, that all things whatsoever they stood in need of, either for themselves or their beasts, they would receive at his hands especially, as being readie to affoord them all most liberally, heapefull, and with the better. The souldiers againe, for very modestie strove to take no more than was very needfull and necessarie, no stay they would make with any, nor one jot depart from their colours. Their meat they tooke by the way as they went, journeying night and day, and scarce allowing their bodies rest & sleepe to content their weak nature that looked for it. Now had Nero sent afore-hand to his brother Consull certaine couriers, to give him advertisement of his comming, and to know again from him his mind, whether he should come openly or secretly, by day time or by night, and lodge in one campe with him, or in another apart by himselfe. Livius his advise was, and he thought it the better of the twaine, to enter into his campe, closely in the night season, and had given a watch-ward, and made it knowne throughout all the campe, that every Marshall and Colonell should lodge a Marshall or Colonell, every Centurion entertaine a Centurion, every knight or man of armes receive a knight or horseman, and every footman take unto him a footman into his pavillion and cabbin. For it was not expedient that the campe should be enlarged and set out wider, for feare that the enemy might take knowledge of another Consuls comming: and so much the more easily might many of them be bestowed in the streight rouse of their pavilions, because the armie of Claudius had brought in manner nothing with them in this expedition, save their armour onely. Moreover, in the very way as they came, the companie was well mended & much encreased, by many voluntaries that offered themselves willingly of their owne accord, as well old souldiours, such as had served out their yeeres, as young and lustie men: whom Claudius perceiving so to strive for to have their names entred, if he saw them personable & strong of bodie, and like to do good service, had enrolled into the muster book. The other Consull lay encamped before * Sena, and Asdruball some halfe mile from him. And therefore Nero, being now appro-ched and come neere, sat him downe close among the mountaines, because hee would not put himselfe within campe before night. And when they were come thither, they were welcomed every man according to his degree, by them of their owne place and calling, and brought into their tents and pavilions, & with a generall joy of all, friendly entertained as their loving guests.

The next day following they assembled together to counsell: at which meeting, L. Porcius Lici-nius the Pretour was present: who was himselfe encamped close unto the Consuls leaguer. Hee before their comming, by leading his armie over the high places; and one while keeping the narrow streights of the Forrest, to impeach and stop the passages, another while charging upon the flanke and sides, or els upon the backe and taile of the enemy, had by all the devises and policies of warre, mocked him and kept him play. This man, I say, was at the foresaid counsell. Many men there were of opinion, that the day of battell should be deferred for a time, whiles Nero might

* Sena, & i. a.

A. might have some few daies respite, both to refresh his souldiours, wearied with long travaile and much watching, and also to know the qualitie somewhat better of his enemy. Nero not onely persisted still to persuade, but also began most earnestly to intreat, That they would not by long delay make that designe of his to seeme rash and dangerous, which speedinesse in execution had made safe and secure. Considering, that whiles Anniball, upon ignorance and error (which is not like to continue long with him) lay still asleepe and benumbed, neither once thought upon it, to assaile the campe left without a Generall, nor put himselfe upon the way, to make pursute after mee; now before hee once stirre, I may (quoth hee) defeat the armie of Asdruball, and returne againe into Apulia. But hee that by deferring still, giveth the enemy time and respite, betrayeth as much as lieth in him, the campe unto Anniball, and B. laieth the way open for him into Gallia, to joine with Asdruball at his good leasure and pleasure. Nay (quoth he) the signall of battell must be given forthwith, and wee must into the field.
Wee must, I say, take the vantage, and make the best of the error and ignorance of our enemies both absent there, and present here: that neither they with Anniball may know that they are to deale with fewer; nor these againe be ware, that they are to fight with more in number, and stronger in power. Thus the counsell brake up, and the signall of battell was put forth, and presently they went into the field. The enemies were already advanced in battell array, and stood with displaied ensignes. The only stay of joining in fight was this, That Asdruball riding out with some few horsemen before the ensignes, chanced to marke some old targuets of his enemies which hee had not as yet seene, and their horses more lanke and leane, than earst before. And (as hee ques-C. sed) the number also was greater than ordinarie and usuall. Suspecting therefore, that which was indeed, hee founded the retreat in all hast; and sent out presently to the river where they used to water, to see if they might either light upon some, and catch them prisoners, or at leastwise take good markes by their eie, whither any of them haply were higher coloured, or looked sunburnt, presently upon their late travell. Also he gave them commaundement to ride aloofe about their campe, and to spie whether the rampier were enlarged or set out farther in any place, and to listen attentively whether the trumpet sounded single or double within the camp. When all other circumstances besides were related in order affirmatively, onely the not enlarging of the camp, put them by their hint, and gave the occasion that they were beguiled. Two severall campes they were like as before the comming of the Consull: the one belonging to M. Livius, the other to D. L. Porcius. And in neither of them were the rampiers and trenches set out any jot, whereby they might put up more tents, & quarter themselves in larger rouse. But this one thing troubled this old experienced capitaine, & acquainted so well as he was with the Roman enemies, that his espi-als brought word, how in the Pretors campe they sounded the trumpet once, and in the Consuls twice. For surely that was an evident argument, that two Consuls were there. And in thinking how the other Consull had departed from Anniball, and given him the slip, he mightily tormented himselfe. And he could not once suspect and imagine that, which was indeed the truth, namely, that Anniball was deluded and mocked in a matter of so great moment, as to be ignorant what was become of the Generall, or of the armie, to which he lay so close and neere encamped. Surely (thought he) and without all question, he hath received no small foile and overthrow, & in this E. fright dareth not make after and follow the enemy. Nay hee feared much, least all were lost and gone, and that he should not come time ynough to helpe and succour him: and that the Romans had gotten already the same good hand in Italie, which they had before in Spaine. Otherwhiles he was persuaded, that his letters never came to Anniball his hands, that they were intercepted, and so the Consull made hast to prevent him, and give him the foile by the way. Being perplexed with these carefull cogitations, hee caused the fires to be put out, and at the signall given at the first watch, to trusse up bag and baggage, and to dislodge, and be gone. In this fearefull hast, and nightly tumult, the guides whiles they were slenderly looked unto, & small heed was taken of them, one of them sat down and rested close in a secret lurking hole which he had before destined in his mind; the other waded over the river Metaurus, through the fowls that he was F. well acquainted with, & so got away & made an escape. So the armie left at random without their guides, first wandered over the fields, and then diverse of them being wearie & sleepe with over-watching, laid them downe along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. As-druball commaunded them to march along the banke of the river, and to follow it, untill the daylight might direct them the right way: & so going a compasse in and out according to the winding

ding reaches & cranks of the river, wandered a great while, & gained but a smal ground forward. G Now when day light once appeared, he purposed to spie out the first place for convenient passage and there to get over. But finding no fowds, by reason that the farther it was from the sea, the higher were the bankes from the water that kept in the river, he spent all the live-long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And first Claudius Nero came with all the horsemen, then Porcius followed hard after with the vaunt-couriers, and light armed footemen. Whiles they made offer to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and plaid still upon them, in so much as now Asdruball leaving to journey forward (wherein he seemed rather to flee than march) was desirous to take a little hill along the river side, and there to encamp and fortifie. Livius was come also with all the maine power of footemen, so armed and so orderly appointed and marshalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey; but readie also presently to H give battaile. But when they were all joynt together, and aranged in battaile array, Claudius had the leading of the right wing, Livius commaunded the left, and the Pretour took the charge and conduct of the maine battaile. Asdruball seeing no other remedie but to fight, never fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vaward, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: about them in the left wing he opposeth the French against Claudius; not so much trusting upon them, as supposing verily that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper person he tooke up the right wing against Livius for himselfe and the Spaniards, in whom (being old beaten souldiours) he reposed his most hope. The Ligurians in the mids were bestowed behind the Elephants. But the battaile was rather drawne out in length, than stretched forth in breadth. The Frenchmen were defended with the hill that bare out over them. That front which I the Spaniards kept, encountred with the left wing of the Romanes. And all the battaile of the right side, which bare out from the conflict, stood still and fought not. The hill that was opposite against them, was the cause that neither afront, nor asanke, they could charge upon the enemy. But betwene Livius and Asdruball there was an hote fight begun already, and cruell bloudshed on both sides. There were both the Generall captaines: there was the greater part of the Romanes, as well foote as horse: there were the Spaniards, old and experienced souldiours, skillfull also in the Romane manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a tough nation, and hardie in fight. Against this battailon were the Elephants turned, who at the first shock and onser troubled and disordered the vaward, yea and began to force the ensignes to geve ground. But after upon the noyse that grew greater, and the battaile that waxed hotter, they began to be unruly, K and ravers betwene both battailes, as it were doubtfull to whether side they belonged, much like to ships left hulling and floting without their pilots and steeres-men. Then Claudius cried out eisloones to his souldiours: To what end, quoth he, made we such post hast, and tooke so long a journey? But seeing that he laboured in vaine to advance his banners and mount up against the hill opposite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impossible to come unto the enemy and to enter upon him, he drew forth certaine cohorts out of the right wing where he saw they were liker to stand still than to fight, and wheeled about behind the enemies battaile, and soun- L wares not only to the enemies, but also to his owne men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies: and he bestirred himselfe so nimble, that when he had shewed himselfe on the sides, presently he played upon their backs; in such sort, that now on all hands, affront, behind, and on their flankes, downe went the Spaniards and Ligurians, and were hewen in peeces, yea and the execution reached to the very French. There, with them was least ado, and smallest fight of all: for a great many of their fellowes had abandoned their colours, and being slipt away in the night, lay asleepe all over the fields: and such as were there, weery with travaile and watching (as having bodies that of all things can not away with labour and paines taking) were scarce able to beare their corselets on their backs. Besides, now it was high noone: and what with drought and heate together, they stood gaping for aire, and yeilded their bodies agood either to be massacred, or taken captive. As for the Elephants, there were more of them killed by the hands of M governors and guiders that sate upon them, than by the enemy that fought against them. For their manner was to have about them a carpenters chissell and a mallet, and when the beasts began once to rage and to run upon their owne fellowes, their maisters would set the said chissell betwene their eares, even in the very joynt where the nape of the neck and the head meet together, and with his mallet to drive it as hard as he could: this was found to be the readiest and most speedie way to kill so mightie and huge a beast, when they were past all hope to rule them and

A and keepe them in order. And the first inventor and practiser of this feat was Asdrubal, a famous and memorable captaine, as in many other respects, so especially for this battaile. He it was that held out to the end, exhorting his souldiours to fight, fighting also himselfe, and adventuring all dangers: he it was, that when his men were weery and drew back (by reason of long toyle and labour) incensed them againe, one while by faire words and intreatie, another while by sharpe checks and rebukes: he reclaimed them againe when they were running away: he renewed the medley in divers places when it flaked and gave over. And at the very last, when he saw evidently that the enemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remaine alive after so great an armie diffeated that followed his standard, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he set spurres to his horse, and rode among the Squadrons of the Roman horsemen; and there, as befieced Amilcars sonne, and Annibals brother, fighting right- B manfully, was slaine. Never during the time of this warre in one field were there so many enemies killed: and it seemed now that for losse of captaine and overthrow of armie, they might well cry quittance with them for the diffeature at Cannæ. Slaine there were 56000 enemies, 6,000 taken prisoners: and a rich bootie and pillage gained of all sorts, besides gold and silver. Moreover, there were recovered of Romane citizens above foure thousand, who had bene taken prisoners, and were among the enemies. That comfort they had to make amends for the souldiours that died in this battaile: for they woon not the victorie without bloudshed in this field, wherein to the number almost of eight thousand Romanes and allies together, lost their lives. And the conquerours themselves had so much their fill of bloud and slaughter, that C the next morrow, when word was brought unto Livius the Consull, that divers Cisalpine Gaules, and Ligurians, which either were not at the battaile, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one companie all together, without a certaine leader, without ensignes, without any order or command, and might all be put to the sword and utterly destroyed, if there were but one cornet of horsemen sent out after them, Nay quoth he, let some remaine alive to tell the newes both of our enemies losse and ruine, and of our owne vertue and valour. And Nero the very next night after the battaile, marched with more speede backward, than he came thither, and within sixe daies returned againe so farre as to his standing leaguer, and the enemies. All the way as he marched, he was not in deed so resorted unto and frequented by so many men, by reason that there went no harbengers or messengers before: but his coming was D welcomed, with so great gladnesse and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welcure besides themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and expressed in words sufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other: neither how penfive the citie was in doubtfull expectation of the event, nor how joyous and jocund againe, upon the newes and tidings of the victorie. For never one day (after the rumour once was blowne thither, that Claudius the Consull was gone forth in his expedition) from the sun-rising unto the setting, departed either Senatour out of the Councel-chamber, from attendance upon the magistrates, or the people out of the common-hall. The dames of the citie, because other helpe they could yeeld none, betooke themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and downe, and plied all the gods with praies, with vowes, and humble supplications. As the citie was thus perplexed & in suspence; first there came some flying newes, that two horsemen of Narnia were come out of the E battaile, and returned to the campe which lay to guard and keepe the streights and passages of Umbria, who had brought word thither, that the enemies were defeated. At the first, they rather lent their eares to heare these tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the same; as being greater than they might in heart conceive, and more joyfull than they could assuredly believe: & the exceeding swiftnes of the rumor hindered the credit thereof, because it was reported withall, that the battel was fought but two daies before. Then were letters brought from L. Manlius Acidinus, sent out of the campe, which confirmed the arrivall of those horsemen of Narnia. Those letters were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Pretour: where upon the lords of the Senate were sent for out of the Councel-house. But the people kept such a thrusting F and thronging about the doore of the Senat, that the messenger could not passe thither, but was haled and pulled by the people, questioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the letters should be read at the market crosse, and in the Rostra, before they were opened in the Senat. But at the last, they were restrained by the magistrates and caused to void, and hardly could the joy bee continued among so unruly people, who had no measure nor rule of their affections.

Well, the letters were first red in the Senate, and then in the assembly of the people: and there, according to the divers dispositions of men, some tooke joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certaintie: others would give no credit, before they either heard the messengers speake directly from the Consuls, or saw their letters. After this, word came, that there were Embassadors themselves at hand. And then in deed, there ran to meet them, of all sorts, young and old, every one desired to be the first, to see and to heare these so glad tidings. And they went out so far as the bridge Milvius, & all the way along, was full of people. These embassadors or messengers, were L. Veturius Philo, P. Licinius Varus, Q. Cecilius Metellus. Who being accompanied with people of all degrees and qualities, that flocked about them, came as farre as to the common place: some questioned with themselves, others enquired of their traine and retinue, what newes, and how the world went. And as any one had caught an end from them, that the armie and capitaine Generall of the enemies was slaine, or the Romane legions safe, and the Consuls haile and well, hee would immediatly impart his joy unto others. Much ado had they to come into the Curia, and more ado there was, to keep out the multitude, that they were not mingled among the lords of the Senate. But at last the letters were red in the Senate. From thence were the Embassadors brought into the generall assembly of the people. And L. Veturius after hee had red the letters, explained himselfe from point to point in order, how every thing was done, with great applause; and afterwards, with a generall shout of all the assembly, who hardly could conceive in their minds so great joy. Then they ran divers waies, some to the temples of the gods to render thanks, others to their owne houses, to communicate with their wives and children so luckie and fortunate tidings. And the Senate decreed a solemne procession for three daies together, forasmuch as N. Livius and C. Claudius the Consuls, with the safetie of the legions had vanquished the enemies, killed their Generall, and put their armie to the sword. This procession C. Hostilius the Pretour, published in the open assembly of the people: and it was celebrated and solemnized both by men and women. All the temples for three daies fully, were likewise replenished with the one sex and the other. For the Matrones and Dames of the citie, in their best apparrell, together with their children, yeelded praise and thanks to the immortal gods, as if now they had beene freed from all feare, and the warre come to a finall end for ever. This victorie altered the very state and course of the common-weale, so as from that time forward, as in time of feeded peace, men durst make contracts, buy and sell, borrow and lend, yea and pay debts to their creditors.

C. Claudius the Consull, so soone as he was entred into the campe againe, caused the head of Asdruball (which he had perserved with great care and brought with him) to bee throwne out before the Corps de guard and stations of the enemies, and that the Affricane captives, should be shewed bound as they were in chaines: and two of them to be sent loose unto Anniball, to declare and recount in order, how every thing hapned. Anniball having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publicke losse of the state, as for the calamitie hapned in his owne house, fetched a deepe sigh (by report) and said: Ah, I see well the hard fortune of Carthage. And dislodging from thence, because he would bring together all his forces (which being disperced asunder, he was not able to hold and maintaine) into the utmost angle of Italie, (the Brutians countrie) hee brought thither as well the Metapontines, even the whole state of them, who abandoned their owne townies and citties, as also the Lucanes, as many as were subject unto him, and under his obedience.

THE XXVIII. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Citie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the eight and twentieth Booke.

HE prosperous affaires in Spaine, under the conduct of Syllanus the Lieutenant of Scipio, and L. Scipio his brother, achieved against the Carthaginians: as also the acts performed by Sulpitius the Pro-consull, and Attalus the king of Asia (the lesse) in the quarrell and behalfe of the Aetolians, against Philip king of the Macedonians, are reported and set downe in this booke. When there was a triumph decreed and granted unto M. Livius and C. Claudius Nero the Consuls: Livius, because he had performed the exploit in his owne province, rode in a chariot drawne with foure steeds: and Nero, because hee came into the province of his colleague, to helpe forward the victorie, rode after him mounted on horse backe: Howbeit even thus, in this habit and manner of triumph, he carried the more glorie, port, and reverence: for to say a truth, in this war hee had done more good service than his brother Consull. The fire went out in the chappell of Vesta, by negligence of a virgin, that had the keeping and tending thereof, and looked no better unto it. The said virgin was well whipped. P. Scipio finished the warre in Spaine against the Carthaginians, when it had continued foureteen yeares: and in the fift yeare after that he went from the citie of Rome. And having disceizd the enemies quite of the possession of Spaine, he recovered it wholly for the Romanes. From Taracon hee lofed, with two barks, and sailed unto Africke unto Syphax king of the Numidians, with whom he concluded a league. Asdruball the sonne of Gisgo, sat there with him at one table, and they supped together. He exhibited a game and pastime of sword-playing at new Carthage, in the honor of his father and uncle: and the same was not performed by common fencers and sword-plaies hired thereto, but by such as either for the honour of their capitaine, or to determine some controversie, gave defiance one to the other, and entred the lists in combat: Among whom, two great LL. of the consue, who were brethren, fought at sharpe for the soveraigntie of the kingdome. When the citie Astupa was besieged and assailed by the Romanes, the townsmen caused a nightie pile of wood to be made, and set on fire, and when they had killed their wives and children, they threw themselves headlong into the fire after them. Scipio himselfe, while he lay grievously sick, and there hapned by occasion thereof, a mutinie to arise in one part of his army, when he was amended once, made an end thereof: and compelled the States of Spaine (that mutined) to come in and yeeld obedience againe. There was likewise an amitie and societie concluded with M. Asamiss, king of the Numidians: who also promised him his aid, in case he would come over into Africke: With the Gaditanes also, after the departure of M. A. go from thence: who had received letters from Carthage, that he should passe the seas into Italie. Scipio after he was returned to Rome, was created Consull. And when hee made sute to have the province of Africke, Q. Fabius Max. withstood him: and so hee had the government of Sicilie: but with commission to saile over into Africke, in case hee thought it good for the Common-weale. M. A. go the sonne of Amilcar, from the lesser Baleare Island, where hee had wintered, tooke the seas and sailed over into Italie.

When it seemed that Spaine was eased as much of warre, as Italie charged therewith, by the voiage of Asdruball thither: behold, all of a sudden there arose other troubles there, equall to the former. And as for the provinces of Spaine at that time, they were possessed between Romanes and Carthaginians in this manner. Asdruball the sonne of Gisgo, was retired with his power farre within the countrie, even to the Ocean and Gades. But the coasts bordering upon our sea, and in manner all Spain bending toward the East, was held by Scipio, and subject to the Roman empire. Hanno the new General, being passed out of Africke with a fresh armie, & entred into the rounne of Asdruball the Barchine, joined with M. A. go: and and when he had put in armes within a short time, a great number of men in Celtiberia, which lieth in the middelt betweene the two seas; Scipio sent forth against him M. Syllanus with tenne thousand foot, and five hundred horsemen. This Syllanus made such speed by taking as long journeys as possibly he could (considering how much hindred and troubled he was, both by the roughnesse of the waies, and also by the streights, environned with thicke woods, and forests, as most parts of Spaine are) that notwithstanding all those difficulties, hee prevented not onely the messengers, but also the very fame and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance of certaine fugitive revolts out of Celtiberia, hee passed forward from thence to the enemye. By the same guides hee had intelligence, and was for certaine advertised (being now some tenne miles from the enemye) that about the very way where hee should march, there were two campes: namely, on the left hand the new armie above said of Celtiberians to the number of more than nine thousand lay encamped, and the Carthaginians on the right. As for this leaguer, it was well defended and fortified with corps de guards, with watch and ward both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of warre. But the other was as much neglected, dissolute, loose, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw souldiours are, and such as fear the lesse, by reason they are at home within their own countie. Syllanus thinking it good policie to set upon them first, gave commaundement to march under their ensignes & colours, and beare toward their left hand as much as they could, for fear of being discovered in some place or other by the guards and sentinels of the Carthaginians. And himselfe in person, having sent before certain vaunt-couriers & espials, with his armie advanced apace directly toward his enemye. Now was hee approached within three miles of them unespied, and not descried at all. For why? a mountaine country it was, full of roughs and crags, overspread and covered with woods and thickets. There in a hollow valley betweene, and therefore secret for the purpose, hee commaunded his souldiours to sit them downe and take their refection. In this meane time the espials came backe and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid. Then the Romanes, after they had piled their packes, their trusses and baggage in the middelt, armed themselves, and in order of batraille set forward to fight. When they were come within a mile of the enemies, they were discovered by them, who began suddainely to be affraid. Mago at the first outcrie and alarme, set spurres to his horse, and rode a gallop out of his campe to succour. Now there were in the armie of the Celtiberians, foure thousand footmen targettiers, & two hundred horse. This troupe being in manner the flower and very strength of the whole armie, & as it were, a full and complete legion, he placed in the vaward; all the rest, which were lightly armed, he bestowed in the reeward for to succour and rescue. As he led them forth thus ordered and arraunged, they were not well issued without the trench, but the Romanes began to launce their javelins and darts against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of shot from the enemies, couched close under their shields, and defended themselves, & afterwards they rose up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romanes standing thicke as their manner is, received all their darts in their targuets, and then they closed man to man, and foot to foot, & began to fight at hand with their swords. Howbeit, the ruggednesse of the ground, as it nothing availed the swiftnesse of the Celtiberians (whose guise is to run to and fro in skirmish and keepe no ground) so the same was not hurtfull at all to the Romanes, who were used to a set battell, and to stand to their fight: onely the straight rounge, and the trees and shrubs growing betweene, parted their rankes and files asunder, so as they were forced to maintaine skirmish, either singlie one to one, or two to two at the most, as if they had been marched to cope together even. And look what thing hindered the enemies in their flight, the same yeilded them, as it were, bound hand and foot unto the Romans, for to be killed. Now when all these targettiers were slaine, of the Celtiberians were slaine; their light armed souldiours, and the Carthaginians also, who from the other campe ran to succour, were likewise disarraied discomfited, and hewne in peeces. So there were two thousand footmen, and not above, and all the horsemen (who scarce began battell) fled with Mago and escaped. As for Hanno the other Generall, together with them who came last, and to the verie end of the fray, was taken alive. But Mago fled still: and all the Cavallerie, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after, and by the tenth day arrived in the province of Gades, and came unto Asdruball. The Celtiberians, that were but new souldiours, slippt into the next woods out of the way, and so from thence fled home.

This fortunat victorie happening in so good a time, not so much stilled the present war in the very

A very birth, as it cut off the matter and maintenance of future troubles, in case the enemies had been let alone, and suffered to sollicite and stirre other nations to take armes, like as they raised the Celtiberians already. Whereupon, Scipio having highly commended Syllanus, and conceived great hope withall, to dispatch quite, and make an end of the warres; in case himselfe lingered not the matter, & made long stay; pursued the remnant behind, and set forward into the utmost province of Spaine against Asdruball. But Asdruball, who happened then to lie encamped in Boetica for to keepe his allies in obedience and faithfull alleageance, all on a suddaine dislodged, plucked up standards, and away; and more like one that fled than marched, led his armie farther into the countrey, even as farre as the Ocean, and to Gades. But supposing, that so long as hee kept his forces altogether, himselfe was the onely marke which the enemye would shoot at, before that he cut over the streights of Gibraltar to Gades, he brake up his whole armie, & sent them away here and there to their severall cities, both to save themselves within the walls, and to defend the walls by force of armes. Scipio, so soone as hee perceived that the warre was thus divided into sundrie parts, and that to lead about his forces from citie to citie, was rather a long and tedious peece of worke, than either difficult or much available, retired backe. But because hee would not leave that countie cleare in the hands of the enemies, hee sent his brother L. Scipio, with 10000 foot, and 1000 horsemen, to assaile the mightiest and wealthiest citie in those parts, which the barbarous people call Oringis. This citie is seated in the confines of the Melessi (a nation meere Spaniards) the soile fruitfull, and the inhabitants there find silver mines. This was the fortress of Asdruball, and his place of safe retreat, when he made outrodes all abroad into the midland countries of the maine and spoiled the people. Lucius Scipio having pight his camp under the said citie; before that he entrenched and blocked the towne, sent certaine to the gates, who by parling neere at hand, might seele and sound the dispositions of the citizens, and persuade with them to make triall of the Romanes friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their answers, no mind at all nor inclination to peace, he cast a trench, and raised a double rampiar about the towne, and divided his armie into three parts, to the end that one of them should ever follow the assault, whiles the other twaine tooke rest and ease. And when the first troupe and regiment of them began to give a camisado, there followed a fierce, cruell, and doubtfull skirmish. For they could not easily either come under the walls, or bring scaling ladders to set to, by reason of the shot that light upon them. And such as D already had reared up ladders to the wall, some of them were pushed off with certaine forks provided for that purpose, others were caught hold of with yron hookes from above, and were in danger to be hung up in the aire, hoisted aloft, and fetcht over the walls. Scipio seeing that the conflict was unequal, by reason of the small number of assailants, & that the enemies had the advantage besides, in that they fought from the wall top; caused that first regiment to retire, and with the other twaine at once, gave a fresh assault to the towne. This strake so great a feare into them who were already weryed with fighting, that not only the townesmen sodainely abandoned the walls and fled, but also the Carthaginian garison souldiours, for feare least the citie was betrayed, forooke also their stations and places of guard, and gathered themselves into one place. But then the townesmen were afraid, least if the enemies put themselves within the citie, they should be massacred every where as they came in their way, without respect and difference, who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they set one gate open on a suddaine, and in great numbers ran out of the towne, bearing their targuets before them, against the darts that were shot a farr off, and shewing aloft their naked right hands, in token that they had laid aside their swords. But whether the enemye could not well discern them so farr off, or whether they suspected some craftie and deceitfull practise, I wote not, but they fell upon these that fled and yeilded unto them, and slew them downeright, as well as if they had affronted them in the face of a battell, and at the same gate entred the citie with bloudie banners. In other parts likewise they fell to hewing downe the gates with axes, and to breake them open with crows of yron. And as every horseman gat into the citie, he rode amaine (according to the direction given F by the Generall) into the market place, to be possessed thereof. And to these horsemen were assigned the Triarii for aid and assistance. The legionarie souldiours besides ran over all the other parts of the citie, spoiling & killing all that ever they met, save such as defended themselves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken prisoners and committed to ward, likewise of townesmen about three hundred, such as had shut the gates; but unto all the rest the towne was rendred againe, and each man had his owne goods delivered and restored unto him. There were G slaine at the assault of that citie, of enemies almost two thousand: but of Romanes not above fourescore and ten. As by the winning of the towne, they that were employed there tooke great joy and contentment: so in their returne to their Generall himselfe, and the rest of the maine armie, they made a goodly shew as they marched with a mightie multitude of prisoners led before them. Scipio having praised his brother in the most honorable termes that he could devise, and namely for this exploit of forcing Orinx, making him equal in glorie to himselfe for the conquest of Carthage: because winter drew on, that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades, nor yet follow at once upon the armie of Asdruball, so dispersed as it was in sundry parts over the province, conducted his forces back againe into that province of Spaine that lieth on this side Iberus: and when he had dismissed his legions into their severall standing camps to winter in, and H sent his brother L. Scipio to Rome, together with Hanno the Generall of the enemies, and other gentlemen prisoners, he withdrew himselfe to Taracon.

In the same yeere the Romane Armada being set out under the conduct of the Admirall M. Valerius Lavinius the Proconsull, made a voyage from Sicilie into Africke, and forraied all over the territories of Vtica and Carthage, in so much as they drave booties out of the very utmost confines of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Vtica. As they sailed back for Sicilie, they were encountred by the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of 70 long ships of warre, whereof seventeene were boured and taken, foure sunke in the deepe sea, the rest were put to flight and dispersed. Thus the Romane captaine Valerius, after victories achieved both by sea and land, returned with rich prizes of all sorts to Lilybæum: and hereupon by reason that the seas were open and cleered of the enemies ships, great store and abundance of graine was brought to Rome.

In the beginning of that summer wherein these things hapned, P. Sulpitius the Proconsull, and K. Attalus, after they had wintered in Ægina, as is above said, with a joint navie passed over from thence into the Iland Lemnos. The Romanes were 25 Gallies of five ranks of oares, and the king had 35. Philip for his part because he would be readie at all assaies to meete with the enemie either by land or sea, went himselfe in person downe to the sea side, as farre as Demetrias, and made proclamation, that all his forces should by a certaine day meete together at Larissa.
Vpon the fame that went of the kings coming, there repaired fundrie Embassies from the confederate States of all parts, unto Demetrias. For the Ætolians having taken hart unto them, K as well for their societie with the Romanes, as upon the coming of Attalus, wasted and spoiled their borderers. And not only the Acarnanians and Boeotians, and they that inhabit Eubœa, were in great feare, but also the Achæans; whom over and besides the warre from the Ætolians, Machanidas also the Lacedemonian tyrant terrified, who encamped himselfe not farre from the confines of the Argives. All these States made report what perils were like to ensue both by sea and land to their severall cities, and besought the king his aid. Moreover there came unto him out of his owne realme no good tidings of peace and quietnesse, for that Scerdiletus and Pleura- tus were gone out and rebelled: and of the nations of Thrace, the Medi especially were readie to invade the frontiers adjoining upon Macedonie, in case the king should fortune to be busied and occupied otherwise in any long warres. The Boeotians likewise themselves, and other nations inhabiting the more inland parts of Greece, had given intelligence, that the avenues of the forest Thermopylae, where as the narrow gullet of the streights yeldeth small passage, were stopped up by the Ætolians with a trench and pallisade, that it might geve no access at all unto Philip, for to come and defend the cities of the Allies. Thus many troubles coming huddle and thicke one upon another, had beneable to have roused and awakened even a sleepe and slow captaine, and made him to looke about him. These Embassadors he dispatched and sent away, promising every one of them help and succour, as time and occasion would permit: and willing them each one for the present, to provide those things that were most urgent and important. Then he sent a garison unto that citie, from whence newes came, that Attalus having passed with a fleet from Lemnos, had wasted and forraied all the territorie about it. M And he sent Polyphantes with a small power into Boeotia, and Menippus likewise one of his owne captaines and Cavalliers, unto Chalcis, with a thousand targuatiars called Peltati, (now the Peltæ, are certaine small bucklers or targuets, nothing unlike unto the Spanish Cetræ) unto whom were joynd five hundred Ænians, that they might be able to guard all the parts

A of the Iland: himselfe in person went to Scotusa, and there he appointed the Rendezvous, that all the forces of the Macedonians should be brought thither from  Larissa*. Newes came unto him there that the Ætolians had summoned and proclaimed a generall Diet or Councell at Heraclea, and that K. Attalus would repaire thither to consult about the managing of the whole warre. And with an intent by his sodaine coming to trouble this solemne assembly and meeting of the States, he tooke great journeis in his march, and led his armie toward Heraclea: but the Councell was newly dissolved when he arrived thither. Howbeit, he destroyed all the standing corne, which now was neere-hand ripe, specially in the vale along the Gulfe of the Ænians, and so reduced his armie back againe to Scotusa: and there leaving his whole power, he retired himselfe to Demetrias, attended only with his royall guard. And because B he might from thence be readie to meete with all sodaine stirres and invasions of the enemies, he sent out men of purpose into Phocis, and  Eubœa*, and  Peparethus*, to chuse out certaine high places for beacons, from whence the fires might be seene a farre off. And himselfe set up one watchtowre upon Cissæos (a mountaine, the top whereof is of an exceeding height) that upon the signall of the beacons on fire from a farre, he might in the minute of an houre have intelligence, so soone as the enemies went about any trouble whatsoever. But the Romane Generall, and K. Attalus, passed the seas from Peparethus to Nicea, and from thence sailed with their Armada to Eubœa, unto the citie Oreum, which as a man beareth his course from the gulfe of Demet- trias to Chalcis and  Euripus*, is the first citie of Eubœa that sheweth it selfe upon the left hand. *
And thus it was agreed betweene Attalus and Sulpitius, that the Romanes should give the assault C from the sea side, and the king with his forces on the land. Foure daies after the fleet was arrived, they presented themselves before the citie to assaile it. For, that time betwene was spent in secret talke and conference with Plator, who was appointed by Philip governor and provost of the citie. The citie had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the sea, the other situate in the very hart and mids of the towne. From thence there is a way under the ground that leadeth to the sea: at the end whereof there stood a fabrick or towre five stories high, a singular bulwarke and place of defence. There at the first began a most sharp and cruell conflict, by reason that the turret was well furnished with all kind of shot and artillerie: and likewise from out of the ships, there was planted much ordinance, and many engins bent to impeach and assault the same.
Now when every mans mind was amused, and eye fixed upon this hote and eager fight, Plator received and let in the Romanes at the gate of the other citadell that stood over the sea, and so in the turning of an hand it was surprisid and won. The townesmen being expelled and chased D from thence, retired and betooke themselves into the middle of the citie unto the other fortresse. But certaine souldiers were set of purpose there, to shut the gate upon them: and so being excluded, they were killed and taken prisoners in the mids betwene. The garison of the Mace- donians stood round together under the castle wall, and neither fled openly amaine, nor yet began to fight, as if they ment to stick to it unto the end. For whom, Plator obtained pardon of Sul- pitius, and having embarked them, brought them to Demetrium of Phthiotis, and there set them ashore, and himselfe returned to Attalus.

Sulpitius bearing himselfe bold for this so good and speedie successe, immediately sailed with E his victorious armada against Chalcis. Where the event in the end answered nothing unto his hope and expectation. The sea lying broad and large on both hands, gathereth in that place to a narrow rume, so as at the first sight it maketh a shew of a double peere or haven, opening upon two divers mouths, but in very truth, there is not lightly to be found a worse harborough, & a more daungerous roade for ships. For not only for the exceeding high hills on both sides of the maine, the winds arise suddainly and blow blusterous, but also the verie streight it selfe of Euripus ebbeth not and floweth, seven times in the day, as the voice goeth, at certaine set and ordinarie houres; but without all order, as the winds drive, the sea turneth and rolleth hither and thither, working up and downe, & like a flowing stream runneth forcibly & with great violence, as it were, down a steepe hill: so as neither night nor day, the ships there riding, have any rest & repose. As the F Romane armada was thus engaged within so daungerous a roade: so the towne of the one part was environned with the sea, and on the land side surely fortified; besides the defence of a strong garison there, and the assured loialtie of the captaines and principall heads and rulers; whereby it was chiefly guarded, which at Oreum was but vaine, fickle, and unsteadfast: by meanes whereof it was tenable and imprenable. The Romane Generall in this case, considering how hee had begun

begun a rash enterprife, & seeing many difficulties on every hand, wrought wisely yet in this one point, that he soone gave over, because he would spend no time in vaine, & passed over with his fleet from thence to Cynus of Locris (a towne of marchandise belonging to the citie of Opus, situate a mile from the sea.) Philip had warning by the beacons on fire that appeared from Oreum; but by the fraud of Plator, the other were with the latest set a burning from the watch-tower above. And forasmuch as he was not strong enough at sea, hee could not with his navie have easie access into the Iland. So that service was delaied and altogether neglected. But hee bestirred himselfe quickly to the succour of Chalcis, so soone as ever he espied the fire from the beacon. For albeit Chalcis it selfe be a citie of the same Iland, yet it is divided from the continent by so narrow an arme of the sea, that there is no more but a bridge between it and the land: and on that side it hath more easie access than by water. Philip having disfeized the garrison there, cast downe the fort, and discomfited the Ætolians who kept the streight passage of Thermopylae, came from Demetrias to Scotusa, from whence he departed at the third watch: and when he had driven and chaled the enemies in great feare to Heraclea, himselfe in one day reached to Elatia in Phocis, a journey above 60 miles. The very same day in manner, the citie of the Opuntij was taken by K. Attalus & put to the rancke. The whole pillage thereof, Sulpitius had granted to the king, in regard that Oreum a few daies before was spoiled and rifed by the Romane souldiours, and the kings men had no share with them. Now was the Roman armada retired to Oreum: and Attalus not ware of Philip his comming, spent time in exacting monies from the chiefe & principall citizens. But so suddaine and unexpected was this accident of his approach, that had not certaine Cretensians by good hap, gone forth a foraging farre from the citie, and descried the march of the enemies a great way off, he might have bene overtaken and surprisid. Attalus unarmed and out of order as he was, made hast & ran amaine to the sea side, for to retover the ships. And even as he and his men were losing from the land and launching into the sea, Philip came, and from the verie shore put the mariners and sailers in great feare. From thence hee returned to Opus, crying out upon God and man, and blaming his ill lucke, that hee bad missed so narrowly the opportunitie of so great an exploit, and let it go, as it were, snatched out of his very eye. In the same fit of anger, he reproved and rebuked the Opuntians, for that being able to hold out the siege untill his comming, so soon as they saw the enemy, they presently had yeelded themselves in a manner voluntarie into his hands. When he had set things in order at Opus and thereabout, he tooke his journey to Torone. Attalus at first retired himselfe to Oreum: but upon the newes arrived, how Prusias the king of Bithynia, had invaded the frontiers of his kingdome, he left the Romane affaires and the Ætolian warre, and from thence sailed over directly into Asia. Sulpitius also retired his navie unto Ægina, from whence in the beginning of the spring he had departed & taken his voiage. And Philip forced and wan Torone, with as small adoe as Attalus before had taken Opus. That foresaid citie Torone, was inhabited by certaine that were fled and driven out of Thebes in Phthiotis. For when the citie was taken by Philip, and they fled for protection unto the Ætolians, (to whome they recommended and committed themselves) the Ætolians gave unto them that place to seat themselves in, being a citie wasted and in manner desolate by the former warre of Philip. Then Philip having recovered Torone againe, as is aforesaid, departed from thence, and wan Tritonum and Drymas, two small and base townes of no account in Doris. From whence he came to Elatia, where he had given commandement, that the embassadours of Ptolomeus & the Rhodians, should give attendance, until his comming. Where, as they were treating about the making an end of the Ætolian warre (for as much as those Embassadours to the same effect, had lately presented themselves at Heraclea, in the counsell and assembly of the Romanes and Ætolians) tidings came, that Machanidas purposed and determined to set upon the Eleans, as they were preparing to exhibit the solemne Olympian games. Philip supposing it good to prevent that, courteously answered the Embassadours and gave them their dispatch: saying, that as himselfe was not the cause of that warre, so he would not hinder and stay the conclusion of peace, upon any equall & reasonable condition. And so with a power lightly appointed, he marched through Boeotia to Megara, & from thence went downe to Corinth: where having furnished himselfe with victuals, he marched forward to Phlios & Phancus. And being now come as farre as to Erea, and hearing there, that Machanidas upon the rumour of his comming, for feare was fled backe to Lacedæmon, he returned to Ægium, unto the generall Diet and counsel of the Achæi: supposing withall, that he shuld find ther the Punick armada, which he had sent for

A for to come thither, because he might be able to do somewhat also by sea. But some few daies before, the Carthaginians had sailed over into Phocæa, and from thence were gone to the havens of the Acarnanians, so soone as they heard once, that Attalus and the Romanes were departed from Oreum, fearing that they would make out after them, and least they should be overtaken and surprisid within Rhium, which is the very mouth of the Corinthian gulle. Philip verily grieved hereat, and was wonderfully troubled in mind, seeing what hast forever he made himselfe in all his emprises, yet he came too short and effected nothing in due time: as if fortune in taking all things out of his very eye-sight, had deluded, disappointed, and mocked all his speedinesse and expedition. Howbeit in that solemne Diet and assembly, hee diffused his griefe, bit in his passionate affections, and thus with an haughty mind he spake and said, That hee called both God and man to witnesse, that he had forlet no opportunitie of time nor vantage of place, but when B and wheresoever hee heard but any inckling of the enemy, and the least rustling of armour, whether he had made all hast that possibly he might: but he could hardly devise and conceive, whether himselfe were more venturous in seeking warre, than the enemy nimble and quicke in avoiding the same. So Attalus at Opus, so Sulpitius at Chalcis, and so the other day Machanidas escaped out of his hands and gat away. But surely (quoth he) this running away will not alwaies prosper and speed well: neither is that to be counted a dangerous warre, wherein a man may be sure (if he but meet his enemy once) to have the upper hand. That which is the principall point of all, thus much have I gotten yet at the enemies hands, that they confesse thereby, how they are not able to make their parts good with us: and I doubt not, but shortly I shall achieve the C victorie of them, and the event and fortune of their fighting with me, shall bee no better than their present hope. The kings allies were glad to heare him speake thus. Then he retired unto the Achæans, Erea, and Triphylia, and delivered againe Aliphera unto the Megalopolitans; for that they proved by good evidence, that it belonged by right to their territorie & confines. Thus having received of the Achæans certain ships, to wit, three Galleaces or Caravels of four banks of ores, and as many gallies of two rankes, from thence hee cut over to Anticyræ. And then with seven Caravels of five rankes of ores, and more than twentie barkes besides, which hee had sent into the gulfes of Corinth to joyne with the Carthaginian navie, he made faile to Erythra in Ætolia, neere unto Eupalium, and there disembarked and landed his men. But the Ætolians were advertised aforehand of his arrivall and comming ashore: for all the people that inhabited either the countie townes and villages, or the castles neere to Potidania and Apollonia, were fled into the mountaines and woods. As for the cattaille, which in that hurrey and hast that they made could not be driven away with them, those they preyed upon and brought them to the ships. With these and all the rest of the bootie, he sent Nicias the Pretor of the Achæans to Ægium, & so went forward to Corinth: and from thence he commanded that the land forces should be conducted & march by land through Boeotia: whiles himselfe sailing from Cenchræa along the coast of Attica, above the point or cape of Sunium, passed even though the mids of his enemies armadaes, and arrived at Chalcis. Then after he had commended the citizens there for their fidelitie and vertue, in that neither feare nor hope was able to change and turne their resolute minds, and exhorted them for the time to come, to continue stedfast in their alliance and allegiance, if they made more reckning of their owne fortune, and loved it better than the condition of the Oritanes and the Opuntij; hee sailed from Chalcis to Oreum. And when he had committed the government of the State, and the guard of the citie, unto those principall citizens, who chose to flye when the citie was lost, rather than to yeeld themselves unto the Romanes, himselfe passed over from Eubœa unto Demetrias, from whence at the first he tooke his voyage to the aid and succor of his friends and allies. After all this, having appointed and set out at Cassandrea keeles for an hundred long ships of warre, and taken up a number of shipwrights to finish out the rest of the worke: seeing that all Greece was now in quiet, both because Attalus was departed from thence, and also for that himselfe had in good time succored his allies and confederates, who were in some trouble and distresse, he returned back againe into his owne F realme, for to make warre upon the Dardanians.

In the latter end of that summer, wherein these affaires thus passed in Greece, when Q. Fabius Maximus the father, being sent as Embassadour from M. Livius the Consul unto the Senate at Rome, had brought word & made report, That the Consul judged L. Porcius with his legions to be sufficient for the province of Fraunce, and that himselfe might well be spared, and depart from thence, and the Consular armie withdrawne out of those parts: the Lords of the Senat gave order and determined, that not onely M. Livius, but C. Claudius also his Colleague, should returne to the cittie. This difference onely betweene the one and the other appeared in the decree, in that they gave direction, that the armie of M. Livius should bee brought home, but the Legions of Nero should remaine still in the province, and be opposed against Anniball. The Consuls by entercourse of their letters passing betweene, agreed thus together, That like as they had with one mind and consent made warre and managed their affaires, so, albeit they were in divers parts farre asunder, yet they should meet in one place, and at one time make repaire to the cittie of Rome: & that whether of them twain came first to Preneste, he should there attend the coming of his Colleague. And it fortuned so, that they arrived both upon one & the same day at Preneste. From whence they sent an edict before, that the third day after the Senat should generally assemble together in the temple of Bellona: & so they were met upon the way with a multitude of people, who accompanied them as they returned into the cittie. And they were not content all of them in generall to salute them and welcome them home, but every man was desirous particularly to take the Consuls by their victorious right hands: some with congratulations, wishing them joy, others with thanksgiving, acknowledging that by their good meanes and vertue, the Commonweale was preserved and set upright. Now when they had related in the Senat house (as the manner was of all Generals) what acts they had atcheeved, and withall demanded, that for their valiant and faithfull service to the Commonweale, first, due honour should be rendered to the almightie gods, and then, they themselves allowed to enter the cittie in triumph: the LL. of the Senat made answer, That they for their parts were readie and willing to consider first and principally of the merites and goodnesse of the gods, and next and immediatly of the good deserts of the Consuls: and as they decreed divine processions and supplications in the name of them both, so they granted triumph, as well to the one as to the other. But the Consuls, because they would not divide their triumph (since that they had managed the warres with one accord & common consent) thus agreed betweene themselves, That for as much as the battell was fought within the province of M. Livius, and the very day of the field fought, it fortuned to be his turne to take the signe of birds, & to have the entire rule; and besides, the armie of Livius was brought backe and came to Rome alreadie, but that other of Nero could not be removed out of the province: therefore M. Livius should ride in a chariot drawn with foure steeds into the cittie, with his soldiers following after, & C. Claudius presently come after mounted on horseback without his soldiers. Thus the triumph was communicate to the one & the other, & encreased the glory of them both; but especially of him, who the more that he exceeded his Colleague in desert, the more he yielded and gave place unto him in honour. Lo, said every man, He there on horseback, travailed in fixe daies the whole length of Italie from one end to the other, & fought the very same day with banner displaied against Asdruball in Gaule, when as Anniball thought verily hee lay encamped against him with his armie in Apulia. See, how one and the same Consull, in the defence of the one part of Italie and the other, against two captaines, nay, against two noble Generals of two armies, in one place employed his advise and counsell, and in another opposed his bodie and force of armes. Behold (say they) the very bare name of Nero was sufficient to keepe Anniball within his camp: and what was it els, that discomfited and defeated Asdruball, but even his onely coming? Let the other Consull therefore bee set up on high, and ride in a chariot drawne with as many horses as he will; all while that the true triumph indeed passeth through the cittie upon one horse onely. Nay, if Nero went but on foot, hee would be memorable for ever hereafter, as well for the refusall of glorie in that triumph, as for the winning of honour in that warre. With these and such like speeches they entertained Nero as they beheld him, and so accompanied him even to the very Capitoll. They brought into the Treasurhouse of the cittie in coine* thirtie hundred thousand* Sesterij, & 800000 Asses. Among the soldiours, M. Livius divided* six and fiftie Asses to them apeece. And C. Claudius promised as much to his soldiours that were absent, upon his returne to the armie. This was noted and observed in the triumph, that the soldiours uttered more ditties and rimes full of pleasant conceits and jests (as their manner was) upon C. Claudius, than their owne Consull: and that the gentlemen and horsemen highly extolled and magnified above all the rest, L. Veturius, and Q. Cecilius the two Lieutenants, and exhorted the Commons to create them Consuls against the next yeare: likewise, that the Consuls for the time being, confirmed this prerogative choise and election of those gentlemen, with their

A owne assent and authoritie the morrow after, in a frequent assemblie before the people, giving honourable testimonie of the valiant and faithfull service of those foresaid lieutenants in that warre.

Now the time drew neere of election of new magistrates: and when it was thought good by the Senat, that a Dictatour should call that solemne assemblie for the said election; C. Claudius the Consull nominated for Dictatour his colleague M. Livius. And Livius named Q. Cecilius Generall of the horsemen. So there were created Consuls by M. Livius the Dictatour, L. Veturius, and Q. Cecilius, even he who then was Generall of the Cavallerie. After this, they went to the election of the Pretours, and chosen there were, C. Servilius, M. Cecilius Metellus, T. Claudius Asellus, and Q. Manlius Thurius, who then was Aedile of the Commons.

B When these elections were finished, the Dictatour having resigned up his office and dismissed the armie, by vertue of an act of the Senat tooke his journey unto the province of Tuscane, to sit in commission and make enquire, what States either of the Tuscans or Vmbrians, intended and plotted to revolt from the Romanes, and to turne unto Asdruball at his coming into those parts: and who they were that had assisted him either with auxiliarie souldiours, or with victuals, or with any aid and helpe whatsoever. And these were the acts for that yeare, as well at home as abroad in the warres.

The great Romane Games were wholly renewed and set out againe three times by the Aediles of the chaire, Cn. Servilius Capio, and Serv. Cornelius Lentulus. Likewise the pastimes and plaies called Plebeij were once fully renewed and exhibited againe by M. Sempronius Matho, & Q. Manlius Thurius, Aediles of the Commons.

In the thirteenth yeere of the second Punicke warre, when L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus were Consuls, both of them were appointed by the Senat to make warre upon Anniball in the province of the Brutij. Which done, the Pretors cast lots: And to M. Cecilius Metellus fell the jurisdiction of the citizens; to Q. Manlius, of the foreiners. C. Servilius his lot was to governe Sicilie, and T. Claudius Sardinia. As for the armies, they were divided in this manner: one of the Consuls had the conduct of that which was under C. Claudius the Consull of the yeare before. The other Consull had the leading of that (namely two full legions) which C. Claudius the Propretour before commaunded. M. Livius as Proconsull, whose government was prorogued for another yeare, received the charge of the two legions of voluntaries in Hetruria, at the hand of C. Cerenius the Propretour. And Q. Manlius was appointed by a decree of the Senat, to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Colleague, and to take the charge of Gallia with the forces there; whereof L. Porcius the Propretour was captaine: and hee had in commission to wast the lands of those Gauls, who were revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Asdruball. C. Servilius was assigned with the power of the two Cannian legions, to defend Sicilie, like as P. Manlius had before. Out of Sardinia the old armie was withdrawne, which was under the governance of A. Hostilius: and the Consuls enrolled one new legion, for T. Claudius to saile over with. Quintus Claudius, & C. Hostilius Tubulus, had both of them their commissions newly sealed for one yeare longer, the one to governe Tarentum, and the other to rule Capua. M. Valerius the Proconsull, who also was Admirall for the sea coast and river along Sicilie, was commaunded to give up E thirtie of his saile unto C. Servilius, and with all the rest of the navie to returne to the cittie of Rome.

As the cittie was in suspence and stood doubtfull for the variable event of so great a war, attributing the causes of all weale and woe, of prosperitie and adversitie, to the gods; behold many prodigious tokens were reported to have happened. Namely, That in Tarracina the temple of Jupiter, and at Satricum the chappell of the goddesse Matuta, were blasted with lightening from heaven. And the inhabitants of Satricum were no lesse terrified, with two serpents that were crept into the temple of Jupiter, at the very dores. From Antium there was word brought, that the harvest folke as they were reaping, spied certaine eares of come bloudie. At Cære there was a sow that farrowed a pig with two heads, and an ewe yeaned a lambe both male & female. It was F reported also, that at Alba there were two sunnes scene: and at Fregellæ by night, the day-light appeared. Also in the territorie of Rome, by report, an Oxe spake: and the altar of Neptune within the Cirke Flaminia, brake out into much sweat: and the temples of Ceres, Salus, and Quirinus, were blasted and smitten from heaven. The Consuls were commaunded to expiate & purge these fearefull sights with sacrificing of greater beasts, and to make supplication one day. Which was done according to the decree of the Senate. But above all the wonderous signes, either reported from abroad, or seene at home, the minds of men were put in feare, for the going out of the fire in the chappell of Vesta. For which cause the Vestal virgin who had the charge that night to looke unto it, was by the commaundement of P. Licinius the Bishop well and thoroughly skourged. And albeit this hapned by humane negligence, and that the gods portended nothing thereby, yet it was thought good, that an expiation thereof should be made with greater sacrifices, and a solemne supplication held in the chappell of Vesta.

Before that the Consuls went forth to the warres, they were put in mind by the Senat to take regard and order for the commons, and to procure their reducing againe into the country, and placing them in their lands and fermes. For seeing that by Gods goodnes the warre was removed farre from Rome and Latium, the country townes might be without feare of danger inhabited and frequented againe: neither was it a meete thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sicilie than Italie. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of the free-holders were consumed up in the warres: and great scarcitie there was of servants and hines to till the ground: besides, the cattaille was driven away in booties, and the manor houses were either ruinate or burned. Howbeit, a great fort were compelled by the authoritie of the Consuls to repaire againe into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the embassidors of Placentia and Cremona; who made complaint, that their territories were much dammified and wasted, by the incursions and rodes of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their owne naturall inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their cities were not well peopled, and their countrey lay wast and desart. Whereupon Manlius the Pretour had commission to defend and guard the colonies from the enemy. And the Consuls by vertue of an Act of Senate made an edict and proclamation, that all citizens of Cremona and Placentia, should by a certaine day returne into their colonies. And they themselves in the beginning of Spring tooke their journey, and set forward to warre.

C. Caelius the Cos. received the armie of Cl. Nero: and L. Veturius of Q. Claudius the Pretour, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new souldiers whom he himselfe had enrolled. The Consuls led their armie into the territorie of Consentia, and having foraged and spoiled here and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and streight passage much troubled by the Brutij and the Numidian archers: in so much as not only their prizes were in danger to be lost, but they themselves that were armed, in some jeopardy. Howbeit, the alarme was greater than the skinnish, and the bootie being sent before, the legions escaped safe into places of securitie. And so from thence they went into the Lucanes country. All that nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Romane empire. With Asdruball that yeere was nothing done: for neither he himselfe made offer of warre, upon the first hurt and losse received as well in publike as private, nor the Romanes provoked him as long as he was quiet. For they were all of this judgement, that there was such mettall and valor in that one commaunder, although all things els about him went to wreck, that they held it no good policie to provoke him, and wake a sleeping dog. And verily I wot not what to make of him: whether he were more to be wondred at in adversitie than in prosperitie. For why? waring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteene yeeres, so farre from home, in much varietie of fortune, with an armie not consisting of naturall citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused riss raff and medley of all nations, having neither the same lawes nor manners and customes, nor language; differing in fashions, in habit, in apparell, in armour, in rites, in religion, nor serving as it were the same gods: he had so knit and united them in one linke & straight band, that they mutined neither among themselves, nor against their Generall, notwithstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies countrey: for default whereof, in the former Punick war, many outrages were committed both among captaines and souldiours. But when Asdruball the Captaine together with his armie was diffeated and overthrowen, in whom they reposed all their hopes of victorie; and when they were faine to quit as it were all Italie besides, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Brutium; who would not thinke it a mervailous matter, that there was no stirre nor commotion in his camp? considering that over and besides all other difficulties, he had no meanes nor hope els to mainteine his armie, but out of the Brutians country? And say, that it were all wholly tilled, sowed, and well husban-

A husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed so huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was set away from the tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholie employed in warfare: to say nothing of the naturall guile and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and mainteine the same by robbing and theeeving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Carthage: whiles they all there were studious and carefull only to keepe Spaine, as if all had gone well with them in Italie.

In Spaine the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other far unlike and different: the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being diffeated in a foughten field, and having lost their captaine, were driven to the utmost coast of Spaine, even as farre as to the Ocean sea: different, in that Spaine is a countrie more apt and commodious to the reparation of new war, not only than Italie, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although it were the first nation of all the maine and continent, that the Romanes went first in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a province; yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately in our daies even under the conduct and happy fortune of Augustus Caesar. There at that time Asdruball the sonne of Gisco, the greatest and noblest Captaine in all these warres (next after the Barchine house) returned from Gades; and hoping by the help of Mago the sonne of Amilcar, to wage warre afresh, tooke musters throughout the farther part of Spaine, and armed to the number of fiftie thousand foote, & 4500 horse. And as for the Cavallerie, all writers in manner do agree: but for the Infanterie, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the cite Silpia. There upon the open plaines fate these two Carthaginian captaines downe, because they would not seeme to fall off and refuse battaile.

Scipio, when newes came unto him of so puissant an armie levied, supposed that neither with the Romane legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unlesse he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations, if it were no more but for shew and outward apparence: nor yet was to repose such assured confidence in them, as in the fundamentall strength of his armie, that in case they should give him the slip when the time came, (the onely occasion of the overthrow of his father and uncle) they might doe much hurt to the maine chauce and totall summe of all. And therefore he sent Syllanus before, unto Colcas, (a lord over the signorie of eight & twentie towns) for to receive of him those horse & foot which he had promised to levie in the winter time. Himselfe departed from Taracon, & gathered some small aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and so came to Castulo. Thither Syllanus brought also certaine auxiliaries, to the number of three thousand foot, and five hundred horse. From thence he went forward to the cite Batula; being in all of citizens and allies, with footmen and horsemen together, one with another, 45000 strong. As they were pitching their tents and encamping, Mago and Mastanissa, with all their Cavallerie set upon them: and no doubt, had troubled them mightily as they were making their defences, but that certaine troupes of horsemen hidden behind an hill, whom Scipio fity for the purpose had there bestowed, suddainly at unawares ran upon them and recharged them, as they were loosely ridden forward without order and array. These had not well begun skirmish with them, but they discomfited the forwardest of them, and such especially as engaged themselves neere to the trench, to impeach and annoy the pioners and laborours at worke: but with the rest that kept to their colours, and went orderly in their ranks, the fight was longer, and for a good while continued doubtfull. But when the Squadrons which stood readie appointed in their guards and stations, were first brought forth; and after them, the souldiours also from their worke and fortifications, were willed to take armes; and still more and more continually came fresh and in hart, in place of those that were wearied, so as now from all parts of the campe, there was gathered together a full power, and ran to the battaile; then the Carthaginians & Numidians turned their backs plaine and fled. And at the first they went away by troupes and companies, keeping their order and array still, and not disbanded for hast or feare. But afterwards, when the Romanes began once more eagerly to play upon the hindmost of them; so as now their furious violence could no longer be resisted; then without all regard of ranks or files, they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heapes, seeking every man the next way he could to escape. And albeit by this skirmish, the Romanes were more encouraged a good deale, & the enemies hearts much daunted: yet for certaine daies ensuing, there never ceased excursions and bickerings maintained by the horsemen and those that were lightly armed. Now when by their small skuffings they had made sufficient triall on both sides of their strength, Asdruball first lead forth his forces into the field, & then the Romans likewise came forward readie to receive them. G But when both armies stood without their campe, arranged in battaile array, & neither of them gave the charge: when the day drew toward sun-setting, Asdruball first retired with his men into the campe, and after him, the Romane Generall likewise. Thus continued they for certain daies together. Asdruball was evermore the first that came abroad, and the first againe that founded the retreat to his souldiours, wearied with long standing. But of neither side they made out to skirmish, or discharged any shot, or gave alarmes, & set up a crie. Of the one part the Romans, on the other the Carthaginians together with the Africanes, stood in the maine battaile: & the allies of either side kept the wings, & those were Spaniards, as well in the one armie as the other. But in the front of the Carthaginian battell, were the Elephants placed, who afar off made a shew as if they had bene castles. And throughout both armies this word went for currant, that when H the time came, they would so fight as they stood day by day arranged: namely, that the maine battailes of the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarell and occasion of the war, with like courage of heart and force of armes would encounter and cope together. Scipio perceiving this once to go for good, & to be stily setled in their opinions, altered all for the nonce against the day that he minded indeed to give battaile. And overnight hee gave a watch-word and taken throughout all the campe, that both horse and man should take their dinner before day, and that the horsemen in armes readie appointed, should hold their horses saddled and bridled. Now before it was broad day light, he sent out all the Cavallerie together with the light armour, to charge upon the Corps de guard and standing watch of the enemies. And himselfe straight after, advanced forward with the whole strength of the legions armed at all peeces. I And clean contrarie to the conceived opinion & perswasion, both of his own men, and also of his enemies, he strengthened the wings with Romanes, and marshalled the maine battaile with the allies. Asdruball raised with the clamour and shout of the horsemen, leapt forth of his pavilion, and perceiving a tumultuous alarme & fearfull stirre of his owne men before the rampier and trench, and seeing as farre off the glittering ensignes of the legions, and all the plaines over-spread with enemies, presently made forth all his Cavallerie against their foresaid horsemen. Himselfe with the battaile of footmen issieth out of the campe, and made no chaunge nor alteration at all in the marshalling of the battailons, otherwise than he had used the daies past. The horsemen continued the fight along time doubtfully: neither could it bee determined by it selfe, because evermore, as any of them were put backe (which hapned on both parts in manner by turnes) they retired K safely into the battaile of footmen. Now when as the battels were not past halfe a mile under one from another, Scipio founded the retreat, and opened his ranks, & received all the horsemen and light armed souldiours within the middle ward: and having divided them in two regiments, hee bestowed them for succours and supplies behind the wings. Now when the time was come to joyne in medley, hee commaunded the Spaniards (and those were the maine battaile) to take sure footing and go stedily together: faire and softly himselfe out of the right wing (for, that point he commaunded) dispatched a messenger to Syllanus & Martius, willing them to stretch out that wing on the left hand, like as they saw him to draw it a length on the right: with direction also unto them, that they together with the light horsemen and light appointed footmen, should encounter and close with the enemy, before that both battailes might meet and joyne L together. Thus having enlarged out at full their wings, they with three squadrons of footmen, and as many cornets of horsemen, together with the light armed skirmishers, advanced with full pace directly afront the enemies, whiles the rest followed sideways a crosse. Now there was a void peece of ground in the mids between, by reason that the Spaniards ensignes went but slowly forward: and the wings had bene in conflict already, when the floure and strength of the enemies battaile, consisting of old beaten Carthaginian and Africane souldiours, were not yet come within the darts shot, neither durst they put in to succour them that were in fight, for feare they should open the main battaile, for the enemy that came directly against them. Their wings were much distressed in the fight on every side. For the horsemen, the light armed souldiours, and the skirmishers, having wheeled about and set a compasse to environ them, ran upon them on their M flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them afront, & al to break off their wings from the bodie of the battell. And as now in every respect the fight was unequal, so the rabble of camp-followers, Balearic Ilanders, & raw untrained Spaniards, opposed against the approved Romane and Latine soldiours, pulled down a side. The day went on still, & Asdruball his armie began to faint: and

A no mervaille, for they were surpris'd & taken of a sodain, betimes in the morning, & wer forced in halt to enter into the field & go to battell, before they had refreshed & strengthened their bodies. And to that purpose Scipio had drawne the day on length, and trifled out the time, that the battell might be late. For it was the seventh houre [or one a clocke after noone] before the ensigne of footmen charged upon the side points. And a good deale later it was, ere the maine battailes fought and joined together: so that the heat of the noone sunne, the paine of long standing in armour, and hunger and thirst came all together to enfeeble and spend their bodies, before that they came to handstrokes and to buckle with their enemies: which was the cause that they stood leaning and resting themselves upon their shields. And over and besides all other troubles, the Elephants also affrighted and maddened with this tumultuous and disordered manner of fight of B horsemen, skirmishers, and light armed souldiours together, ran from the wings, upon the main battell. The captaines therefore themselves, being thus tainted, as well in courage of heart, as in bodily strength, gave ground and reculed. Howbeit, they still kept their arraies, as if the whole battell had retired whole and sound by the commaundement of their Generall. But when the winners and conquerours on the other part, were so much more forward to charge upon them more hotely on every side, because they saw them to lose their ground and shrinke backe, so as their violence could not well be endured; then albeit Asdruball held them still together, and did what he could to stay their flight, crying estfoones alowd unto them, that there were hills behind them, and places of safe retreat, if they would retire in good fort, moderately, and in order; yet when they saw their enemies presse so hard upon them, killing and hewing in peeces those that C were next unto them, feare was above shame, and so immediately they shewed their backe parts, and ran away all at once as fast as they could. Yet at first, when they came to the root and foot of the hills, they began to make a stand, and rallie the souldiours againe into order of battell, seeing the Romanes to make some stay of advancing their ensignes up the hill. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come lustily forward, they began againe to flie afresh, and so in feare were forced to take their campe. Neither was Scipio himselfe farre from their trench and rampier, but in that very brunt had bene maister thereof, but that immediately upon the hote gleames of the sunne, when hee shineth in a waterie skie full of blacke and rainie clouds, there powred downe such store of showers and tempests, that hardly could he himselfe after his victory, recover his owne campe. And some there were also that made it a scruple and matter of conscience, D to attempt any more for that day. The Carthaginians, although they had great reason to repose themselves, and take their necessarie rest, so wearied as they were with travell, and sore wounded, especially seeing the night was come, and the stormie raine continued: yet, because their feare and present danger wherein they stood, gave them no time to loiter and slacke their businesse, against the next morning that the enemies should carely assaile their campe, they gathered up stones from out of the vallies neere about them, and piling them one upon another, amended the heigh of their rampier, purposing to defend themselves by the strength of their fence, seeing small helpe and remedie in force of armes. But the falling away of their Confederates, was the cause that their departure & flight from thence, seemed more safe, than their abode there, would have bene. This revolt was begun by Altanes, a great lord of the Turdetanes: for E he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginians to the adverse part. Whereupon two strong walled townes, together with their garrisons, were yeelded by the captaines unto Scipio. Asdruball therefore, fearing least this mischeefe might spread farther, now that their minds were once set upon rebellion, dilodged about the midnight following, and removed. Scipio so soone as he was advertised at the breake of the day, by those that kept standing watch in their stations, that the enemies were gone; having sent his horsemen before, commaunded the standers and ensignes to bee advanced, and led so speedie a march, that if they had gone straight forward, and followed their tracks directly, they had no doubt overtaken them: but beleeving certaine guides, that there was a shorter way to the river Batis, they were advised to charge upon them as they passed over. But Asdruball seeing the passage of the river stopped F against him, turned to the Ocean: and even at the first they departed in great hast, as if they fled, which was the cause that they gat the start of the Romane legionarie footmen, and wan a good space of ground before them. But the horsemen, and light appointed footmen, plaid one while upon their tails, flanked another whiles their sides, and by this meanes with charging & recharging, they wearied them and staid their march. And when as upon many of these troubles by the

the way, their ensignes were faine to stand, and forced to maintaine skirmish, some time with the horsemen; and sometimes with the light javellottiers and auxiliarie footmen, behold the legions also came on apace and overtook them. Then there was not so much fighting and resistance, as massacre and slaughter of them: downe they went with them and killed them like sheepe, so long, untill their leader himselfe began to flie, and escaped into the next mountaines, together with 7000 halfe naked and unarmed. All the rest were either slaine or taken prisoners. Then the Carthaginians began to encampe & fortifie in all hast & tumultuous sort, upon the highest mount they could find: from whence (by reason that the enemies had assailed in vaine to get up the hill, having so difficult an ascent) they had not so much adoe to defend themselves. But, the place being bare and naked, and disurnished of all commodities for their releefe, they were not able to hold out the siege for a few daies. And thereupon the souldiours fell apace to forsake their owne captaine, and to goe to the enemy. So that at the length the Generall himselfe, in the night season abandoned his armie, and having got shipping (for the sea was not farre off) he embarked and fled to Gades. Scipio being advertised that the captaine of his enemies was fled, left with Syllanus tenne thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen to continue the siege of the campe. Himselfe in person with the rest of his forces, within seventie daies returned to Taraccon, for to examine and heare incontinently upon his arrivall, the causes of the princes and States: that upon the true estimate of their desert, they might be rewarded or chastised accordingly.

After his departure, Masaniissa having had secret conference with Syllanus, about inducing his people also to bee pliable and to hearken unto a change, passed over into Affricke with some small retinue. At which present time verily, the occasion of his suddain alteration was not evident and apparent, as afterwards, his most constant truth and fast allegiance observed unto his dying day, was a good prooffe and argument, that even then he entred not into this designement and action, without good and important cause. Then Mago in those ships that Asdrubal had sent backe, passed over to Gades. The remnant, thus forlorne of their captaines, some by way of voluntarie yeelding and raunging themselves to the adverse part, others by flight, were scattered among the next cities, and no troupe remained of them behind, of any marke and reckoning to speake of, either for number or strength. In this manner, and by these means especially were the Carthaginians driven all out of Spaine, by the conduct and happie fortune of P. Scipio, in the thirteenth yeare of the warre, and in the sixt of Scipio his government in that province & command of the armie. And not long after Syllanus returned to Taraccon unto Scipio, and brought word, that the warre in Spaine was fully ended. And L. Scipio was sent with many noble persons captives, as a messenger to carrie tidings to Rome of the conquest of Spaine. And when al other tooke full contentment and infinite joy at these newes, and abroad in all places highly magnified the glorie of this service; he alone who was the man that did the deed (as one who had an insatiable desire of vertue and true honour) made but small reckoning of the recoverie and winning of Spaine, in comparison of those matters that hee hoped for, and conceived in that high and magnanimous spirit of his, which he carried with him. For now hee cast in his mind and aimed at the conquest of Affricke and great Carthage: and therewith, to make perfite and consummate that glorious warre, to his owne immortall honour and renowne. And therefore, supposing it was now a good time to begin the way to those high exploits, and to lay plots, to prepare beforehand, yea, and to win unto him the hearts of the princes and nations, hee determined first of all other to sound and assaile Syphax. This Syphax was king of the Masæsyli, a people bordering upon the Mores, and abutting upon that part of Spaine especially, where new Carthage is situate. At the same time the king was in league with the Carthaginians: which Scipio supposing that hee would observe no more surely and precisely, than commonly the Barbarians use, (whose fidelitie dependeth upon Fortune) sent C. Lælius with rich gifts and presents, as an Orator to treat with him. The barbarous prince was glad hereof, both because the Romans then prospered every where; and also the Carthaginians in Italie, lived by the losse; and in Spaine went downe to the ground, where they had nothing left: and therupon hee condescended to entertaine the friendship of the Romanes. But for the confirmation of this amitie, he neither would give nor take assurance, but onely in the personall presence of the Romane Generall himselfe. So Lælius having obtained the kings roiall word and warrant, that Scipio might come unto him with safe conduct and securitie, returned unto Scipio. Now for him that aspired to the conquest of Affricke, it was a matter

A matter of great consequence and importance in all respects, to make himselfe sure of Syphax, the most mightie and puissant king of all that land, who had aforetime made proote what the Carthaginians could doe in warre, and the confines and marches of whose kingdome lay sitly upon Spaine, and but a small arme of the sea betweene. Scipio thinking it therefore to be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwise it might not be) leaving for the defence and guard of Spaine L. Martius at Tarracon, and M. Syllanus at new Carthage, (whether hee had travelled by land from Tarracon, and taken great journeyes) himselfe and Lælius together, loosed from Carthage with two great Caravels of five bankes of oares, and passed over into Affricke, through the calme and still sea most what rowing, and otherwhile also making saile with a gentle gale of wind.

B Haply it so fell out that the very same time, Asdrubal driven out of Spaine, was entred the haven with seven gallies of three course of oares, and rid at anker neere unto the shore for to be set a land. When he had a kenning of the two Caravels aforesaid, which albeit no man doubted but they were enemies, and might have bene boured by them being more in number, before they could gaine the rode; yet hereupon ensued nothing else but a tumult and hurrey among the mariners and souldiours together, in vaine preparation of their ships and their armour. For the wind being somewhat big and high, drave the Caravels with full saile out of the maine sea into the haven, before that the Carthaginians had any time to wey anchor: neither durst any of them proceede to further dealing within the kings Rode. So Asdrubal first set ashore, and within a while Scipio and Lælius landed, and went all to the court. Syphax took this for a great honor done unto him (as indeed it was no lesse) that there were come unto him at that time, and in one day two Generall Captaines of two most mightie and puissant States, to sue for peace and amitie with him. He invited both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment; and since that it was their fortune to enter under one rouse and the same house for to be lodged in, hee indeavored to draw them to a parley, and to make an end of all quarels, grudges, and controversies betweene them. But Scipio denied flatly, that either there was any private malice or hatred betweene him and Asdrubal, that should need an end with conference and speech: and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a professed enemy, as touching them, without expresse warrant and commission from the Senate. But when the king laboured greatly with him, that he would find in his hart and not thinke much to beare Asdrubal companie at meate and meale (because he would not seeme to exclude either of them from his board) he yeelded thereunto, and was content. So they supped both twaine together with the king, and Scipio and Asdrubal late both at one table in one mesie, and upon one bed, for so it was the kings pleasure. But so courteously Scipio behaved himselfe (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carrie himselfe with a grace and dexteritie, in all things, and in every place wheresoever he came) that by his faire language and eloquent speech, he wan not only the favour of the barbarous prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Romane fashions) but also the goodwill and love of Asdrubal, a most malicious and mortall enemy: who seemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in presence personall, than for all his feats of armes atcheived in warre: and made no doubt but reckened fully that king Syphax and his realme would presently be at the devotion of the empire of Rome. Such a singular gift had that man to win love and favour. And therefore the Carthaginians were not so much to seeke how Spaine was lost, as to consider and thinke, how they might keepe and hold Affricke. For thus they conceived, That this noble knight and worthie Romane Captaine was not come thither wandering at adventure, nor as a traveller to see countries, and to solace himselfe with walking along the pleasant and delectable coasts, leaving the province which hee had newly subdued, leaving his armies which hee commanded, sailing thus with two ships onely into Affricke, and committing himselfe unto an enemy countrie, and into a kings hands, of whose fidelitie and protection he had no experience: but no doubt upon some great hopes to compasse the conquest of Affricke. And this was it that long since Scipio had in secret purpose and designement, this was it that openly he fretted & stormed at, namely, that he warred not himselfe as well in Spaine, as Asdrubal in Italie. Well, Scipio having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Affricke; and notwithstanding hee was tossed upon the sea with variable winds, and those for the most part boisterous and raging, yet upon the fourth day he arrived at new Carthage.

As Spaine generally was at peace and rest, for any Carthaginian warre, so it was well known, that that certaine particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of trespasses committed, were quiet for feare, rather than for any loiall allegiance. Of which the most notorious, as well for their owne greatnesse and power, as for their fault and transgression, were Illiturgum and Castulo. The Caltulonians who had bene Romane confederates in time of prosperitie, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the disseasure of the two Scipions and their armies. The Illiturgitanes besides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickednesse, in that they betrayed and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for succour after that overthrow. These two nations, if Scipio at his first comming had proceeded in rigor to revenge (whiles the States of the countrie stood in suspence) he should have regarded their desert more than his own good & commoditie. But when all troubles were composed & reduced to quietnesse, he thought it then a convenient time to punish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Martius from Taron, with a third part of his forces, and sent him to assaile Castulo. Himselfe with the rest of the armie, marched toward Illiturgum, and within five daies presented himself before it. The gates he found shut against him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their conscience bare them witnesse what they had deserved, & there needed no other defiance or intimation of warre against them, than the privitie of their wicked fact. Hereupon Scipio tooke occasion to exhort his souldiours, and began in this wise. The very Spaniards themselves, quoth he, by shutting their gates, declare plainly what they justly are to feare: and therefore ye ought to war with them in more hostile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians. For with them the quarell was maintained, as it were, without anger and rankor, only for soveraigntie and glorie: but of these men ye are to take vengeance for their disloyall treacherie, for their crueltie and wicked villanie. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of your fellow souldiers, but also the like falshood prepared for your selves, in case your hap had bene to have fled for refuge thither at any time: yea, and to shew exemplarie justice, to reach all posteritie, that no man hereafter be so hardie as to wrong any citizen or souldier of Rome, in what poore estate so ever he be, without feare of condigne punishment. Vpon this exhortation and comfortable words of the Generall, they bestirred themselves, and devided the skaling ladders amongst certaine choise men out of every companie. And having so parted the armie betwene them, that L. Atilius the Licutenant had the conduct of the one halfe, they gave assault with great terrour unto the citie in two places at once. But neither any one generall captaine, nor many principall citizens encouraged and harmed the townesmen manfully to defend their citie, but only their owne fearefull and sinfull conscience: for they wist well and remembered, yea and put one another in mind, that it was their punishment and not victorie that the Romanes sought for. And as for them selves, since they were to keepe their lives, this was the only point that they were to consider upon, namely, where they were best to die, whether in fight and in the field (where the fortune of battaile was common, and oftentimes lifted up the conquered, and put downe the conquerour) or after their citie burnt and rased, to yeeld up their breath in the sight of their wives and children taken captives, amid the torments of whipping and hard yrons, when they had endured all villanies & indignities. Whereupon not only the serviceable youth for war, not only men I say, but women also and children, even above the bodily strength of that age, or courage of that sexe, were readie and presented themselves to defend the walls. Some brought wepons to the defendants, others caried stones up to the wals unto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they stood not upon their libertie alone, which whetted the stomacks of valiant & magnanimous men only, but they set before their eyes all extremities of torture and punishment, yea and the shamefullest death that could be devised: and their hearts were incensed to undergo all paines & peril, by striving avie together, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much as they stood to it, and fought so resolutely, that even that noble armie which had subdued all Spaine, tooke the repulse often times at the hands of the youth of one citie, was driven from the walls, and finally to their honor received some foile in fight and began to feare. Scipio seeing that, and doubting least upon so many bootlesse attempts the enemies might take heart, and his own souldiers be tainted, thought good to enter himselfe personally into the action, and to take part in that dangerous service. Having rebuked therefore his men for their cowardise, he commaunded the ladders to be brought and set to, threatening that himselfe would skale the walls, if the rest made hasting and thus drew backe. With that he made no more ado, but approached under the walls in great perill of his person. Whereupon

A the souldiers respecting the dangerous state of their Generall, and fearing greatly on his behalfe, set up a shout on all hands, and began to reare ladders in many places at once. L. Atilius likewise on the other side plied the assault and gave not over. Then at last the townesmen, for all their resolute resistance, were overcome; the defendants overthrowne and beaten from their standing, and the walls possessed by the enemies. The castle also on that side which was thought imprenable, was in that brunt and tumult taken. For there were certaine Africanes serving then among the Romanes (fled before from the enemy) who whiles the townesmen were wholie turned to defend those places that seemed to be exposed unto danger, and the Romanes climbing and entring where they could, espied one part of the citie much higher than the rest; which because it was compassed about with an exceeding high rock, was neither fortified otherwise with bulwarks, nor manned with any defendants at all: and being men (as they all are) light and deliver of bodie, and nimble by reason of much practise and exercise, they climbed up the rock where they could meete with any crag thereof to beare our unequally from the rest, and to yeeld them hold and footing: but when they came to a plumbe upright steepe place, and where thecliffe was even and smooth, they fastned certaine great yron spikes and nailes, which they caried about with them of purpose, and stuck them a prety distance asunder, like greeces and staires to climb upon: and ever the foremost pluckt him up by the hand that followed next, and the hinmost heaved up those that went before them, until they were gotten up to the top: and then they ran downe with an outcry into the citie, which was already won by the Romanes. Then it was well seene that they forced this citie for very despitous anger and deepe hatred. There was not one that thought of taking any prisoners alive, there was none that once minded any pillage, notwithstanding all lay open unto them for to be ransacked and rifled. But downe they went with the unarmed as well as the armed, killing men and women one with another: nay their cruell moode was such, as they spared not the sucking babes. Then they set fire on their houses; and what the fire saved they rased and pulled downe: so cancred a mind they had, and so bent they were, to leave no monument and token of such a citie, and utterly to abolish and roote out the memoriall of those enemies.

After this, Scipio led his armie against Castulo. This citie was defended not only by Spaniards who thether were repaired out of other parts, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginian armie, which were skattered abroad in their flight, and thither fled. But ere Scipio was come before the towne, they had heard the newes of the wofull calamitie and destruction of the Illiturgitanes; by reason whereof they were all terrified and in despaire of themselves: and as it falleth out in such varietie of causes and deserts, every man sought meanes to shift for himselfe the best he could, without regard of his neighbour. And at first they began to have a secret jealousie and suspicion one of another, but afterwards they brake out to open dissention: in so much as the Carthaginians and Spaniards devided themselves, and parted asunder. Cerdubellus openly advised the Spaniards, and perswaded with them, to yeeld. Himilco was the captaine over the Auxiliarie Carthaginians, whom Cerdubellus (upon promise secretly before made, and protection granted) betrayed, together with the whole citie besides, into the Romanes hands. This victorie was pursued with lesse crueltie: for neither was the offence on their behalfe committed, so heinous; and the heate and choler of the Romanes was well cooled and allayed, by reason of their voluntarie surrender. From thence was Martius sent against other of the barbarous people, to reduce unto subjection and obedience, as many as yet were not fully subdued.

Scipio returned to new Carthage to pay his vowes unto the gods, and to exhibit and set out a spectacle of sword-plaiers at sharp, which he had prepared for the honor of his father and uncle deceased. This pastime & solemne shew was not performed by those kind of men, out of which maisters of fence use ordinarily to make choise, namely, such as were picked out of bond-slaves and freed men, that use to make sale of their blood for monie: but all those that he employed in combat, were such as offered themselves and their service voluntarie and without hire. For some were sent unto him from the LL. of the country, to make shew and proove of the valour ingrafted naturally in that nation: others of their owne accord professed to fight, for the love of the Generall himselfe, and to shew him pleasure: And some there were againe, who upon emulation of glorie were drawn to make chauge, whiles others that were defied refused not, but strove to get the victorie. There were also divers that determined those controversies by the sword, which by arguing and pleading they either were not able or not willing to end: having agreed that certaine particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of trespasses committed, were quiet for feare, rather than for any loiall allegiance. Of which the most notorious, as well for their owne greatnesse and power, as for their fault and transgression, were Illiturgum and Castulo. The Caltulonians who had bene Romane confederates in time of prosperitie, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the disseasure of the two Scipions and their armies. The Illiturgitanes besides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickednesse, in that they betrayed and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for succour after that overthrow. These two nations, if Scipio at his first coming had proceeded in rigor to revenge (whiles the States of the countie stood in suspense) he should have regarded their desert more than his own good & commoditie. But when all troubles were composed & reduced to quietnesse, he thought it then a convenient time to punish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Martius from Taron, with a third part of his forces, and sent him to assaile Castulo. Himselfe with the rest of the armie, marched toward Illiturgum, and within five daies presented himself before it. The gates he found shut against him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their conscience bare them witnesse what they had deserved, & there needed no other defiance or intimation of warre against them, than the privitie of their wicked fact. Heereupon Scipio tooke occasion to exhort his souldiours, and began in this wise, The very Spaniards themselves, quoth he, by shutting their gates, declare plainly what they justly are to feare: and therefore ye ought to war with them in more hostile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians. For with them the quarell was mainteined, as it were, without anger and rankor, only for soveraigntie and glorie: but of these men ye are to take vengeance for their disloyall treacherie, for their crueltie and wicked villanie. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of your fellow souldiers, but also the like fallhood prepared for your selves, in case your hap had bene to have fled for refuge thither at any time: yea, and to shew exemplarie justice, to teach all posteritie, that no man hereafter be so hardie as to wrong any citizen or souldier of Rome, in what poore estate so ever he be, without feare of condigne punishment. Vpon this exhortation and comfortable words of the Generall, they bestirred themselves, and devided the skaling ladders amongst certaine choise men out of every companie. And having fo parted the armie betwene them, that L. Calpurnius the Lieutenant had the conduct of the one halfe, they gave assault with great terrour unto the citie in two places at once. But neither any one generall captaine, nor many principall citizens encouraged and harmed the townesmen manfully to defend their citie, but only their owne fearefull and sinfull conscience: for they wist well and remembered, yea and put one another in mind, that it was their punishment and not victorie that the Romanes sought for. And as for them selves, since they were to leese their lives, this was the only point that they were to consider upon, namely, where they were best to die, whether in fight and in the field (where the fortune of battaile was common, and oftentimes lifted up the conquered, and put downe the conquerour) or after their citie burnt and rased, to yeeld up their breath in the sight of their wives and children taken captives, amid the torments of whipping and hard yrons, when they had endured all villanies & indignities. Whereupon not only the serviceable youth for war, not only men I say, but women also and children, even above the bodily strength of that age, or courage of that sexe, were readie and presented themselves to defend the walls. Some brought wepons to the defendants, others caried stones up to the wals unto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they stood not upon their libertie alone, which whereth the stomacks of valiant & magnanimous men only, but they set before their eyes all extremities of torture and punishment, yea and the shamefulest death that could be devised: and their harts were incensed to undergo all paines & peril, by striving avie together, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much as they stood to it, and fought so resolutely, that even that noble armie which had subdued all Spaine, tooke the repulse often times at the hands of the youth of one citie, was driven from the wals, and finally to their honor received some foile in fight and began to feare. Scipio seeing that, and doubting least upon so many bootlesse attempts the enemies might take heart, and his own souldiers be tainted, thought good to enter himselfe personally into the action, and to take part in that dangerous service. Having rebuked therefore his men for their cowardise, he commaunded the ladders to be brought and set to, threatening that himselfe would skale the wals, if the rest made hastening and thus drew backe. With that he made no more ado, but approached under the wals in great perill of his person. Whereupon

A the souldiers respecting the dangerous state of their Generall, and fearing greatly on his behalfe, set up a shout on all hands, and began to reare ladders in many places at once. L. Calpurnius likewise on the other side plied the assault and gave not over. Then at last the townesmen, for all their resolute resistance, were overcome; the defendants overthrowne and beaten from their standing, and the wals possessed by the enemies. The castle also on that side which was thought imprenable, was in that brunt and tumult taken. For there were certaine Africanes serving then among the Romanes (fled before from the enemy) who whiles the townesmen were wholie turned to defend those places that seemed to be exposed unto danger, and the Romanes climbing and entring where they could, espied one part of the citie much higher than the rest; which because it was compassed about with an exceeding high rock, was neither fortified otherwise with bulwarks, nor manned with any defendants at all: and being men (as they all are) light and deliver of bodie, and nimble by reason of much practise and exercise, they climbed up the rock where they could meete with any crag thereof to heare out unequally from the rest, and to yeeld them hold and footing: but when they came to a plumbe upright steepe place, and where the cliffe was even and smooth, they fastned certaine great yron spikes and nailes, which they caried about with them of purpose, and stuck them a prety distance asunder, like greeces and staires to climb upon: and ever the foremost pluckt him up by the hand that followed next, and the himmost heaved up those that went before them, until they were gotten up to the top: and then they ran downe with an outcry into the citie, which was already won by the Romanes. Then it was well scene that they forced this citie for very despitous anger and C deepe hatred. There was not one that thought of taking any prisoners alive, there was none that once minded any pillage, notwithstanding all lay open unto them for to be ransacked and rifled. But downe they went with the unarmed as well as the armed, killing men and women one with another: nay their cruell moode was such, as they spared not the sucking babes. Then they set fire on their houses; and what the fire saved they rased and pulled downe: so cancred a mind they had, and so bent they were, to leave no monument and token of such a citie, and utterly to abolish and roote out the memoriall of those enemies.

After this, Scipio led his armie against Castulo. This citie was defended not only by Spaniards who thether were repaired out of other parts, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginian armie, which were skattered abroad in their flight, and thither fled. But ere Scipio was come D before the towne, they had heard the newes of the wofull calamitie and destruction of the Illiturgitanes; by reason whereof they were all terrified and in despaire of themselves: and as it falleth out in such varietie of causes and deserts, every man sought meanes to shift for himselfe the best he could, without regard of his neighbour. And at first they began to have a secret jealousy and suspicion one of another, but afterwards they brake out to open dissention: in so much as the Carthaginians and Spaniards devided themselves, and parted asunder. Cerdubellus openly advised the Spaniards, and persuaded with them, to yeeld. Himilco was the captaine over the Auxiliarie Carthaginians, whom Cerdubellus (upon promise secretly before made, and protection granted) betrayed, together with the whole citie besides, into the Romanes hands. This victorie was pursued with lesse crueltie: for neither was the offence on their behalfe committed, so heinous; and E the hate and choler of the Romanes was well cooled and allayed, by reason of their voluntarie surrender. From thence was Martius sent against other of the barbarous people, to reduce unto subjection and obedience, as many as yet were not fully subdued.

Scipio returned to new Carthage to pay his vows unto the gods, and to exhibit and set out a spectacle of sword-plaies at sharp, which he had prepared for the honor of his father and uncle deceased. This pastime & solemne shew was not performed by those kind of men, out of which maisters of fence use ordinarily to make choise, namely, such as were picked out of bond-slaves and freed men, that use to make sale of their blood for monie: but all those that he employed in combat, were such as offered themselves and their service voluntarie and without hire. For some were sent unto him from the ILL. of the country, to make shew and proofe of the valour F ingrafted naturally in that nation: others of their owne accord professed to fight, for the love of the Generall himselfe, and to shew him pleasure: And some there were againe, who upon emulation of glorie were drawn to make challenge, whiles others that were defied refused not, but strove to get the victorie. There were also divers that determined those controversies by the sword, which by arguing and pleading they either were not able or not willing to end: having agreed agreed between themselves that the matter in suite should fall to him that chanced to have the upper hand. And those were no meane persons of bale degree and parentage, but of noble descent and famous houses: as namely Corbis and Orfua, two [bretheren] cousin germanes by the father side; who differing and being at variance, about the principallitie of a citie and State which they call Ibes, made profession to trie the title at the utterance by dint of sword. Corbis was the elder of the twaine; but Orfua his father had bene the last Prince before, and received that Seignorie after the death of his elder brother. And when Scipio was very desirous to debate and decide the matter with words, and to appease their anger and moode, they both made answer and sayd, That they had denyed that to the common kinsfolke of either partie, and that they would have no other god nor man to be their judge, but only Mars. Both of them were fierce; the elder presuming of his strength of bodie, the yonger bearing himselfe upon the floure of his fresh youth: wishing rather to die both twaine in fight, than the one to be subject to the dominion of the other. In conclusion, when by no meanes possible they could bee reclaimed from this furious rage of theirs, they became a goodly shew and pageant to the whole armie, and a singular example to prove, what a mischievous maladie among mortal men, the love of lordship is, & the desire of soveraigntie. The elder, through practise of his weapons and cunning slight, soone overcame the foolhardinesse and inconsiderate fiercenes of the yonger. After this pastime of sword-fight, followed the funerall games and plaies: which were set forth magnificently, according as either the wealth of the province, or the furniture of the armie might affoord.

In this meane time, the Lieutenants plied and sped their businesse neverthelesse, according to their commissions: for Martius having passed the river Bætis (which the paisantes of that countie call Cirtius) received two most rich and wealthie cities, surrendered into their hands by composition, without any assault. Now, there was another citie called Astapa, which ever sided with the Carthaginians: and yet it deserved not so much anger and indignation in that regard, as for that, (setting aside the necessities that follow war) it ever bare a spitefull hatred against the Romanes: neither was the towne either for naturall situation so strongly feared, or by mans hand so surely fortified, that the inhabitants therein should take more hart, or presume the rather to be lustie and bold. But the naturall disposition of the people delighting in robberies, moved them to make rodes and invade the territorie of the allies of the people of Rome bordering upon them: and to catch and take prisoners any souldiours, skulians, jackies, and followers of the camp, or merchants of the Romanes, whom they could light upon ranging abroad. Yea & when there hapned a great companie of them together, to passe through their marches and confines, (for in no wise might a few travaile in safetie) they were surprisid by an ambusment laid for them, and being environned in a place of disadvantage, were slaine every man. When the armie was come before this towne to assault it, the townesmen carrying a guiltie conscience for offences committed, thought it not the safest course for themselves, to yeeld and give up the place to the enemies whom they had so much provoked against them: and seeing no hope at all to save their lives, either by the strength of their wals, or force of armes, they resolved to execute upon themselves, & those things that were nearest and dearest unto them, a foule, detestable, & cruell fact. They set out and appointed a compasse of ground within the market place, where they bestowed and laid on an heape the most precious goods that they had. Upon which they commanded their wives and children to sit, and then they piled about them billets of wood, and laid taggots upon, of small young twigs. And after this they gave in charge to sittie lustie tall fellows armed, That so long as the battaile continued doubtfull, they should defend and guard all their goods, and the bodies of those persons more deere unto them, than all the goods in the world: but in case they perceived their owne side to goe downe and have the worse, and the citie at the point to be lost, they should then wote well and bee assured, that all they whom they sawe going forth to battaile, would surely loose their lives in that very fight and medley. And herewith they besought them in the name of the gods both celestiall and infernall, to bee mindfull of their libertie, which that day was to take an end, either by honorable death or shameful servitude: and to suffer nothing to remain, upon which the enemy in his furious anger might exercise his cruelty: and considering they had both fire and sword in their hands to do the deed, to let those friendly and faithfull hands, consume and dispatch the things which were sure to bee lost and perish, rather than the proud enemies insult over them, and make a scorn of them. To these exhortations

A hortations they adjoynd a fearefull and horrible curse, to as many as either for hope of life, or upon timoroufnes of hart and fear of death, should alter their mind and resolution. Whereupon all at once they rushed out of the gates set wide open, and with a mightie tumult & shout, made a fallie. Now there was no set guard and station of any force opposed to resist them, because the enemies feared nothing lesse, than that they durst once issue forth of the gates. Some few troupes of horse and the light armour, of a suddaine were sent out of the campe to make head, and they encountered them. Betwene whom there was a skirmish hoter and sharper in regard of courage and violence, than well ordered by any skill and good government. And therefore the horsemen were discomfited, that first presented themselves against the enemy, yea and put the light armed footmen also in great feare. And surely they had proceeded to have fought even under the very rampier, but that the maine strength of the legions, who had but very small time to be marshalled and arraigned, put themselves in array & came into the field. And yet for all that, they were distressed for a while about the ensignes, by reason that they ran as blind as mad men in their furious fit, and as bold as witlesse fooles for want of offence, even upon the sword & their own deaths. But afterwards, the old experienced souldiours, having stilly stood out against the first rash brunt and violent shock of the enemies, yea and killed the formost, bridled & staid the rage of those that seconded them: & when they assaied within a while after, to enter forward themselves & break in upon them, & saw none of them to give one foot of ground, but every one resolute to die in the very place where he stood, they opened their battaile in the mids (a thing that they might easilie do, considering the multitude of their souldiours) compassed and environned the wings of their enemies, who fighting round in a ring, unto the last man were slaine every one. Thus were they that were in armes and made resistance manfully, dealt withall by their enemies according to the rigor of warre, and in the angrie mood of souldiours; and such was their end. But within the citie there was fouler worke, and a more cruell butcherie & carnage committed, when the feeble unarmed and naked multitude of women and children were murdred by their owne neighbours and citizens: who having set the foresaid pile of wood on fire, fell to massacre them, and flung their bodies when they were but halfe dead, into the light fire under them; so as their streames of blood gushing out of their veines, were readie to quench the flame beginning to breake forth. And in the end, when they themselves were even wried with the pittifull slaughter of their own friends, they cast themselves armour and all into the mids of the said fire. When this massacre was done and ended, the Romanes entred the citie with victorie. And at the first sight of this monstrous object, they wondered for a while & stood astonied. But afterwards, when they saw the gold and silver glittering within the heape among other goods, they were readie and desirous (as the nature of man is greedie of such things) to rake and pull the same out of the fire: but some of them were caught with the flame and burnt; others flashed and halfe senged with the hote steem of the vapour and breath issuing from the light fire, such (I meane) as were formost, and could not retrieve themselves backe, by reason of the exceeding prease behind, that thrust them still forward. Thus Astapa was destroyed by fire and sword, and yeelded no pillage to the enemies. And when Martius had all the rest of that countie yeelded unto him for feare of force, he led backe his victorious armie to Carthage unto Scipio.

About the very same time, there came from Gades certaine fugitive rennegates, promising E. to betray the garrison of the Carthaginians lying there, and likewise the captaine of the garison, together with the navie. Now had Mago rested there after his flight, and having gathered together the ships in the Ocean, levied and raised certaine aids, as well beyond the narrow seas along the coast of Africke, as also out of the parts of Spaine next adjoyning unto him, and all by the meanes of captaine Hanno. When as betwene the Romanes and those fugitives, there had passed faithfull promise and securitie to and fro, both Martius was sent thither with certaine squadrons and companies lightly appointed; and also Laelius with 7 Triremes [of three banks of oars] and one great galie of five, for to warre joyntly together by common counsell, as well by sea as land. Scipio himselfe lay sicke of a grievous maladie, but much worse by report than it was, by reason that every one (as men commonly have a desire and delight, to foster and multiply rumours for the nonce) made ever somewhat of his owne head, and put it to the rest of the newes that hee heard, which brought the province out of frame and caused great disorder, especially in the most remote parts thereof: whereby it was well seene, what a world of troubles would have ensued upon some calamitie indeed, when a vaine rumour onely, was able to raise such stormes and tempests.

For neither the Allies continued loiall in their alleageance, nor the armie dutifull in their wonted obedience. Mandonius and Indibilis, who made full account of the whole kingdome of Spaine now that the Carthaginians were driven out and expelled, seeing nothing answerable to their hope and expectation, and themselves disappointed of their designements, raised the peasannts and inhabitants of their owne countries (and those were the Laetanes) and solicited the youth of the Celtiberians: the countrie also of the Suesitanes and Sederitanes, that were confederate States with the people of Rome, they wasted in all manner of hostilitie. Besides, there arose a civile mutinie and dissention within the campe at Sucro; where there lay eight thousand souldiours, as a guard and garison for all the nations that inhabit on this side Iberus. Whose heads were set aworke, and began to bee busie not at that time when doubtfull and suspicious rumours were spread of their Generall, how he was in daunger of death, but long before, upon a licentious course of life that they had taken to, (as commonly it falleth out upon long rest and ease) and so much the rather, for that now in time of peace they were held in, more streightly and neerely, who before were used in their enemies land, during the warres, to breake out in a more loose manner, and to live upon rapine and robbetrie. At the first they began to mutter and whisper secretly these and such like speeches: If there be warre still in the province of Spaine, what do we here among peaceable people? And if the warre be ended, and the time of the commision come out and expired, why are wee not had againe backe into Italie? Then they proceeded to demand their pay very malapertly, and more saucely than might stand with the dutie & modestie of souldiours: yea, and the Sentinels and corps de guara would not stick to give reprochfull terms and taunting words to the Tribunes or Marshalls, when they went the round: and some of them made no bones to enter by night into the peaceable territorie about them, for to fetch in booties and prizes; untill at length openly at noone day, they departed from their colours without passport and licence. All things they did, as transported and carried away with lust and selfwill of souldiours, not guided by the order and discipline of warfare, nor directed by the commandement and government of their captaines and rulers. Neverthelesse, there was retained still a forme of Romane campe among them: and that upon this onely hope that the souldiours had of the Tribunes aforesaid; whome they supposed in time would come to the bent of their bow, enter into the same furious courses, and have their hand in their mutinies, & follow them in their rebellion: and therefore they were well content with them to sit judicially in Marshall court, in the usuall place of Principia, to minister law and execute justice: also to call for the watchword & signall of them, yea, and orderly to goe to their watch and ward in their course and duetimes. And whereas in very deed they had cast off all reverence and obedience of government, yet they would seeme to shew a kind of loiall and dutifull diligence; in that (forsooth) they would be commaunders of themselves, and keepe some order without constraint. But in the end the mutinie broke out into open sedition: namely, when they perceived once, that the Tribunes misliked and reproved their doings, and endeavoured to crosse their designs, yea, and denied flatly and openly to take part with them in their follies and furious outrages. Whereupon they dispossessed the Tribunes of their judiciall places in the Principia, yea, and dispossessed them quite of all rume in the campe, and by a generall consent conferred the soveraine rule upon two common souldiours, the chieftains of this their seditious commotion, C. Albinus Calenus, and C. Atrius Vmber. Who not contented with the *markes and ornaments of the Tribunes, were so bold as to handle the rods and axes, even the very roiall ensignes of soveraigne rule; never thinking how those knitches of rods, and axes sticking within them, which they caused to bee borne afore them to the feare of others, were readie to light upon themselves, to scourge their backs and sides; and to chop off their owne heads not long after. The supposed death of Scipio, whereupon they vainely built, was it that blinded their wits and minds: upon the rumour whereof, being already noised abroad, they had no doubt, but all Spaine generally would be up in armes. In which garboile and hurlyburly, they made reckoning, that they might levie monies of the confederate States, and spoile and pill the cities neere unto them. And amid these troubles, when all were in an uprore, and every man would venture to doe every thing at his pleasure, then they supposed their owne deeds and actions would bee lesse espied and marked. Now when as they looked every day still to heare fresh newes, not of his death onely, but also of his funerals; and seeing there came none at all, but rather, that the former tidings were checked, and proved but a flying tale without head or foot, then they began to make semblance of enquiring after, and seeking out the first authors who raised those false reports: then they seemed to bee angry also and offended with them, to the end, that they forsooth might bee thought rather to have beleevied things inconsiderately, than to have devised such a matter themselves purposely. These leaders and captains thus disappointed and abandoned, began now to dread and stand in horror of their owne ensignes of magistracie that were carried before them, and in steed of that imaginarie rule which they usurped, they feared greatly, that the very edge indeed of the true and lawfull power of authoritie would bee shortly turned upon them. As the sedition was thus dashed, by occasion, that it was credible and for certaine reported, first, That Scipio was living; and within a while after, that hee was recovered and in health: there came seven Tribunes or Colonels, sent from Scipio himselfe. At whose first arrivall at the campe, the souldiours grew more angry and waspish than before: but anone upon faire words and speeches, wherewith the Colonels entertained those of their acquaintance, with whome they had communication, they were well contented and appeased. For first they went about to their pavilions from one to another, and afterwards to the Principia and the Pretorium, where they happened to spie some knots of souldiours met together and talking one with another; and so spake unto them, as if they rather questioned with them what the cause should be of their anger and suddaine commotion, than blamed them, or laid any action to their charge. The reason commonly pretended, was this, That their wages was not duly paid at the day. Besides they alleadged, That whereas at the same time, when upon the trecherous fact of the Illiturgitanes, there followed the losse and death of two Generals, and the defeature of their two armies, they by their vertue had defended the Romane name and honour, and likewise kept the province to their behoofe, the Illiturgitanes had indeed received a condigne guerdon for their offence and trespassse, but there was none that had requited and recompenced them for their good service accordingly. Beleeve mee (say they againe) your complaints are just, and requests reasonable, and wee will make relation thereof to the Lord General: and glad wee are in our hearts, that it is no worse, and that the case is no more incurable than it is: for God bee thanked, P. Scipio and the Commonweale, are both sufficient, and also willing to make you amends for all.

But Scipio, a man though used to the wars, yet altogether unacquainted with storms of soldiors mutinies, was much troubled in spirit and perplexed, for feare the armie might exceed measure in transgressing, or himselfe passe his bounds in punishing. For the present, he thought good to deale gently with them still, as hee had begun, and sent abroad the collectors about the Tributarie cities to gather up the revenues, thereby to put them in good hope of pay, and that with speed. And hereupon there went out an edict and proclamation, that they should repaire to Carthage, there to call for their wages, either by companies apart one after another, or altogether in generall, whether they would themselves.

And now by this time, the suddain pacification of the Spaniards that were about to rebell, stilled the sedition of the souldiours quite, which of itselfe begun to coole and slake already. For Mandonius and Indibilis, after it was reported that Scipio was alive and livelike, gave over their enterprize, and were retired againe within their confines. So as now the souldiours had neither citizen nor forreiner, to take part with them in their folly & furious rage. And when they had cast about what course to take & what shift to make, they found no other evasion, but the most common refuge and retreat of all lewd counsels and bad designments, even to commit themselves either to the just wrath of their Generall, or else to his clemencie and mercie, whereof they were not past all hope, and in utter dispaire. For why? he had pardoned even the very enemies, with whom he had fought in battaile. And as for their mutinie, it was as yet without bloudshed, and no hurt done: and as it selfe was not cruel and outrageous, so it had deserved no extream & rigorous punishment: thus reasoned they and comforted themselves, as naturally men are too too prompt and eloquent, to extenuate, to palliate and cloke their owne faults, more ywis than they should. This was their onely doubt, whether they were better to go by cohorts and squadrons, or all at once to demand their pay. In the end they were of opinion, that the safer way was to go all in one train. At the very same time, whiles they among themselves laid their heads thus together in the camp, there was a Counsell held at new Carthage about them, and much dispute there was, and varietie of opinions, whether they should proceed against the heads and chieftaines only of the seditious (who were in number not above five and thirtie) or by cutting off the greater sort, to punish this so odious example and president, of a rebellion rather than a mutinie.

But

But the milder sentence tooke place, namely, that from whence the offence began, there the punishment should rest. And for the multitude, some chastisement and rebuke was sufficient for their correction. When the Counsell was dismissed and broken up, to the end that it might be thought abroad that they fate about nothing els but this which they pretended, they published an edict throughout all the armie in Carthage, for an expedition or journey against Mandonius and Indibilis; and gave commandement to make provision of victuals for certaine daies. And those seven Tribunes, who had before gone to Suero for to appease the mutinie there, were now sent to meet that armie againe: and the names being given them of five of the principall authors of the foresaid tumult, they had a direction unto certaine meet persons for the purpose, to shew them good countenance, to speake faire unto them, and courteously to invite them home to their houses, and afford them kind and friendly entertainment; and after they had made them good cheere and brought them to bed, to take them being fast asleepe upon their liberall drinking of wine, and to bind them sure hand and foote. Now when they were not farr off from Carthage, they understood by those whom they met and encountered upon the way, that all the whole armie, was the next day following to set forth against the Lacetanes: which tidings not only rid them of all feare, which secretly surprised and possessed their minds, but also made them exceeding glad and joyous, for that they supposed their Generall being now left alone without the forces, they might do with him what they would themselves, rather than be at his commaundement and devotion. And about sunne-setting they entred the citie, and perceived the other armie providing and making all readie for the voiage above named. Received they were and welcomed with gentle words, devised and framed of purpose: namely, That the L. Generall tooke great joy and contentment for that they were come so jult before the setting out of the other armie: and so they went to repose and make much of themselves. And without any sturre and tumult at all, the ringleaders of the fedition, were by the meanes of those Tribunes entertained and lodged in the houses of certaine persons of good havior, and meet for that purpose, and there apprehended and imprisoned. At the releefe of the fourth watch, the cariages of that armie, whose expedition was pretended, began to set forward on the journey: and somewhat before day the standards and ensignes advanced, but the whole armie was detained and stayed at the gates, and certaine warders sent to keepe all the passages and wayes, that no man should go forth of the citie. Then were those fouldiours who came the day before summoned to an audience: and they ran boldly into the market place to the Tribunal of the Generall, as if with their outcries and clamours they would have put him in some feare and dread of them. And at one time, both the L. Generall himselfe in person ascended up the Tribunal, and with all the armed fouldiers were brought againe from the gate, and enclosed round about at their backs the unarmed multitude gathered together to heare an Oration. Then were they daunted, as lustie as they were before, and all their courage cooled: and (as they confessed afterwards themselves) nothing terrified them so much, as the helthfull strength and fresh colour of the L. Generall, beyond all their expectation, whom they thought verily to have found sick and crasy: yea and his countenance and face so vigorous and courageous, as they never remembered to have seene him so lustie in any battaile before. For a while he fate still and said never a word, untill he was advertised that the chieftaines of the mutinie were brought into the place, and all things els in readinesse. Then after silence made by an Oyez of the cryer, in this wise he began and said.

The Oration of
T. Servius to his mutinious fouldiers.

I would never have beleevd that I should have wanted words and proper language unto mine owne armie: not because I have exercised my selfe at any time rather to make eloquent speeces than to manage valiant actions, but for that being alwaies from mine infancie almost trained up in the camp, I have bene acquainted with the natures and humors of fouldiers. But in what manner I should speake unto you, neither my wits will give me advise, nor my tongue afford me utterance: you, I say, whome I wot not so much as by what name to call. Should I terme you citizens, who have revolted from your native cuntry? or fouldiers, who have renounced your Generall, refused to be under his commaund, his charge and government, and made no conscience to breake the oth of your allégeance? Last of all, should I give you the name of enemies? Now surely, me thinks I agnise the bodies, the faces, the apparell and habit of mine owne naturall citizens: but contrarywise, I see plainly the deeds, the words, the intents, and minds of arrant enemies. For what have ye either wished or hoped for els, but the Illegers and

A and the Lacetanes have done the like? And yet I must needs say, that they had to follow for their captaines in their outrage, Mandonius and Indibilis, two Princes of royall bloud: whereas you imposed the soveraigne commaund & government upon Vmber Atrius, & Calenus Albinus, two base companions. Denie now hardly if you will, that you all either were in the action, or willing in the intention. Verily I can easily beleve you in so disavowing, and namely, that all this proceeded from the folly of some few brainfick fellows among you. For the trespasses committed of that qualitie & consequence, that if the whole armie were therein culpable, the expiation and purging thereof could not be procured without great sacrifices and exquisite punishments. Full against my will I touch these points, as sores and gals that will not abide the rubbing: but unlesse they be touched & handled too, they cannot possibly be cured and healed. I assure you, for mine owne part, I thought verily that when the Carthaginians were driven out of Spaine, there was neither place nor person throughout the whole province, that had envied my life and health: such hath bene my cariage, and so have I demeaned my selfe not onely with Allies, but also with enemies. But see, how much I have bene deceived! Even in mine owne campe, the newes of my death was not onely received with joy, but expected also with a longing desire. I speake not this, that I would have any man to imagin that I conceive, how all in generall are guiltie of this fact (for if I were persuaded in my mind, that my whole armie wished my death, I would heere dye presently before your eyes; for what good would my life doe me, repined of my fouldiours and fellow citizens?) But the multitude of every people is like the seas in nature; which of themselves are unmoveable and stirre not: as the winds blow, as the gales goe and come, so are they either calme or troublesome and unquiet: and even so the cause and source of all this furie and outrage, is in some few heads and leaders. As for you, yee have caught the infection from them, and played the foolles with them for companie. Certesse, I am thus persuaded of you this day, that yee know not yet, to what enormous height of follie yee have proceeded; what mischievous act yee were entred into against mine owne person; what you attempted against your native cuntry, your wives and children; what you enterprised against the gods and witnesses of your loiall oath; what ye have done against the sacred auspices and happie fortune, under which yee have served in warfare; what yee have committed against the custome and law of warre, against the discipline of your auncestours; and finally, how prejudiciall and offensive your designs have bene against the soveraigne majestie of the Roman empire. As for my selfe, I am willing to say nothing: content I am to thinke, that yee rather gave credit to my death rashly and inconsiderately, than hearkened thereto willingly and greedily. And it may be, that I have so behaved my selfe, that no wonder it is, if mine armie bee wearie of me and of my government. But what harme hath your cuntry deserved at your hands, which to betray, yee should complot with Mandonius and Indibilis? How hath the people of Rome offended you, that you have deprived the Kn. Marshals and Colonels created by the voices of the people, of their lawfull rule and authoritie, and conferred the same upon private persons? And being not therewith contented, to have and acknowledge them for your Colonels; you, even you the armie of the Romanes, have taken the knitches of rods belonging onely to the General, and bestowed them upon those, that never kept so much as a bondslave of their owne to commaund. Albius and Atrius forsooth, set up their pavilions in that chiefe place of State in the campe, where the soveraigne magistrat ought to quarter: with them the trumpet sounded: from them the signall and watch-word was demanded: they sat as iudges in the Tribunal seat of Scipio the Pro-consull: upon them the Licours and Sergeants attended: for them they made way and voided the place, against they should go forth & march in their state: and before them were the rods borne, and the axes withall. When it raineth stones, when thunderbolts are shot, when lightnings flash from heaven, when beasts bring forth strange, uncouth, and monstrous young ones, contrarie to the course of nature, you take them for prodigious signes and fearefull tokens. Nay, this is a monstrous sight and wonder in deed, which by no sacrifices of beasts, by no supplications and praiers, can be purged and expiat, without the bloud of them that have committed so hainous a fact. And albeit no wicked crime can be founded upon any reason, yet wold I gladly know of you (as in a case that indeed should not bee once named and remembered) what was in your mind? what imagined you? and what was your designment? There was in times past a legion sent to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison. Traiterously & villanously they murdered the principall citizens there, and for ten yeares space possessed and kept that wealthie town to their owne beloufe. For this notorious and beaſtly fact, the whole legion, even foure thousand men and no fewer, were in the market place of Rome beheaded every one. And yet they at the first followed not for their captaine Atrius Vmber, one little better than a launder, skullican, and follower of the campe, a man of an unluckie and unfortunate name, but Decius Iulbellus a Tribune or Kn. Marshall: neither joynted they with Pyrhus, nor with the Samnites & Lucanes, professed enemies of the people of Rome. Whereas yee, have plotted in counsell, and ment to have banded in armes together with Mandonius and Indibilis. Their purpose was to have seated themselves for ever in Rhegium, like as before them the Campanes, who tooke Capua from the Tuskans, the old inhabitants: and the Mamertines likewise, who possessed themselves in Sicilie of Messana, and never minded to molest and make warre, either upon the people of Rome, or any of their allies and confederates. But tell me I pray you, intended yee to have made your continuall residence, H and to have dwelt at Sucro? where if I your Generall at my departure out of this province, when my time and commission was expired, should have left you behind me, yee might have cried out upon me, and called for vengeance to God and man, in regard of hard measure & wrong, offered unto you, in that yee might not be permitted to return home to your wives & children. But alas, wife & children were clean excluded out of your mind: & ye thought no more upon them, than of me or of your native countrie. Well, I will follow on still, and discourse upon your plot and designs, wicked & ungracious though they were, yet haply not altogether so foolish & foolish in the highest degree as may be supposed. Imagined yee being eight thousand men in number, (and say that yee were all of better account and reckoning than Albins and Atrius are, under whom ye submitted your selves) to have beene able for to defeat the people of Rome of the province of Spaine? so long as I lived, and the other armie stood sound and strong: wherewith in one day I forced new Carthage; with which I discomfited, put to flight, and chased out of Spaine, foure brave Generals, and as many puissant armies of the Carthaginians? But let that go by, and to lay aside my name, and to speake of no more abuse but this, that ye were very credulous and quickly beleevd that I was dead. How then? what if I were departed, this life, and gone indeed? Had the common-wealth together with me yeelded up her ghost? Would the maine state & empire of Rome have fallen to the ground with mee at once? Forfend (o Jupiter, almightie and most gracious) that ever a cittie founded first most happily, with the approbation of the gods, built eternally for ever to endure, should be compared and made bursequal with this fraile and mortall bodie of mine. Flaminus, Paulus, Gracchus, Posthumus Albinus, M. Marcellus, T. Quintus Crispinus, Cn. Fulvius, two Scipios, my father and uncle both, so many noble warriors and captaines, have bene slaine in this one warre; and they are dead & gone: yet the people of Rome continueth on foot and overlieth them, yea and shall still, when a thousand more of them shall die, either upon the edge of the sword, or upon some sickness or other. How should then the state of the people of Rome be entered and buried with the dead corps of mee, but one man and no more? Even you your selves (to go no farther to seeke examples) here in Spaine, when my father and uncle, two Generals, were killed, chose Septimius, Martius for your captaine, to lead against the Carthaginians, being in the ruffe and jolitic upon their fresh and late victorie. I speake now, as though if I had miscarried, Spaine had bene left destitute and without a Commander and Generall. M. Syllanus who was sent with me into the province, joined in the same commission and of equall authoritie; L. Scipio my brother, and C. Lelius, both Lieutenants generall: would these have sit still and done nothing? would these have failed to mainteine & recover the majestie of our empire? What? could yee have compared armie for armie, captaines for captaines with them? was either your reputation and credit, or your quarrell and cause comparable?

 And suppose that in all these regards, yee had bene superiour and gotten the vantage, would yee indeed with the Carthaginians, have born armes against your native countrie? against your fellow citizens? would ye in very truth, that Africke should have commanded Italie; and Carthage the citie of Rome? And for what demerit and great trespass, I pray you, that your countrie had committed? Coriolanus long ago, being wrongfully condemned and unworthily banished, seeing himself to live a miserable exiled man, was moved to take armes & to come against his coun-trie to assaile it. A private regard of love and naturall kindnesse, reclaimed him from publicke parricide. But what griefe of heart, what fit of anger hath incited and provoked you? See case your wages was paid later by some few daies, whiles your Generall lay sicke: was that a sufficient cause for you, to give defiance to your countrie, and proclaime open warre against it? was that

A that enough to cause you to revolt from the people of Rome, and turne to the Iltergetes? and to spare no lawe of God and man, but to breake all: and make shipwracke of conscience and common honestie? Now surely, souldiours, yee were out of your wits, and foolcs yee were in the highest degree. I was not my selfe farther out of frame nor sicker in bodie, than yee were in your mind and understanding. I tremble to thinke upon it and to rehearse, what folke be-leevd, what they hoped, what they wished. Let all bee forgotten and buried in oblivion, if it bee possible: if not, let us not speake of it yet, howsoever wee doe, but rake it up in deep silence. I cannot denie, but my words have seemed sharpe and bitter unto you, and all this my speech very rigorous. But how much more cruell thinke yee are your deeds, than my words tart and soure? And if ye deeme it reasonable, that I should beare and put up the things that ye have done; will ye not abide then, and take in good part, and patiently hear me to tell all that I can say? But these matters I will lay no more in your dish from henceforth; ye shall be checked no more for them.
 B Would God yee could as soone forget them, as I will put them out of my remembrance. And therefore as touching you all in generall, if ye repent and be displeased with your selves for your fault and folly, I shall be content, and thinke you punished to the full. But as for Albins Calenus and Atrius Vmber, with the rest of the authors of this cursed and detestable mutinie, they shall make amends for their trespass and transgression, even with their heart-bloud; and they shall surely die for it. The spectacle of their exemplarie punishment ought not to seeme unto you greivous and odious, but rather a pleasant and delectable sight, if ye have any grace in you, and be come again to your right wits. For their intent was to hurt and do mischeefe to no man alive, C more than to your selves.

He had scarce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given beforehand, there was presented to their eyes and eares a terrible and fearefull object on all sides.
 For the armie which had environned the assemblie round about, clattered their swords & bucklers together. The common crier was heard to cite byname all those that were condemned there, in the presence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and baled forth in the mids of them all, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the stake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benumbed they were all and astonied for feare, that were present at the sight hereof, that there was not heard amongst them all one shrewd and hard word, in misliking the rigour of the punishment, no nor D so much as one groane or secret sigh. Then their bodies were all drawne atone side, the place was made clean and purged, and all the soldiours were called by name, and before their Colonels and Kn. Marshalls, sware allegiance, and to be true souldiours unto Scipio. And every one, according as he answered to his name, had his wages truly paid. This was the issue and finall end of the sol-diours mutinie, which began at Sucro.

At the same time, captaine Hannosent by Mago from Gades with a small power of Africanes, solicited the Spaniards about the river Bætis for monie, to rebel and put in armes upon a foure thousand able men. But afterwards he was forced by L. Martius to quit his campe, and having lost the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the campe, yea, and some in the flight, whom the horsemen pursued in chase and slew as they ran stragling, himselfe with few E others escaped away. Whiles these things happened about the river Bætis, Lelius in the meane time having passed through the streights into the maine Ocean, arrived with his navie at Carteia. This is a citie standing on the sea coast bounding upon the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first openeth from the streights into the broad sea. Now there was some hope (as hath bene aforesaid) to gaine the citie of Gades without any assault, by treason, for as much as there came some into the Romane campe, that of themselves made offer and promise thereof.
 But the treason brake forth too soone, and was revealed before it was ripe, the conspiratours were all apprehended, and sent by Mago unto Adherball the Pretour, for to be conveyed to Carthage. And Adherball having embarked those traitours in a Caravell or Gallion of five bancks of oares, and sent her afore, because she was slower of faile than those of three bancks; himselfe F with eight three banked gallies, followed a pretie way after. The said Caravell of five course of oares, was not so soone entred the streights, but Scipio also being embarked in another Caravell of the same sort, made out of the haven of Carteia, with seven gallies of three ranckes of oares, and invested Adherball and the foresaid gallies: supposing verily, that the enemies Caravell being taken tardie in the very current, was not able against the tide to retire. Adherball being

being thus surpris'd on a suddaine, for a while stood in feare and doubt what to doe; whether hee had best to follow on after his own Caravell, or turn the prow and beaks of his galleies, and make head against the enimie. Thus whiles hee stood at a bay lingering, hee lost the opportunitie of shifting and avoiding a battell: for now they were come within the dart shot, and the enimies on every side were readie to charge. And the current was so strong, that they were not able to rule and manage their ships as they would. And the manner of fight was nothing at all like to a sea-battell, for as much as they could doe nothing to their mind, nothing by skill and dexterity, nothing by counsell & advise. The nature only of the narrow sea, the violence of the current was all in all, and ruled the conflict, driving the ships one against another, as well upon their own fellows as upon their enimies, notwithstanding they rowed and laboured what they could to the contrarie. So as, one while yee should see a ship that fled and scudded away, whirled about back again with a witness by the waves, upon those that had her in chase: and likewise another that seemed to follow and pursue after her enimie, if she happened once into a contrarie course of billowes, to turne top & taile, and seem to flie. And in the very conflict it so fell out, that when as one vessell ran with her beakehead full butt upon another, she was forced by waves to turne her side, and receive in her flank the push of her enimies. And contrariwise, when as one lay with her flank opposite to the enimie, suddainly all at once shee should wind and whirle againe upon her prow. As the galleies fought thus doubtfully together, hap hazard, at the pleasure and will of Fortune; the Romane Caravell (were it because of her weight shee was able to stand more stedie against the surging billowes, or by reason that shee had more rankes of oares that cut the waves, and so was more easily ruled) chanced to sinke two of the smaller galleies of the enimies; & running fast by one with a forcible violence, wiped away clean all the oares of one side, and had no doubt spoiled and marred all the rest that shee would have invested and charged upon, but that Atherball, with the other five made saile, and got over into Africke. Lelius having sailed backe to Carteia with victorie, and heard what had been done at Gades, namely, how the complot of betraying the island was disclosed, the conspirators sent bound unto Carthage, and consequently all their hope frustrate and turned to nothing upon which they came to Gades; dispatched messengers unto L. Martius, giving him to understand, That unless they meant still to lie before Gades, trifling out the time and doing no good, the best way was to returne unto Scipio the lord General: and so with the consent of Martius both of them within few daies repaired to Carthage. Upon whose departure Mago had not only a time to breath himselfe, being so frighted as he was with a duple fear both by land and sea; but also hearing that the Ilergetes were revolted, conceived some hope to recover Spaine again, & addressed his courriers to the Senat at Carthage: who by relating not only the civile mutinie that arose in the Roman campe, but also the rebellion of the confederats (& all by way of amplification and enforcing every thing to the highest degree) should encourage and exhort them to send aids for to regaine the dominion of Spain, lest unto them by descent from their auncestors. Mandonius and Indibilis who were retired for a time into their confines, untill they knew how the sedition sped and what was the issue thereof, rested still in suspence. For if the naturall citizens had their trespass forgiven, they made no doubt themselves but they might be pardoned also. But when it was published abroad how severely & sharply they were punished, they supposing their own transgression to deserve the like guerdon, solicited their owne people againe to take armes: and thus having levied and assembled the same power of aids which they had before, they passed into the Sederanes countie, where at the beginning they lay in standing campe, being in all 20000 foot, and 2500 horse strong.

Scipio after he had soone reconciled and wooed againe the hearts of his souldiours, as well by making true payment of their wages, to the faultie and innocent alike, as also by shewing a loving countenance, and geving friendly words unto all indifferently; before that hee dislodged and removed from Carthage, assembled them all together to an audience. Where he inveighed bitterly and at large against the falshood and trecherie of the lords of the countrey that rebelled: and protested before them all, that he went not now to be revenged of them for their wickednes; with the same mind, wherewith lately before he had cured the folly, and reformed the error of his naturall citizens: for then quoth he with harts grieve and grone, yea and with teares, like as one that rent and cut his owne bowels, I expiated and purged either the inconsiderate folly, or the wilfull malice of eight thousand men, with the heads of thirrie persons: but now I go with joy and glad hart, yea and with a resolution to execute and massacre the Ilergetes. For neither are they

A they borne in the same land with me, nor linked now in any societie at all unto me: the only bond of offaith and amitie which was betweene us, that have they themselves first impiously broken. But in mine owne armie, besides that I see they all are either Romane citizens, or els allies, and those not aliens, but meere Latines: this doth me good, and moveth me much, that there is not amongst them so much as one souldier to speake of, but was brought out of Italie either by mine unkle Cn. Scipio (who was the first of the Romane name that came as L. Deputie into this province) or els by my father who was Consul, or last of all by mine owne selfe. They are every one of them well acquainted and inured with the name of the Scipios, and used to their fortune and government: whom I gladly would conduct home safe with me to deserved triumph; and whome I hope to find readie to assist mee with their favour when I stand for a Consulship, as if it were a matter that concerned the honor of them all in generall, as well as mine particular. And as for the expedition now in hand, whosoever taketh it to be a warre, little remembreth the noble acts by me achieved: for surely I make more reckning of Mago and his exploits, who is fled with a few ships as it were out of the compass of the world, into an Island environed with the Ocean sea, than I do of the Ilergetes. For there in that place is not only a Carthaginian capitaine, but all the Carthaginian forces and strength that now remaine. Heere are none but thieves and robbers, and their leader; who peradventure may be of some power and sufficiencie to foray the fields, to burne the houses, to drive away some cattaille of their neighbours, but to come to hand-strokes in a set fight and ranged battaile, they are of no valor and worth at all: who no doubt will come into the field, trusting upon their good footmanship to run away in the rout, more than upon any force of armes to maintaine the medley. And therefore I have thought good to put down & suppress these Ilergetes, before I depart out of the province; not for any present danger at all, or feare of greater war that I see may spring from thence; but first and principally, that I to ungracious and wicked a rebellion should not remaine unpunished; and next, because it might not be said, that in a province so subdued, as well by singular prowess as rare felicitie, there was left one enimie behind of the Romanes. And therefore in the name of the gods follow after mee, not so much to make just warre (for yee are not to deale with enemies any way comparable unto you) as to take vengeance of wicked men, and to punish gracelesse persons. When he had finished his speech, he dismissed them, with commandement to be readie the next morrow, to put themselves in the journey: and after that he set once forward, by the tenth day he came to the river Ibertus, and when hee had passed over, within foure daies more, hee encamped in the sight of his enemies. Now there was a plaine there, environned round about with mountaines: into which vale betweene, he caused the cattaille (and those were for the most part driven out of the enemies countie) for to be put forth to grasing, and all to provoke the anger of the fierce and savage enemies: and sent out withall, the light appointed archers to guard them: hee took order besides, that when these were once in skirmish with the vancouriers of the enemies, Lelius with his Cavallerie should closely from some covert place give a suddaine charge. And for this purpose, there was a hill that bare out handsomely to hide the ambush of those horsemen. And presently without any delay, they came to a skirmish: for the Spaniards made out to the cattaille, so soone as ever they discovered them as farre off: the archers againe and darters of the Romanes, ran upon the Spaniards as they were busie in their bootie. And at first they terrified them, and skirmished with their shot: but afterward, when they had spent their arrows and darts, which were better to begin a fray, than determine a battell, they drew their naked swords, and began to fight close together foot to foot. And surely, the medley of the footmen had been doubtfully decided, but that the horsemen came upon them: who not onely affronted the enemies in their face, and trampled them all under their horsefeet that came in their way, but also some of them having wheeled about & set a compass along the hill foot, presented themselves at the backe of the enemies, so as they enclosed and shut up the most part of them in the middle betweene. In so much as there ensued a greater slaughter, than commonly upon light skirmishes by way of such rodes and excursions. But the barbarous people by this difcomfure were rather kindled and enflamed to anger, than daunted any way or discouraged. And therefore, because they would not seeme to have been dismayed and affrighted, the morrow morning by day-light, they shewed themselves in battell array. The streight and narrow vale, as is before said, was not able to receive and containe all their power: for two third parts welneere of the infanterie, and all the horse were come downe into the plaine field; the rest of their footmen besides, stood together ther quartered on the side of the hill. Scipio judged that the skantnesse of the ground made for him, both because it seemed that the Romanesouldiours were more fitted to fight in a small rounne than the Spaniards: and also for that the enemies were engaged within that place, which was not able to containe the whole multitude: and therefore he devised a new stratageme besides. For considering that he could not in so narrow aspace bring his owne cavallerie about to compasse and charge the wings and points of their battaile, and that the horsemen which the enemies had arranged together with their infanterie, would serve them in no need; he gave direction unto Laelius to conduct the horse as closely as he could about the hills, and to keepe off the squadrons of the cavallerie so farre as possibly might be from the medley of the Infanterie. Himselfe directly turned all the ensignes of the footemen opposit against the enemies, and marshalled the forefront with foure cohorts only, because he could not stretch out the battaile any broader: and then without delay he made hast to begin the conflict, to the end, that while the enemies were amused and occupied in fight, they should be withdrawn from espying the horsemen as they traversed over the hills. Neither had they an eye of them at all, while they were brought about, before they heard the noyse and tumult of them as they charged upon their backs. So they fought asunder in two severall places: and two battailes of foote, and as many of horse encountred and joyned along the plaine, because the streightnesse of the ground would not admit both horse and foote to fight together in one plot at once. Now when as the infanterie of the Spaniards could not help the men of armes, and they againe were as little succored by the Cavallerie, but that the footemen trusting upon the Cavallerie, were without good direction put rashly to fight in the plaine ground, and so beaten downe and slaine; and the horsemen being enclosed round, could neither abide the enemies footemen afront them (for by this time their owne infanterie was overthrowne and defeated) nor yet endure behind them the hote assault of their horsemen; they left their horses, cast themselves into a ring, and after they had stood so at defense a long time, were slaine every one to the last man: there was not I say one footeman or horseman left of all those that fought in the valley. As for that third part which stood upon the hill side, rather to behold the fight in a place of securitie, than to take part with their fellows in the battaile, they had both time and space to shift for themselves and escape. Among whom, were the Princes also themselves in person, Mandonius and Indibilis: who were slipt away in the first tumult of the medley, before all the battalions were environed. The same day was the campe also of the Spaniards forced: and therein besides other pillage, were taken prisoners almost three thousand men. Of Romanes and allies there died in that fight upon a 1200, and above three thousand were sore hurt. The victorie no doubt had bene obtained with lesse bloodshed, if they had fought in a more large and open peece of ground, where there had bene better scope to flye away. Then Indibilis giving over cleane to thinke any more of warres, and supposing nothing safer, than to have recourse to the approved goodnes and clemencie of Scipio, sent his brother Mandonius unto him: who fell prostrate downe at his feete, blaming much (as the cause of their folly) the fatall rage and furie of the time; wherein not only the Illergetes and Lacetanes, but also the Romane camp, as it were by some contagious and pestilent infection, became frantick and beside themselves: and said withall, that the condition of himselfe, his brother, and other their followers and subjects was such, as they were readie if it were so thought good, either to yeeld up their lively breath unto Scipio, at whose very hands they had once received the same, or else if they might now be pardoned and saved, to devote and employ their lives for ever hereafter wholly in his service, as being now wise due unto him alone, and no other. Once afore they presumed upon confidence in their innocent cause, when as yet they had no experience of his clemencie: but now contrarywise they repored all their full hope in the mercie of the conquerour, and nothing trusted in the goodnes of the quarrell. Now it was an old custome among the Romanes, not to exercise the absolute authoritie of their government upon any (as they did to peaceable subjects) with whom they were neither confedered in equal and reciprocal covenants, nor linked in the band of amitie; before they surrendered up unto them all rights, as well divine as humane: before I say they had received hostages of them, taken armor from them, and planted garisons in their townes and cities. Scipio after he had sharply rebuked and roundly shaken up Mandonius there present, and likewise Indibilis that was absent, said, That for their wicked parts and lewd demeanor, they had worthily deserved death: but live they should by his goodnes and the gracious favour of the people of Rome. And moreover he promised

A neither to despoile them of their armour and weapons (the seizing whereof was but a pawne and assurance unto such as feared rebellion; for as for him, he left unto them their armour freely to use at their pleasure, and their harts and minds secured from feare) nor proceed in rigor and cruelty against the guiltlesse hostages, but against their owne persons, if they went out and revolted againe: ne yet would he content himselfe to be revenged of disarmed and naked enemies, but the offenders and transgressors should in their armes suffer for their deserts. And now since they had tried both fortunes, as wel the one as the other, he put unto their choise, whether they had leiffer have the Romanes pacified or displeased, friends or enemies? So Mandonius had a faire delivery: only there was an imposition and fine laid upon him and Indibilis, of a summe of money for souldiers pay. Scipio himselfe after he had sent Martius before into the farther part of Spaine [beyond the river Iberus] and Syllanus back againe to Tarracon, staid some few dayes untill the Illergetes had made payment of the monies that they were charged with: and then with all his souldiers lightly appointed without cariages, marched in a running camp to overtake Martius, who by that time approached neere unto the Ocean.

The treatie which Masaniissa began before time, was upon sundrie occasions put off still and deferred. For the Numidian prince was very desirous to parley and commune with Scipio himself in person, & in his right hand to assure him of fealtie: which was the very cause then, that Scipio tooke so long a journey so far out of his way. Masaniissa being now at Gades, and advertised by Martius that Scipio was coming & neere at hand, shewed false semblance to Mago, made many excuses, and found much fault, namely, that their horses being pinned up and pestered within the lland, were welnere lost and spoiled: and that by their long abode there, not only they made others feeble the want and scarcitie of all things, but also tasted thereof themselves: and besides that his men of armes for very ease and idleness, became feeble and unlustie. By which suggestions he persuaded with Mago, and prevailed with him so much, as to suffer him to crosse over into the continent, under colour to wast and spoile the lands of Spaine next adjoining. When he was passed over, he sent before him three principall Numidians, gentlemen of marke, to appoint both the time and the place of their meeting and conference, and gave order, that Scipio should deteine two of them with him as pledges: the third was sent backe, to conduct Masaniissa to the appointed place, according as he was commaunded, and so with a small companie they met for to emparley and commune together.

D Now was Masaniissa the Numidian king possessed before with a wonderful admiration of Scipio and his vertue, by reason of the fame that was blazed abroad of his noble acts: and had conceived withall and imagined, that he was a man right personable, of a mightie, big, and goodly stature: but when he once saw him in place, he grew into a far greater reverence and honor of his person. For besides the exceeding majestie & port that naturally he caried with him, his goodly long bussh of haire well became and graced him; the habite also and attire of his bodie, manly and souldierlike, not brave nor tricked up deintely and delicately, much adorned and set him out. And for his age, he was in the best and height of his strength: which seemed upon his late sickness, more full, more smug and fresh, as if the very prime and floure of his youth had bene renewed, and himselfe cast againe in a new mould. The Numidian (at their first meeting) almost

E astonished, gave him thanks for sending back his brothers sonne unto him, saying, That ever since that time, he sought to espie some occasion and fit opportunitie, which now at length by the goodnes of the immortall gods being presented unto him, he had not neglected and let slip: Proteesting, that he was most desirous both to do him favour, and to gratifie the people of Rome in any kind of service: in so much, as there was no one foreiner more earnest and readie to advance and better the State of the Romanes than himselfe: which (albeit he had bene willing unto heretofore) he could not possibly shew in effect, so long as he was in Spaine, a strange country, and unknowne unto him; but in that wherein he was borne and brought up in hope of succession in his fathers kingdome, he would be most forward to performe. For, in case the Romanes would send but Scipio as L. Generall into Affrick, he made no doubt but hoped assuredly, that Carthage had not long to continue and stand, but soone would come to a final end. Scipio for his part was glad both to see him, and heare him so speake; knowing this full well, that of all the cavallerie of the enemies, Masaniissa and the Numidians went ever away with prick and price, and the yong man himselfe in his very countenance caried with him a good shew of a brave and haucie mind. So after faithfull promise geven and received on both parts, Scipio retired to Tarracon; racon: and Masaniſſa when he had by the permission of the Romanes haried the coasts next adjoining, because hee might not seeme to have passed over into the maine land for nothing, returned to Gades.

When Mago now being in utter despaire of Spaine (whereof he had conceived great hopes, and bare himselfe so proudly; first upon the mutinie of the soldiours, and afterwards upon the revolt and rebellion of Indibilis) made preparation to saile over into Africke, there came a message unto him from Carthage, that the Senate there had given order and direction, That hee should transport the armada which he had at Gades, and passe into Italie: and there to take up and wage all the able men that possibly he could levie, either of Gaules or of Ligurians; and so to joyne with his power unto Anniball: and not to suffer that warre to quaille and flake now, which was enterprised with greatest force and endeavour, and yet with greater favour of fortune. For this exploit, both treasure was brought from Carthage to Mago: and himselfe also raised as great sums as possibly he could of the Gaditanes, having not onely emptied the common treasure of the yland, but spoiled also their temples, yea and forced all private persons to bring abroad all their gold and silver whatsoever. As hee sailed along the coast of Spaine, hee landed his souldiours not farre from new Carthage: and after hee had wasted and overrun the territories by the sea side, he approached neere with his fleet, and rid at anchor before the cittie: where all the day long he kept his souldiours within their ships, and by night set them ashore, and led them toward that part of the wall, whereas Carthage was by the Romanes woon: supposing that the cittie was not sufficiently defended with a strong guard, and that some of the townesmen, upon hope of a change and alteration, would rise up in armes and rebell. But there were come posts out of the countrie in all hast beforehand, who had brought newes, as well of the harrying of the countrie and fearful flight of the rusticall peasants, as of the comming of the enemies. Moreover the armada was deferred also in the day time, and it was apparant, that they made not choise to anchor even just in the rode before the cittie, for nothing. And therefore the citie soldiours flood readie, well appointed, and in armes, and kept within that gate, which turned toward the lake and the sea. And when the enemies, souldiours and mariners confusedly together, were come in great disorder under the wals, with more tumultuous noise than forcible violence: the Romans at once suddainly set open their gate, & with a great crie & shout, made a sallie upon them: charged the enemies, troubled & disordered them, and at the first onsets and volie of shot discomfited and put them to flight, yea and with much slaughter chased them to the shore: and but that the vessels flood close to the strand, readie to receive them about as they fled so fearfully, there had not bin one left alive, either in the flight or fight. Nay, they that wer in the very ships were in great afright and peril, whiles for to prevent the enemies of breaking in upon them pel mel with their own companie, they pul'd up the ladders, drew in the planks, cut a two the ropes wherby the ships were fastned to the banks, yea and the very cables for hast, that they might have no hindrance by weighing anchor: so that many there were, who in swimming to the shippes, because they knew not in the darke night, which way to go or what to avoid, perished miserably. The next day, when the armada was fled from thence backe againe into the Ocean from whence it came, there were found slaine eight hundred men: and of armours and corselets between the citie wall and the sea shore, two thousand.

Mago being retired to Gades, was excluded from thence, and arrived with his fleet at Cimbis, a place not farre from Gades. From whence hee sent embassadours, to complaine that the gates were shut against him, being their allie and friend: and when the Gaditanes excused themselves and said, that it was long of an uprore of the multitude, who were offended and aggrieved for certaine robberies committed, and spoile made by the soldiours at their departure, and when they were readie to be embarked, hee trained forth to parlie their head magistrats (whom the Carthaginians call Suffetes) together with the chiefe Treasurer: and after they were skourged & their skin pittreously torne, he commanded them to be roundly trussed up and crucified. From thence he sailed to Pityusa, an yland distant from the maine an hundred miles, inhabited at that time by Carthaginians, where the fleet was friendly and peaceably received: and not onely provided for liberally of store of victuals, but also furnished with lustie men, for mariners to serve at sea, yea and with armour and munition for souldiours. Vpon which forces Mago bare himselfe confident and bold, and setting saile, fell with the Balear ylands, that were fiftie miles off. Now there are two of these ylands called Baleares, the one greater than the other, and more mightie both

A in men and munition: having an haven and harbour where Mago supposed that he might commodiously winter in. But the Ilanders withstood his navie with as great hostilitie, as if they had bene Romanes that had inhabited the yland, they could not have done more. And as now adaies they use for the most part slings, so at that time they practised no other kind of weapon at all. And in no nation besides, can yee find one speciall person, so much to excell in that feat, as all the Balears generally do exceed and surpass others in the cast and slight thereof. And therefore they discharged and levelled among them, as the armada approached the shore, such store of stones flying about their eares as thicke as haile, that they durst not enter the haven, but turned their ships into the maine sea again. Then they put over to the lesser *Iland of the Balears, which as it was fertile in soile, so for men and armour it was nothing so strong. Whereupon they disbarked and came a land, and above the haven in a strong and well fenced place they encamped. And B having gotten to bee maisters both of the citie and the territorie about it, without any force of armes and conflict, they levied & enrolled there among them two thousand auxiliarie soldiours, whom they sent to Carthage for to winter, and then they drew up their shippes a land into the docke. When Mago was once departed from the Ocean sea-coast, the Gaditanes surrendered themselves to the Romanes.

* Minorique, as the greater is called Majorique.

These were the acts achieved in Spaine, under the conduct and fortunate government of P. Scipio: who having delivered the charge of the province to L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, returned to Rome with a fleet of ten saile. He had audience given him in the Senate, assembled in the temple of Bellona, without the citie: where he discoursed before them, in order from point to point, of all the affaires and exploits that hee had done in Spaine: Namely, how often hee had fought in set and ranged battailes; what a number of townes hee had forced and woon from the enemies; what nations he had subdued and brought in subjection under the state of Rome; how at first hee passed into Spaine, against foure generall capitaines and foure victorious armies; and now had not left one Carthaginian in all those parts. Yet for all these noble deeds, he rather assaied what hope he might have of a triumph, than made any hote & earnest sute therefore: because it was never seen to that day, that any one had triumphed who made war, being himselfe no principall magistrat. After the Senat was risen and dismissed, he entered the citie: and caused to bee carried before him into the chamber of Rome, of silver in bullion, fourteene thousand three hundred & fortie two pounds weight; & in coine besides, a great quantitie. Then L. Peturius Philo, held the solenne assembly for creation of Consuls: and all the Centuries in generall, with exceeding favour and affection, elected P. Scipio Consull: and for to bee his companion in government, P. Licinius Crassus the Archbishop was joyned unto him. But this assembly (as wee find in records) was celebrated with more frequencie of people, than ever any had bin known during this warre. For they repaired and met from all parts, not onely to give their voices, but also to see Scipio: nay they ran in great numbers to his house, and into the Capitoll, when he sacrificed and slew an hundred oxen in sacrifice for the honour of Jupiter, according to his vow which he had made in Spaine. And all mens minds gave them, and they were assuredly persuaded in their hearts, that as C. Lucatius finished the former Punick warre, so P. Cornelius would make an end of that which was now in hand: and like as hee had driven all the Carthaginians forth of Spaine, so would Scipio hunt them out of Italie: and every man in his conceit wished and assigned unto him the province of Africk, as if the war in Italie had bin fully brought to an end. Then ensued the election of the Pretors. And two were created that were then Ædiles of the Commons, to wit, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Octavius: and of private persons, Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and L. Aemilius Pappus. In the fourteenth yeare of the Punicke war, P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus entered their Consulship. And unto the Consuls were the provinces appointed: namely, unto Scipio was Sicilie granted without casting lots, and that with the consent and good liking of his colleague, because he being the Archbishop, was by vertue of that dignitie kept still in Italie, for to see to the sacrifices, divine service, and church matters: and unto Crassus the countrie of Bruttij was assigned. Then the provinces for the Pretours were put to the lotterie: and the civile jurisdiction within Rome fell to Cn. Servilius: Ariminum (for so they called Gallia) unto Sp. Lucretius: Sicilie was allotted to L. Aemilius: and Sardinia to Cn. Octavius.

The Senate assembled in the Capitoll: where Publius Scipio propounded an Act, and it was confirmed by the authoritie of the house, That out of the monie which himselfe brought into the common treasure, he might be allowed to defray the charges of those plaies and games

that hee had vowed in Spaine during the time of the fouldiours mutinie. Then hee called the G Embassadours of the Saguntines into the Senate house: and the most auncient man amongst them spake in this wise:

The Question of the Saguntine Embassadours to the Senate
of Rome.

Although right honorable, it be not possible to find any more miseries and calamities, than we have endured already in the maintenance of our faithfull allegiance unto you even to the end, yet such have your deserts bene to us ward, and so many favours have we received of your capitaine Generals, that we thinke not much nor repent of any damage or losse whatsoever, that we have sustained in that behalte. For first, yee entered into the quarrell, and began the warre for our sake; and having once begun it, yee have continued therein for the full space of foureteeene years; and that with such resolution, that oftentimes as ye have plunged your selves into extreme perill and daunger, so ye have engaged no lesse the State of the Carthaginians. For at what time H as yee had within Italie a cruell and bloudie warre, and Anniball your mortall enemy, yee sent forth your Consuls with armies into Spaine, as it were to gather up the broken reliques of our shipwracke, Pub. and Cneus Cornelij the two brethren, from the first time that they came into the province, never ceased to devise and doe, whatsoever might either aduantage us, or endamage our enemies. For first and formost, they restored unto us our towne againe: then having made enquirie throughout all Spaine, where any one of our citizens were sold as slaves, they delivered and redeemed them out of miserable servitude, and recovered for them their former freedome. But see; When we were well neere come to this good passe, that from our poore & pitifull estate we were raised up to a wished for and desirable fortune, then Pub. and Cn. Cornelij your Generals, suddenly died: whose death happened in manner more lamentable and dolorous unto us I than unto you. For then we thought verily, thus of our selves, That we were reduced from remote and distant places unto our auncient habitation, for this purpose, that wee should perish once againe, and see a second overthrow and destruction of our native cuntry: knowing thus much, that for to worke our utter confusion, there needed not a Carthaginian capitaine or armie to bee the instrument and the meanes; for even the Turderanes alone, our most auncient enemies, who were the cause also of our former ruine and undoing, were able with their owne forces to root us out cleane, and extinguish our name. But behold, whiles we were in these perplexities, immediately beyond all our hope and expectation, ye sent among us this noble Scipio here in place. In whose behalte, we count our selves of all Saguntines most happie, because we have seen him declared Consull already, and shall be able to report the newes unto our neighbors and fellow citizens, that we have beheld with our own eyes, even our whole hope, our help, our health and safety. Who having forced and woon very many cities and townes of your enemies in Spaine, at all times and in all places set the Saguntines apart from out of other prisoners and captives, and sent them home againe into their owne cuntry. Finally, as for Turderania a nation so aduerse, and so daungerous enemies unto us, that if it should continue still in prosperitie, Saguntum could not possibly stand upright; he hath by force of armes so quelled and tamed it, that neither we our selves, nor (bee it spoken without arrogance) any of our posteritie hereafter need stand in feare of any daunger from thence. Wee see before our eyes their citie rased, at whose instigation and whom for to gratifie, Anniball before had rased Saguntum: and out of their lands now, we gather rents and revenues: which contented our hearts, not so much for profit and gaine, as for quitance and revenge. In consideration and regard of these benefites and good turnes, which be such, as greater we cannot hope nor wish for at the hands of the immortal gods: the Senate and people of Saguntum hath sent us ten here in Embassie unto you, for to give you thanks in their name; and withall, to reioice and congratulate in your behalte for the happy hand ye have made, and the fortunate exploits yee have achieved these last yeares past, as well in Spaine, as in Italie; namely, that yee have subdued, and doe hold in possession all Spaine, not onely so farre as to the river Iberus, but even to the lands end, & the utmost point lying upon the Ocean sea: And as for Italie, ye have left no more ground in it for Anniball and the Carthaginians, than they empale within the compass of trench and rampier. Moreover, we have in speciall charge, not onely to render thanksgiving therefore to almighty and most gracious Jupiter the patron of the fourest and castell of the Capitoll, but also to offer and present unto him (if it may stand with your good grace and liking) this golden crowne; and to set it up in the Capitoll; in token and memorall of victorie. Which we humbly beseech your HH. or your favour to graunt unto us: and moreover (if it please you) to ratifie and confirme for ever by your authoritie and approbation, all those benefites

A benefites, franchises, and priviledges, which your Generals have of their goodnesse vouchsafed to endow us with.

The Senate made this answer to the Saguntine Embassadours, That both the raising and allowing the rearing againe of Saguntum, should be a memorable example to all nations, of the faithfull societie and alliance, observed both of the one part and the other inviolate. And whereas their Generals had re-edified the citie of Saguntum, and delivered the citizens thereof from servitude and bondage, they had therein done well and truly, and by direction, according to the will and pleasure of the Senat. And whatsoever els was performed by them to the good & benefit of the Saguntines, the Senat stood willing and contented therewith, and gave order therefore. As for their present and oblation, good leave they had to bestow it solemnly in the temple of the Capitoll. After this, order was given, That the Embassadours should have their lodging appointed them, and presents sent unto them, and all other entertainment at the charges of the citie, yea, and by way of a reward, an allowance of no lesse than ten thousand Asseapece.

Then were the other Embassadors admitted into the Senat house, & audience given them. Also the request of the Saguntines was granted to go & see Italie for their pleasure, so far forth as they might with securitie of their persons: and certaine guides were assigned to conduct and accompany them, with especiall letters also directed unto all cities and townes, for to receive the Spaniards friendly, and give them courteous entertainment.

These things done, the Senators sat in consultation about the state & commonweale, & treated concerning the levying of new armies, and the distribution of the provinces. Now when as the common brute went that P. Scipio was destined & named to a new province of Affricke, & all men gave out with open voice, that he was the man to be sent thither directly, without casting of lots for the matter: and himselfe besides not resting content now with meane glorie, said openly, that he was declared Consull, not onely for to mainteine warre, but also to finish and make an end thereof once for all: which could not be effected by any other meanes, unlesse himselfe in person made a voiage with an armie into Affricke; protesting moreover, That if the Senate crossed and gaine said this designe of his, he would propound it to the people, and carie it away clear by their voices: whiles the principall LL. and auncients of the Senate were nothing pleased with this resolution of his, but durst not say a word and speak their minds, either for feare, or for courting of him, in hope of preferment; only Q. Fabius being demanded his opinion, spake to the D matter in question to this effect.

Right honourable and my LL. of the Senate, I know full well, that many of you here assembled are of this mind, & verily persuaded, That we are set this day to no purpose, but even to consult and debate of a matter cleerely determined; and that in vaine he shall spend words, who shall deliver his advise of the province of Affricke, as of a point as yet doubtful and not resolved upon already. For mine owne part, first and formost I cannot conceive, neither will it enter into my head, how Affricke can possibly now bee accounted as a province, and assigned certainly unto your Consull (let him be a man right hardie, and of as much valour as may be) considering, that neither the Senate unto this day hath judged it, nor the people ordained and assigned it to any person in the nature and name of a province. Furthermore, if it were so indeed without all peradventure; then in my judgement, the Consull hath done amisse, who in making semblance to put a matter for to be debated, which is already agreed upon, hath deluded & mocked the whole Senate, and not the Senatour, who in his course delivereth his opinion of the thing in question. But I am assured, that in gaine saying and crossing this hastie voiage into Affricke, I shall incur the sinister opinion and turnise of two things: the one is, of my usuall lingering and slow proceeding in all mine actions (a course that naturally I am given unto) which yong men may terme at their pleasure, timorousnesse and lazinesse; but so long as I have no cause to repent therefore, I passe the lesse. For surely hitherto, the advises of others have ever at the first sight made a goodlier shew, and seemed more honourable; but by experience, mine own waies have sped better, and bene found in the end more effectual. The other is, of backbiting, detraction, and envying at the glorie and reputation of the Consull, a man of singular prowess (I must confesse) and whom I see to grow from day to day in greatnesse and honour. From which jealousie and suspicion, if neither my life passed and the carriage of my selfe; if neither my Dictatorship with five Consulships, nor so much glorie which I have acquired, as well in managing the affaires of warre abroad, as of civile policie at home (that a man would thinke I should rather bee glutted therewith than desire any more) bee able for to cleere and assoyle mee; yet my G yeeres at leathwife, may free mee verie well. For what concurrence and emulation can there bee betwene mee and him, who is not of equall age with my very sonne? When I was Dictatour, in the vigour and floure of my strength, in the very courle and traine of my greatest and bravest exploits, no man either in Senate or in the assemblie of the people, heard me to refuse and denie, That my own Generall of Cavallerie, who could not affourd mee a good word but ever railed at me, (a thing that was never heard before) should be made equall with my selfe in command and government. And yet by good deedes rather then by faire words, I effected and gained thus much in the end, that he, who in the judgement of others was matched with me and made my fellow, confessed within a while himselfe to be my inferior. Lesse reason have I then now, after I have gone through all degrees of honors and dignities, to enter into contention and emulation with a yong gentleman, of all others at this day most flourishing in the eies H of the world: unlesse forsooth it be a likely matter that I (a man weary not only of managing affaires, but also of this world, and of this life) should looke to have the province of Affrick offered unto me, if it were once denied him. Nay verily, I have enough already: in that glorie I am content to live and die, and seeke for no more. It was sufficient for me to hinder Anniball from atcheiving the victorie; to the end that by you, who now are gallants in the best of your strength, he might be vanquished and overcome. Meet it is then and great reason, P. Cornelius, that you should beare with me, and hold me excused, if I (who never in regard of mine owne selfe set greater store by the fame and opinion of people, than of the good of the common-weale) prefer not now your glorie before the weale-publike. And yet I will not say, but in case there were no war I at all in Italie; or the enemy of that qualitie, as by conquering of whom, there were no credit and honor to be gotten: then he that would seeke to keepe you still in Italie, were it never so much for the good of the State, might seeme to go about to disappoint and frustrate you (in putting you by the charge of the warre) of the very meanes and matter of your glorie and renowne.

 But seeing that Anniball is your object, seeing he is our enemy, who with an entire animie still holdeth Italie as it were besieged now these foureteene yeeres; will you not, P. Cornelius, hold your selfe well contented with this honour and reputation, That you being Consull, should drive that enemy out of Italie, who hath bene the cause of the death of so many brave men of ours, and of so many foiles and overthrowes that we have received? that, like as C. Lucatius had the name of finishing the former Punick warre, so you may win the title of ending this other also. K Unlesse a man would say that Amilcar was a warrior and capitaine worthie to be preferred before Anniball; or that war of more importance than this; or that victorie greater and more honorable than this is like to be, in case it happen that we may be conquerours under your conduct, and whiles you are Consull. Whether would you chuse rather to have drawne Amilcar away from Drepanum and the mountain of Eryx, than chased & hunted the Carthaginians and Annibal out of Italie? Nay surely even your owne selfe (howsoever you embrace glorie already won, than hoped for hereafter) would not take more joy and contentment, & triumph rather for freeing and delivering of Spaine than Italie, from the warres. Anniball it is as yet is not come to that low ebb, nor so downe the wind, but that he which hath made choise of another war, may seeme well in so doing to stand as much in feare and dread, as in contempt of him. Why then addresse L you not your selfe to effect this inprese, and leave building these castles in the aire, and hope by fetching these reaches and this compasse, and going the longest way about, that when you are passed over into Affrick, Anniball will follow you thither; and not rather go the next way to worke, and fight with Anniball where he is, and make no more ado? Are you willing indeed and desirous to win this honor, of dispatching quite the Punick warre? Why, it is the very course of nature to defend and make sure your owne, before you go in hand to assaile the dominions of others. Let us have peace first in Italie, before we make warre in Affrick: and let us first rid our selves of feare, or ever we take occasion to put others in feare; unlesse we had some greater quar-rell. And if by your conduct and fortunate government, both these may possibly be effected; conquer Anniball heere, and then go thither to assaile Carthage a gods name. But if the one or the other of these victories must needs be left for new Consuls to achieve: as the former of the twaine will be the greater and more memorabile, so it will open the way, and give the overture unto the other ensuing upon it. For at this time, over and besides that our treasure, & all the revenues and finances of our state, are not able to mainteine and wage two sundrie armies both in Italie

A Italie and in Affrick: besides I say, that we want the meanes to keepe two Armadaes afloat, and have nothing left sufficient wherewith to furnish them with victuals and munition: who seeth not I pray you, how farre we engage ourselves in perill and danger by this enterprise? P. Lucius Lucius (shall warre in Italie, and P. Scipio in Affrick. What will ye say if Anniball, (which God forbid, and my heart even dreadeth to bode the offe, but that which once hath hapned, may happen full well again) upon the traine of some new victorie, fortune to go forward & assaile the citie of Rome? Where are we then? Shall we have time then to send for you our Consull out of Affrick, as we did for Q. Fulvius from Capua? And what say you to this besides, That the fortune of war is doubtfull & uncertaine even in Affrick, as well as in other places? Call to mind, and be taught betimes by the examples of your owne house and familie, by your father and unkle; who within 30 daies were slaine, and their armies defeated; even there, whereas for certain yeeres space they had performed both by sea and land most noble exploits: and highly renowned among foreine nations both the Romane people, and also your owne name and familie. The time will not serve, if I would all this day long do nothing els but reckon and recount unto you, how many Kings, Emperours, and Generall Capitaines there have bene, who have entred rashly into their enemies countries, and received many foiles and overthrowes thereby, as well in their own persons, as in their whole armies. The Atheniens, a most prudent and politick State, having left the war at home in their own country, and following the counsell and suggestion of * one yong man, as hardie and valiant in armes, as noble in birth and parentage as your selfe (none disprai-sed) sailed into Sicillie with a brave and puissant navie; and there in one battaile fought at sea, C overturned and ruinated for ever their most flourishing citie and common-weale. But why seeke I forraie examples of strangers, and old stories of times too far past, and over-long ago. Let even this same Affrick (to go no farther) and M. Atilius, serve as a notable example of both fortunes, for our instruction and learning for ever. Now certes, P. Cornelius, when you shall once discover Affrick within your kenning from the sea, you will thinke then that your provinces of Spaine were matters of sport and pastime in comparison of it. For what semblable proportion or likenesse is there betwene them? When you were in your voyage for Spaine, you sailed in the calme sea peaceably along the coast of Italie and France, and arrived at Emporia, a friend citie and confederate: and when you had landed your men, you led them in securitie through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as farre as Tarracon. From thence, ye journeyed D all the way by cities and townes, furnished with Romane garisons. About the river Iberus, you found the armies of your father and unkle, which remained upon the losse of their Generals, more fierce and fell for the calamitie that they had received, than before. You met there L. Marcius their captain & leader, chosen (I must needs say) I know not how in a hurrey, by the souldiers themselves for the time: but otherwise I assure you, if nobilitie of birth and the titles of dignities which he justly deserved had graced him, he was in all feates of armes and martiall knowledge, comparable to the very best warriors and noblest Capitaines. After this you assaulted Carthage without any impeachment, and tooke your time at your own pleasure, even when there was not one of the three Carthaginian armies to aid and defend their associates. As for all the exploits besides (without offence be it spoken, and not to debase any good service there) they are in E no respect to be compared with the Affricane warre: where wee shall finde no haven open to enterteine our Armada, no countrie peaceable, no citie confederate, no king friendly, no place at all either to sojourne and rest in, or to march forward and passe through with safetie. Which way soever you cast your eyes, nothing but hostileitie threatening danger and perill unto us. Do you in deed trust Syphax, or relie upon the Numidians? Well, let it suffice that once ye trusted them. Rash adventures speede not alwayes best. And oftentimes wee see, that fraude seemeth faithfull, and maketh way of credite in small things, that in matters of great importance, and when the time serveth, it may pay home and worke a mischief with a witnesse. The enemies overcame not your father and unkle by force of armes, before that the Celtiberians our Allies overraught them by falsehood and treacherie: ney-F ther were your selfe in so much daunger from Mago and Idarubail the chiefe Capitaines of your enemies, as from Indibilis and Mandonius, your new friends and confederates. Can you repose any confidence in the Numidians? you, I say, that have experience of your owne souldiours mutinie, and have seene them rise against you? As for Syphax and Massissa, as they had rather themselves be the soveraigne and most mightie in Affricke, than the Carthaginians should; so surely they with the Carthaginians to be the highest, above all others besides their own selves. Now at this time there is some emulation and hea-rning among them, and all occasions of quarrell whet them on to maintaine sides and factions, so long as feare of foraine enemies is farre ynough off. Shew them once the Romane armes and forces, let them see an host of strangers once, they will runne I warrant you, altogether then, as it were to quench a common skarefire. You shall find that the very same Carthaginians, will farre otherwise stand to the defence of the walles of their coun-trie, their cities, the temples of their gods, their altars & private houses, when going to battaile they shall have their feartull wives to beare them companie, their small children to go afore them in their eye: you shall find them I say, stick better to it, than they did in the quarrell and defence of Spaine. But what and if the Carthaginians, finding themselves strong enough upon the confidence of the generall concord of Atricke, of the fast fidelitie of the confederate kings, of the strength of their owne wals, should fortune themselves, when they shall see Italie destitute of your helpe, and disarmed of your forces, either to make out a fresh armie from Africke and send it into Italie, or else give order and direction to Mago (who as it is well knowne for certaine, is departed with his navie from the Baleare Ilands, and lyeth floating and riding continually upon the Alpine Ligurians) for to joyne his power with Anniball? It is a cleere case, that we shall be in as great trouble, and as much affrighted then, as we were of late, when Asdruball mounted over the Alpes, & came down into Italie. Asdruball I say, whom you (that will with your armie compasse not only Carthage but also all Affricke) let go out of your hands, & suffered to passe over into Italie. But you will say, that you have vanquished him. Say you so? I would not for anything, not onely in regard of the love I beare to the common-weale, but also of the affection that I carrie toward your selfe, that a vanquished man could find the way by you into Italie. Be content and suffer us to attribute all things that have gone well with you or the common-weale, during the time of your government, to your wisdom and pollicie; and contrariwise, whatsoever hath fallen out cross and adverse, to impute and assigne the same to nothing else, but to the variable events of warre, and to fickle fortune. The better and more valiant that you are, the more need hath your native countrie, yea and all Italie besides, to keepe you still at home with them, so brave a captaine, so rare a Protectour. You cannot your owne selfe dissemble the matter, but con-fesse, That wheresoever Anniball is, there is the very head, the fort and strength of all this warre; for as much as you pretend, that the only cause why you would passe into Atricke, is to draw Anniball thither after you. Well then, be it here or be it there, with Anniball you must have to deale.

 Tell me then, whether are you like to be stronger in Africke your selfe alone, or here where your own forces and the power of your Colleague shall be joyned together? Is it possible that even the late example of Livius and Claudius so fresh in memorie, should not enforme and teach us, what difference there is between the one and the other? In whither place I pray you, will Anniball be more strong in men and munition; here in the utmost corner and angle of the Brutians countrie, where this long time he hath waited in vaine for aid from home, where hee hath sent for succour and gone without; or nere unto Carthage, & in the mids of Affricke among his friends & allies?
 What kind of pollicie is this of yours, thereto decide the quarrell and trie the whole matter, where your owne forces are lesse by a halfe moitie, and the power of your enemies much greater and stronger; rather than here, whereas you may fight with the power of two armies against one, toiled out of heart in so many battailes, and wearied with long warfare, so tedious and grievous withall? Consider with your selfe, what conformitie and resemblance there is, betwene your designes and your fathers. He, as Consull having made a journey into Spaine, to the end that he might encounter Anniball as hee came downe the Alpes; returned out of his owne province into Italie: and you, when Anniball is in Italie, purpose to abandone and leave Italie. And why? forsooth not because you judge it good for the common-weale, but because you thinke it an enterprize that may emport you in great honour and glorie: like as when you being captaine Generall of the people of Rome, left your province at randon, and your armie at fixe and seven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senate, hazarded in two bothomes the whole state and majestie of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with the danger of your life, incurred the perill and jeopardie of the maine chance. To conclude, for mine own part (my lords of the Senat) I am of this mind, & this is my conceit, That P. Cornelius was not created Consull privately for himselfe and his owne behoufe, but for the good of the common-weale and us all:

and that the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the citie and defence of Italie; and not for the Consuls, in their owne proud selfe-conceit and overweening of themselves, after the manner of absolute KK. to transport and lead into what parts of the world they list themselves.
 When Fabius by this Oration (premeditate and framed to the time) had through his authoritie and the long seled and confirmed opinion that men had of his wisdom, drawne unto his side a good part of the Senate, and specially the auncients; inso much as the greater number commended the grave counsell of the old man, above the lustie and youthfull courage of the other gallant: then Scipio by way of answer made these remonstrances, and spake in this wise. My lords of the Senat, even Fabius himselfe in the beginning of his Oration, said very well, That his opinion which he was to deliver, might be suspected of detraction and envie. Of which note, verily I durst not my selfe taxe and accuse a man of his qualitie & reputation so much, as me thinks is not so well cleered as it ought to be the very suspicion it selfe: and I wote not whither it bee by a default of his speech and oration, or that the thing it selfe is so pregnant. For in such manner he extolled with goodly words, and magnified his owne dignities and renowned deeds, and all to quench the jealousy and crime of envie: as if my selfe were to feare the danger of emulation and concurrence of some companion of the basest degree and condition, and not of him; who because he farre surpasseth other men, (which height and pitch of honour I denie not, but I ende-vour my selfe to reach unto) would not in any hand, that I should compare with him. So highly hath hee advanced himselfe in regard of his old yeares, considering that hee hath gone through all ranks of honour: and so low debased me, and put me downe even under the age of his own sonne; as though the desire and love of glorie, should passe no farther than the length of mans life, and the greatest part thereof extended not to the memorie of posteritie and the future time.
 This I hold for certaine, that it is a thing incident to the most magnanimous men & of greatest spirit and courage, to have a desire for to match themselves not onely with them that live in their daies, but with the most famous and excellent personages, that ever were or might be in any age.
 And certes for mine own part, Q. Fabius, I will not make it goodly, but frankly bewray my mind that way, namely, that I would full fain not only attain unto your praise-worthy acts & commendable vertues: but also (with your good leave be it spoken) if possibly I can, even to excell & surmount the same. And therefore let us not carrie this mind, either you toward mee, or I to those that are younger than my selfe, To be unwilling and thinke much, that any one citizen among us, should prove equall to our selves: for in so doing, wee should offer wrong and doe hurt not onely to them whom we have envied and maligned, but also prejudice the common-weale, and in manner the whole state of all mankind. And thus much to your selfe. He hath now (my lords) recounted, to what great perils I should enter into by the Africk voyage: in such sort, as he would seem not only to have a carefull regard of the common-weale and the armie, but also to pitie me and tender my case & fortune. Whence cometh it, that you should al on a sodain take so great care for me? when my father and unckle both were slaine; when their armies both twaine, were utterly almost disfeated and put all to the sword; when Spaine was lost; when foure armies of Carthaginians, and foure Generals, held all in feare by force of armes; when there was a captaine fought for to undertake that warre, and no man durst bee seene to put himselfe forward, no man so hardie as to present and offer his service, but my selfe; and when the people of Rome had committed the charge and government of Spaine to me a yong man, but foure & twentie yeares old how hapned it that no man then tooke exception of my age, made mention of the enemies force, discoursed of the difficultie and daunger of the warre, or laid abroad the late and fresh defeat and death of my father and unckle? I would demaund and gladly know, Whither we have sustained now lately, some greater calamitie and losse in Affricke, than we received at that time in Spaine? or if the armies at this present in Affricke be more puissant, or the captaines more in number, or better in valour, than they were in Spaine at that time? or whether mine age then, was more ripe and sufficient to mannage warres, than now it is? Last of all, whether it be better, more commodious and easie, to maintaine warre with the Carthaginian enemy in Spaine, than in Affricke? After that I have discomfited & put to flight foure hosts of Carthaginians; after I have either forced by assault, or reduced under mine obeisance (for feare) so many cities; after I have vanquished and subdued all, even as far as to the Ocean sea, so many princes and potentates, so many fierce & cruell nations; after I have so fully recovered Spaine, as there is not remaining to be seen there, so much as the footing and bare token of any war: an easie matter it is, and all one to

to elevate and depreſſe the acts paſt that I have archieved: as alſo par-die it will be, when I returne with conqueſt out of Affricke, to debaſe and make nothing of thoſe very things, which now to keepe me backe from thence, and to make them appeare ſtrange and terrible, are amplified with great words, & ſtretched upon the tainters to the full. He holdeth, That there is no acceſſe, no entrance into Affricke, nor havens open to receive an armada. Hee telleth us and allegeth, That M. Attilius was taken priſoner in Affricke: as if M. Attilius forſooth at his firſt arrivall in Affricke, had caught that harme and heavie miſfortune. But hee never remembreth and calleth to mind, how that even the very ſame captaine, as infortunate as he was, yet found the baies open ynough into Affricke: and the firſt yeere, bare himſelfe right valiantly and victoriously; and for any hurt from Carthaginian captaines, continued invincible unto the end. You ſhall never therefore feare mee with this example ſo much, (were it ſo, that the calamitie you ſpeake of, happened in this warre, and not in the former; of late, and not fortie yeeres agoe) that I ſhould give over my intended purpoſe, and not faile into Affricke now, becauſe Regulus there was taken pri-ſoner: as well as I paſſed before into Spaine, whereas the Scipions chaunced to bee killed.
 Or that I ſhould ſuffer, that Xanthippus the Lacedemonian was borne into this world more hap-pie for Carthage, than my ſelfe for Italie: but rather, that thereby I ſhould think the better of my ſelfe, conſidering that the vertue of one onely man can be of ſuch conſequence and ſo great ef-feet. But we ought (you ſay) to conſider the example of the Athenians, who leaving the warre at home in their owne countrie, paſſed over into Sicilie unadviſedly. Seeing you are aſo good lei-ſure to tel tales & report the fabulous ſtorie of Greece, why diſcouſe you not rather of Agatha- cles the king of the Syracuſians? who ſeeing that Sicilie a long time was troubled and vexed with the Punicke warre, ſailed over into the ſelfeſame Affricke whereof wee ſpeake, and withdrew the warre thither from whence it came? But what need I to inſtruct and teach you by rehearſing old and forraine examples, how materiall a thing it is and important, to begin with an enemy firſt, and put him in feare; and by bringing another into danger, to remove the perill from our ſelves?
 Can there bee a preſident found more pregnant, more preſent and freſh in memorie to prove and enforce this point, than Annibal himſelfe? A great difference there is betweene the waſting and pilling the lands of others, and the ſeeing of our owne burnt and deſtroied. And he which giveth the aſſault to endanger another, is ever of more courage than hee that ſtandeth upon his owne guard and at defence onely to ſave himſelfe. Moreover, the feare and dread is alwaies greater of things unknown unto us: but ſo ſoon as a man is entred into the confines of a forraine coun-trie, he may behold and ſee at hand (as well the good as the bad) what may advantage & what may endamage the enemies. Annibal would never have thought and hoped, that ſo many States in Italie would have revolted unto him, as they did upon the overthrow at Cannæ. How much leſſe account then may the Carthaginians make of anything in Affricke, to remaine ſaſt and aſſured unto them; who are fickle allies to ſtrangers, without all truth and fidelitie; proud lords and intollerable tyrants over their owne ſubjects, full of wrath and crueltie? Over and beſides, we (albeit we were forſaken and abandoned of all our confederates) ſtood alwaies upon our owne forces, and maintained our ſelves with meeſe Roman ſoldiours; whereas in Carthage they have no ſtrength of natural citizens: the ſoldiours that they have, are mercenaries al & waged for monie; partly Aſiaticanes, and partly Numidians, the moſt unconſtant nations of all others by nature, and apteſt to entertaine changes and innovations. Let me have no ſtay and hinderance in this place onely; yee ſhall heare newes at one time, That I am ſet over in Affricke, that all the countrie there is up in a broile; that Annibal is readie to diſlodge and remove out of theſe parts; and alſo that Carthage it ſelfe is beſieged. Expect you daily out of Affricke better and luckier tidings, yea, and oftener than yee heard out of Spaine. Theſe hopes of mine, I ground upon the fortune of the people of Rome: upon the juſtice of the gods, witneſſes of the league broken by the enemies; upon Syphax and Ataniſſa, both kings, whoſe truth and fidelitie I will truſt ſo farre forth as I find them, and ever ſtand in feare and doubt of their falſhood and trecherie. Many things there are now, that by diſtance of place appeare not, which warre once begun will ſoone diſcover. And this is a ſpeciall point of a man indeed, and of a good captain, in no caſe to be wanting unto fortune when ſhe offereth her ſelfe, but to take all vantage that ſhe giveth: and thoſe accidents and occurrences which fal by chance, to make uſe of them: yea & by wiſdome and counſell to frame them to his owne purpoſe and deſignes. True it is, o Fabius, I ſhall have Annibal to beard and to match mee; a ſouldiour, I confeſſe, as good every way as my ſelfe: but I will rather draw

A draw him after me, than hee ſhall keepe mee backe at home. Force him I will to fight in his owne countrie, and Carthage ſhall bee the price of my victorie, rather than the decayed peeces, and halfe runate petie cattles of the Brutij. Only provide, o Fabius, that in the meane time whiles I am at ſea in my voyage, whiles I am landing mine armie in Affricke, whiles I approach Carthage with a running camp, the Common-weale ſuſtaine no harme and damage heere at home. See to this, I ſay, and be well adviſed, that it be not a ſhamefull reproch to ſay, That P. Licinius the Conſull, a man of ſingular valour (who becauſe he is the high prieſt, and by vertue therof, not to ab-ſent himſelfe from the ſolemne celebration of ſacrifices and divine ſervice, was content and willing, that the charge of ſo diſtant a province ſhould not befall unto him by caſting lots) is not able to performe that, now when Annibal is halfe defeated, and his heart almoſt broken, which your ſelfe was ſufficient to effect, when Annibal ſquared it out, and braved all Italie like a conquerour. But ſet the caſe, and ſuppoſe and ſay, that by this courſe which I meane to take, the warre be never the ſooner brought to an end: yet ſurely it were for the honor of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have among forrain princes and States abroad, that they may ſee and know, that our hearts ſerve us, not onely to defend Italie, but alſo to offend Affricke.
 And that it might be neither thought and beleaved, nor ſpoken and noiſed abroad in the world, how no Roman captaine durſt adventure that which Annibal hath already dared and done: and when as in the former Punicke war, when all the quarrell was for Sicilie, our armies and armadaes ſo often aſſailed Affricke; now that Italie is in queſtion, Affricke ſhould lie ſtill, and be at reſt. Nay rather let Italie be at repoſe and quiet now at laſt, after ſo long travell and affliction, & let Affricke C in her turne bee fired and forraied another while. Let the Romane campe bee pitched, rather under the very walls and gates of Carthage, than wee ſee once againe from our walls the trench and rampier of our enemies, to inveſt our cittie. Let Affricke be the ſet place and ſeat of the war, let fright and flight, forraying and harrying of countries, revolt and rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that follow war, which have lien heave upon us theſe fourteene yeeres, turne from us thither. It ſhall content and ſuffice mee to have ſpoken as touching State-matters and the Commonweale, of the warre preſently in hand; and concerning the provinces and their government, now in queſtion and conſultation. For it would require a long and tedious diſcouſe, and the ſame impertinent altogether unto you, if as Fabius hath deſaced and depraved mine acts in Spaine, ſo I likewiſe ſhould diſgrace him and diminith his glorie, and ſet out D my ſelfe and mine owne reputation with goodly and magnificall words. But my LL. I will do neither the one nor the other. And if in nothing els, yet at leaſtwiſe, yong man as I am, I will in modeſtie and government of my tongue, goe beyond him as old and auncient a perſonage as he is.
 Thus have I lived, & thus have I carried my ſelfe in all mine actions, that without blaſing of mine owne praifes, I can ſoone content my ſelfe with that good opinion which you of your ſelves have conceived and entertained of me.

Scipio had audience given him, with leſſe indifference and patience, becauſe it was commonly voiced abroad, That if the Senate would not graunt him to have the province and empreſe of Affricke, he would immediately propound and put it to queſtion before the people. Whereupon Fulvius, a man that had bene foure times Conſull and Cenſor beſides, required the E Conſull to ſpeake his mind openly before the Senate, whether he would referre it unto the LL. there aſſembled, to determine of the provinces, and ſtand to that which they ſhould ſet down, or preterre the thing unto the people. When Scipio had made anſwere againe and ſaid, That hee would doe that which might be good and expedient for the ſervice of the Commonweale; then Fulvius replied upon him and ſaid: I demaund not this queſtion to you, as ignorant what either you would anſwere, or what you meant to doe. For I know full well, and you pretend no leſſe your ſelfe, that you doe but ſound the Senate, and ſeele rather how they are inclined, than to ſtand to any adviſe of theirs in good ſadneſſe. And in caſe wee doe not preſently graunt you the province according to your deſire, you have a bill framed already to preſent unto the bodie of the people and Communalitie. And therefore (quoth he) my maſters, yee that are Tribunes, I require your F aid and aſſiſtance, in that I forbear to ſpeake unto the point and deliver mine opinion; in this regard, becauſe I know that the Conſull will not approve & ratifie the ſame, howſoever the whole houſe ſhould go with me, and allow my ſentence. Hereupon aroſe ſome braule & debate among them, whiles the Conſull urged and enforced this point eſpecially, and ſaid, It was againſt all reaſon and equite, that the Tribunes ſhould enterpoſe their authoritie, and not permit every Senator

tour being requested to speake in his turne, for to deliver his mind and opinion. Then the Tribunes made a decree in this manner, If the Consull be content that the Senate shall determine of the Provinces, we will and commaund, that all men rest in that which the Senate shall ordeine and judge: neither will we suffer the same to be propounded unto the people: but if he be not content nor yeeld thereto, then we will assist him who shall refuse to speake to the matter. Then the Consull requested a daies respite to conferre with his Colleague, and so the morrow after he condescended to put all to the censure of the Senate. And in this wise were the provinces distributed and appointed: Vnto one of the Consuls Sicilie was assigned, and thirtie ships of warre, with brasse beake heads (even the same that C. Servilius the yeere before had the charge of) with commissiō also to passe over into Affrick, if he thought it were for the good of the Commonwealth. The other Consull had the government of the Brutij, and the managing of the warre against Anniball, with the power of that armie which L. Veturius or Q. Caelius had under their hand: & decreed it was that they two, namely, L. Veturius & Q. Caelius, should either cast lots, or agree between themselves who should remaine still in the Brutians country, to follow the warres there, with those two legions which the Consull left: and that whether of them chanced to have that province, his government should be prorogued and continued for another yeere. The rest of the Pretors also and Consuls, who were to governe any province, or to have the conduct of armies, had their commissions renewed and sealed againe for a longer terme. Now it fell to Q. Caelius his lot, to make warre together with the Consull, against Anniball in the Brutians country.

After this, ensued the games and playes of Scipio: which were exhibited and set forth, with great concourse of people, and exceeding applause and affectionate favour of the beholders. M. Pomponius Matho, and Q. Catulus were sent as Embassadors unto Delphos, to cary thither an offering and stately gift of the bootie and pillage of Asdruball: who presented there a crowne of gold weighing two hundred pound: also certaine counterseits resembling the spoiles, which were made of silver, amounting to a thousand pound weight. Scipio when he could nor get leave graunted to levie souldiers and take musters, which he greatly forced not of, obtained thus much yet, that he might have with him in his traine voluntarie souldiours: as also receive whatsoever the Allies would contribute and geve toward the building of new ships, because he had passed his word, that the citie should not be charged with setting out an Armada. And first and foremost, the States of Hetruria promised to help the Consull, every one according to their ability. The Carites came off, and graunted to purvey corne and all kinde of victuals for the mariners and sailors: the Populonians to provide yron: the Tarquinians to finde saile-cloth: the Volaterrans to send all tackling & furniture belonging to ships, and also corne: the Arretines to conferre thirtie thousand targets; as many murrions or head-peeces, besides javelins, darts, faulchions, launces and pikes, to the full number of fiftie thousand, as many of the one sort as of the other: also axes, spades and mattocks, bills, sithes, hookees, and sickles, meales, troughs and querne mills, as many as would serve to furnish fortie long ships or gallies: of wheate 120000 Modij, and all voyage provision for the Decurions, petie-captaines, Mariners and Ore-men by the way. The Perusines, the Clusines, the Rusellanes offered fire trees for the framing and making of the ships, and a great quantitie of corne. But for this worke, he occupied only the fire hewen out of the publike forests and wasts. All the States of Vmbria, the Nursines also, the Reatines, and Amiternines, and the whole country of the Sabines, made promise to help him to souldiers: the Marsi, the Peligni, and Marrutines, in great number came of their owne free will, and were enrolled to serve at sea in the navie. The Camertes, being allies and confederate to the Romanes, but not tied to any service, sent a brave companie of fixe hundred men well armed. And when as there were set out the keeles or botomes for thirtie ships, twentie Caravels of five course of ores, and ten of foure; himselfe in person plied the carpenters and shipwrights so, and set forward the worke, that 45 daies after the timber was brought out of the wood, the ships were finished, rigged, armed, and furnished with all things, and shot into the water. So to Sicilie he sailed with thirtie long ships of warre, having embarked therein almost seven thousand of voluntarie servitours, P. Licinius also for his part, came into the Brutians country unto the two consularie armies, of which he tooke unto him and chose that which L. Veturius the Consull had commaunded: and suffered Metellus to have the leading still of those legions, which had bene under his conduct before: supposing that he should more easilie employ them in service, because they

A they were acquainted alreadie with his manner of regiment and governance. The Pretours likewise went into their sundrie provinces. And because money was wanting for to defray the charges of the warres, the high Treasurers were commaunded to make sale of all that tract of the Campane countrey, which from the Greeke Fosse extendeth toward the sea. And there was graunted out a commissiō to give notice of those lands: and looke what ground forever belonged to any citizen of Capua, it was confiscate to the use of the people of Rome: and for a reward to him that gave such notice, there was assigned the tenth part of the monie, that the land was rated and priced at. Also Cn. Servilius the citie Pretour, had geven him in charge to take order that the Campanes should dwell where as they were allowed to inhabit, by vertue of a decree graunted forth by the Senate, and to punish those that dwelt elsewhere.

B In the same summer Mago the sonne of Amilcar, being departed from the lesse Balcare Iland, where he abode the winter season, and having embarked a chosen power of yong & lustie men, sailed over into Italie with a flecte of thirtie ships headed with brasse piked beakes, and many hulks of burden: and there he set aland his souldiours, to the number of twelve thousand footemen, and welneere two thousand horse: and with his sodaine comming surprised Genua, by reason that there lay no garisons in those parts to guard and defend the sea coasts. From thence he sailed along, and arrived in the river of the Alpine Ligurians, to see if he could by his comming raise some commotion & rebellion: The * Ingauni (a people of the Ligurians) fortun- * Of Albenga. ned to warre at that present with certaine mountainers the Epanterij. Whereupon Mago, having laid up and bestowed safe all the prizes & pillage that he had won in * Savoy, (a towne upon * Pua, or Savona. the Alpes) and left ten ships of warre riding in the river, for a sufficient guard, and sent away the rest to Carthage for to keepe the sea coasts at home, (because there ran a common rumor, that Scipio would passe the seas, and over into Affrick) himselfe after he had concluded a league and amitie with the Ingauni (whose favour he more affected and esteemed than the others) set in hand to assaile the mountainers. Besides, his power increased dayly: for that the Frenchmen flocked unto him from all parts, upon the noyle and voyce of his name. Intelligence hereof was geven to the Senate by the letters of Sp. Lucretius: who were with these newes exceedingly troubled and perplexed, for feare least they had rejoyced in vaine for the death of Asdruball, and the defeature of his armie two yeare before; in case there should arise from thence another warre as great and dangerous as the other, differing in nothing els but the exchange of the Generall.

D And therefore they gave order and direction both to M. Livius the Proconsull, to come forward with his armie of Voluntaries out of Tuskanie, into Ariminum: and also unto Cn. Servilius the citie Pretour, (if he thought requisite and expedient for the Commonwealth) to commit the two legions of citizens attending about Rome, to whomsoever he pleased, for to be commaunded, and led forth of the citie: So M. Valerius Lavinius conducted those legions to Arretium.

About the same time, certaine hulks of the Carthaginians to the number of fourescore, were boured and taken about Sardinia, by Cn. Octavius, governor of that province. Celus writeth, that they were loden with corne and victuals sent unto Anniball. But Valerius reporteth, that as they were carying the pillage taken in Hetruria, and certaine prisoners of the Ligurian E mountainers, into Carthage, they were intercepted and surprized by the way. There was no memorable thing that yeere done in the Brutians countrey. The pestilence raigned as well amongst the Romanes as the Carthaginians, and they died thereof alike on both sides. Many the Carthaginian armie, besides the plague, were afflicted also with famine. Anniball passed all that sommer time neere unto the temple of Iuno Lacinia, where he built and reared an alter, and dedicated it with a glorious title of his worthie acts, engraven in Punick and Greeke letters.

THE XXIX. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the nine and twentieth Booke.

*A*ims Lalius being sent from Scipio out of Sicilie into Africke, brought from thence a huge bootie, and declared unto Scipio the credence and message that hee had from M. Asanissus, who complained of him, that he had not as yet, passed over with his fleet into Africke. The warre in Spaine which Indibilis had raised, was dispatched: himselfe slaine in the field: and M. Andonius was delivered by his owne men into the Romanes hands that demanded him of them. Mago who was in France and Liguria, had out of Africke sent unto him, both a great power of souldiours, and also money to wage aids: with a commission and precept to ioyne himselfe, unto Anniball. Scipio crossed the sea from Saracoe into the Bruttii, and recovered the cittie Locri, after he had discomfited the garrison there, and put to flight Anniball. Peace was concluded with Philip. The goddesse Dame Ideia was brought solemnly to Rome from Pessinus, by occasion of a prophesie, said in the bookes of Sybilla to this effect: That then the forreine enemy might be driven out of Italie, when Dame Cybele of Ida was brought to Rome. And to the Romanes she was delivered by Attalus king of Asia. A thicke stone it was, and nothing else, which the inhabitants called the mother of the gods. P. Scipio Nasica, the sonne of that Cneus who was killed in Spaine, iudged by the Senate a right good man, one that was very young, & had not been yet so much as Questor, was he that received her: for it was by the Oracle imported, that the said goddesse should be received by the best man of the cittie, & so dedicated. The Locrians sent their Embassadors to Rome, to complaine of the outrage and crueltie of Q. Pleminius the Lieutenant: in that he had unrightfully taken away the money consecrated to Proserpina, and unrightfully forced their wives and children. Pleminius was brought bound with chaines to Rome, and there died in prison. There was a false rumour of Pub. Scipio (Pro-consull in Sicilie) and spread as farre as to the citie, that he should spend his time there in riot. Whereupon there were sent certaine messengers from the Senate, far to enquire & see whether these reports were true. And Scipio being cleared from all infamie, by the permission and good leave of the Senate, sailed over into Africke. Syphax affianced and wedded the daughter of Asdruball the sonne of Gisco: and thereupon renounced cleane the amitie which he had contracted with Scipio. M. Asanissus the king of the M. Asyrians, while he served in the warre in defence of the Carthaginians quareled within Spaine, after he had lost his father Gala, was withal, disesteemed of his kingdom. And when he had often times sought to recover it againe by warre, he was in certaine battailes vanquished by Syphax king of the Numidians, and utterly deprived of his roiall dignitie. So with two hundred horsemen he ioynd as a banished person with Scipio: and with him, immediately in the first battaile, he slew Hanno the sonne of Amilcar, together with a great number of his men. Scipio upon the coming of Asdruball and Syphax, who were almost one hundred thousand strong, was compelled to breake up the siege of Utica: and so he fortified a standing campe for winter habitation. Sempronius the Consull had anfortunate battaile against Anniball in the territorie of Croton. The Consuls held a solemn review and purging of the cittie, and numbered the people: in which survey taken, there were assayed in their bookes 225000 citizens. Betwene the two Consuls, M. Lanius and Claudius Nero, there fell out a notable discord: for C. Claudius took from Lanius (companion with him in office) his horse of service: for that hee had bene sometimes condemned by the people of Rome, and driven into exile. And Lanius againe did the semblable by him, because he had bene false witness against him, and not dealt bona fide with him, considering the reconciliation betwene them, wherein they seemed to be made good friends againe. The same Lanius left all the tribes but one, disfranchised, and caused them to pay tribute as no denizens, for that they had both condemned him being innocent, and also made him a Consull and Consul afterwards.

*S*cipio after he was arrived in Sicilie, disposed his voluntarie souldiours in order, and enroled them by Centuries. Over and besides them, he had about him three hundred lustie tall fellows, for the floure of their age & strength of bodie, the bravest men of all others: but they wist not themselves for what purpose they were reserved; being neither assigned to any colours under a captain, nor so much as armed at all. Then he made choise from out of the whole manhood and youth of Sicilie, three hundred men of armes, such as for birth and wealth, were the very principall and best in all the Iland, who were to passe over with him into Africke: and he appointed them a day, upon which they should all present themselves in readinesse, furnished like to be yrkesome unto them, and to bring with it much trouble, many difficulties and daungers, as well by sea as land. The consideration and feare hereof, mightily disquieted not onely the parties themselves, but also their parents and kinsfolke. Now when the day appointed was come, they shewed their horses and armour. Then Scipio made a speech unto them & said, That he was given to understand, that certeine Sicilian horsemen stood in great feare & dread of this soulderie, as being a fore and painfull peece of service: In case then (quoth he) there bee any of you so minded and disposed indeed, I had rather you would now presently be known thereof unto me, and confesse at once, than hereafter to whine and complaine, and so to prove lazie lubbers and unprofitable souldiours to the common-wealth. And therefore utter your minds in plaine tearmes, and I will be content to heare you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them tooke a good hart & said flatly, That if it lay in his choise freely to do what he would, he was altogether unwilling to serve: then Scipio answered him again in this maner, For as much as (my youth) thou hast not dissimuled thy hearts griefe, but spoken out what thou thinkest, I will soon depure one in thy turne, unto whom thou maist deliver thy armour, thy horse, and other furniture of warfare, and whom thou shalt forthwith have home with thee, there to traine, teach, and exercise him, after thou hast given him thy horse and armour. The young man was glad hereof, and accepted the offer upon that condition: and so he assigned unto him one of those three hundred above said, whom he kept about himselfe unarmed: When the rest saw that horseman in this manner discharged of his service, and that with the favour and good will of the L. Generall: every man then began to speake for himselfe, & to make excuses, and tooke others in their stead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians, were substituted as many Romane horsemen, without any expenses at all of the state. And the Sicilians themselves had the charge of instructing & training them up. For the Generall had made an edict and proclamation, That whosoever did not so, should serve himselfe in person. This proved by report, a brave cornet of horsemen above the rest; and in many battailes performed right good service to the common-weale. After this, hee tooke a survey of the legions or footmen: and all those who had borne armes longest in the wars he selected forth, especially such as had bene employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For those he well wist to have bin brought up under the best discipline of warfare, & also by reason of the long siege of Saracoe, to be most skilful in assaulting of cities. For now they were no smal matters that hee had in his head, but he plotted even the very destruction and ruine of great Carthage. After this, he divided his armie and placed severall forces in sundrie townes. The cities of Sicilie hee enjoyed to provide corne; hee made spare of that which was brought out of Italie; the old ships he newly repaired and rigged, and with them he sent Lilius into Africke for to prey upon the countrie and fetch in prizes; the new which rid at Panormus hee drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upon drie ground, and be seasoned, because they were made in haist of greene timber. When he had prepared all things necessarie for warre, hee came to the cittie of Saracoe, which as yet was not in good order and well quieted, since the great troubles of the late warres. For the Greekes made claime for their goods, granted unto them by the Senat of Rome, which certaine of the Italian nation deteined and withheld from them by the same violence, wherewith in time of warre they had possessed themselves thereof. He supposing it meete and requisite, to mainteine above all things, the credit of the state; partly by vertue of an edict & commandement, and partly by a civill course and processe of law against such as were obstinate and avowed their wrongs done, hee forced them to make restitution to the Syracusians. This act of his, pleased not onely them, but also all the states of Sicilie; and therefore they were more willing willing and forward to helpe him in the warres.

The same summer there arose in Spain great troubles, raised by the meanes of Indibilis the Ilergete, for no other occasion or reason in the world, but because in regard of the high admiration of Scipio, all other captaines besides whatsoever, were but despised. Him they supposed to be the onely Generall that the Romanes had left, now that all the rest were slaine by Anniball. And hereupon it was (thought they) that when the two Scipios were killed, they had no other to send into Spaine but him: and afterwards, when the wars grew hot in Italie, he was the onely man sent for over, to match with Anniball. And over and besides that, the Romanes had now in Spaine no captaines at all, but in bare name & shew: the old experienced armie also was from thence withdrawn. All things are out of frame, and in great confusion, and none there, but a disordered sort of raw freshwater soldiours. And never they looked to have again the like occasion and opportunitie to recover Spaine out of their hands. For hitherto they had been ever in subjection to that day, either to the Carthaginians or the Romanes, and not alwaies to the one or the other, by turns, but otherwhiles to both at once. And like as the Carthaginians have beene driven out by the Romanes, so may the Romanes bee expelled by the Spaniards, if they would hold together. So that in the end Spaine being freed from all forraine warre, might be restored for ever to the ancient customes and rights of the countrie. With these and such like suggestions and discourses, hee solicited and raised not onely his owne subjects and countriemen, but the Ausitanes also, a neighbour-nation, yea, and other States and citties that bordered upon his and their confines; so as within few daies there assembled together into the territorie of the Sederanes (according to an edict published abroad) thirte thousand foot, and fast upon foure thousand horsemen.

The Romane captaines likewise for their part, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, least by neglect of the first beginning, the warre might grow to a greater head, joined their forces together, and marching through the countrie of the Ausitanes, as peaceably as if they had ben friends, (notwithstanding they were knowne enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped, and pitched themselves within three miles of the enemies. At the first they assailed by way of Embassage to deale with them, and to perswade them to lay aside all armes and hostilitie: but they laboured in vaine. Afterwards, when as the Spanish horsemen gave charge suddenly upon certaine Romanes that were a foraging, the Romanes also sent out from their Stations and corps de guard, their Cavallerie to rescue: so the horsemen skirmished, but no memorable act to speake of, was effected on the one side or the other. The next morrow by sun rising, the enemies all shewed themselves armed and in order of battell, and braved the Romanes within a mile of their campe. The Ausitanes were marshalled in the maine battaile; the Ilergetes in the right point, and certaine other Spanish nations of base & meane account in the left: between both those wings and the battell, of either hand they left certaine wide and void places, whereas when the time served they might put forth their horsemen. The Romanes having embattailed and put themselves in array after their old and usuall manner, yet in this one thing followed the example of the enemies, in leaving out certaine open waies between the legions for the men of armes to passe through. But Lentulus supposing, that the use of the horse service would be advantageous to that part, which first should send out their Cavallerie into the battaile of the enemies, that lay so open with spaces betweene, gave commaundement to Ser. Cornelius a knight Marshal or Tribune, to will and charge the Cavallerie to set to with their horses, and to enter those open lanes betweene the enemies battaillons. And himselfe having sped but badly in beginning the fight with footmen so rashly, staid no longer, but untill hee had brought the thirteenth legion, (which was set in the left wing opposite to the Ilergetes) out of the reeward into the vaward, for to succour and strengthen the twelfth legion, which already began to shrinke and give ground. After that once the skirmish there was equall and fought on even hand, hee advanced forward to L. Manlius, who in the forefront of the battell was busie in encouraging his men, and sending supplies and succours into all parts where hee saw needfull: shewing unto him, that all was well and hole in the left point, and that he had sent out Cornelius, who with his horsemen, would like a tempestuous storme come upon them, and soon overcast and bespread the enemies round about. The word was not so soon spoken, but the Roman horsemen were ridden within the thickest of the enemies, and not onely disordered the arraies and companies of the footmen, but also at once shut up the waies and passages, that the Spaniards could not make out with their horsemen.

A horsemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horsebacke, alight on foot. The Romane Generals seeing the ranks and files of the enemies disarrayed, themselves in fright and feare, and their ensignes waving up and downe every way; fell to exhorting, yea, to entreating of their owne infanterie, to recharge them with all their force, whiles they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not suffer them to come into order, and reenforce the battell againe. And surely the barbarous people had never beene able to abide their violent impression, but that Indibilis himselfe their prince and lord, together with the men of armes that were now dismounted on foot, made head against the ensignes of the footmen in the vaward. Whereupon ensued a sharpe and cruell fight for a good while. At length, when as they that fought about their prince (who first, although hee were halfe dead, yet stood his ground, and afterwards with a javeline was nailed to the earth) were overwhelmed with darts, and slaine; then they began to flie on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, because both the horsemen had no time nor space to recover their horses, and mount upon them againe, and also the Romanes pressed so hotely upon them after they were once discomfited, and never gave over, untill they had stript the enemies quite out of their campe. So there died that day thirteene thousand Spaniards, and well neere eight hundred were taken prisoners. Of Romanes and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them, and those especially in the left point. The Spaniards, that either were driven out of their campe, or escaped out of the battaile, first ran scattered and dispersed over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his owne cittie where hee dwelt.

C Then Mandonius summoned them to a generall counsell: where they all bewailed their calamities and miseries, greatly blamed the authors of the warre, and agreed in the end to send their Embassadors to give up their armes, & to yeeld their bodies. These having excused themselves and laid the whole fault upon Indibilis and the rest of the Princes who were the stirrers of the war, and were for the most part slaine themselves for their labour in the field, yeelded up their armour and themselves, and received this answer from the Romanes: That they should bee received to mercie, and their submission accepted, if they would deliver alive into their hands Mandonius and the rest that were the breakers of peace. Otherwise, they threatened to lead their forces into the territories of the Ilergetes and Ausitanes, and so forward, of the other nations their complices in that rebellion. With this answer the Oratours departed, and related the same in the council assembled. Where Mandonius and the rest of their lords were apprehended and delivered to the Romanes for to be punished and executed accordingly. So the States of Spaine obtained peace againe: and a double tribute for that year was imposed upon them, and they enjoined to provide corne to serve the armie sixe months, besides souldiours liveries, short coats, and side caskes: and they received hostages welneere of thirte cities. Thus the troubles and rebellions of Spaine being begun and ended after this manner, without any great ado within few daies, all the force of the warre turned upon Affricke.

C. Laelius being arrived in the night at Hippo Roiall, by the breake of day, led forth with banner displayed in order of battell, all his souldiours and mariners, for to harrey and spoile the countrie. And finding the inhabitants there retchlesse and carelesse, and living in securitie as in time of peace, they did much hurt and annoied them sore. Whereupon the newes went in post to Carthage, set all on a hurrie, and put them in exceeding great feare. For it was reported, that the Romane armada was arrived, and that Scipio the Generall was landed (for the rumor ran before, how he was passed over alreadie into Sicilie.) And because they neither desiered the ships, nor discovered certainly what power of men invaded and spoiled the countrie, they thought the most and doubted the worst, as fear commonly maketh every thing more than it is. And so at first they were only affrighted and terrified; but afterwards they grew melancholike and troubled in spirit in these tearmes, to think, That fortune should so much be chaunged, that they, who but a while before as noble conquerours, had lien encamped with an armie before the walls of Rome, defeated so many hosts of enemies, and either by fine force or meere love, held all the States of Italie under their signorie, should now themselves see the wheele so turne about, as they were like shortly to behold the wasting and spoiling of Affricke, & the citie of Carthage besieged: a thing that they were never able to endure with that valour & resolution, nor to abide with such strength as the Romanes had. For the Romanes had ever the Commons of Rome; they had alwaies the youth of Latium readie at hand; who still increased more and more the new fire, and daily grew in number to make supplie, & to repaire and furnifh out ſo many armieſ that were deſeited, G Vheras, their naturall people were neither in towne nor countrie ſit for ſervice, their aidſ were waged & hired for mony from among the Africaneſ, a nation like to turn upon any accident, & to change with every gale and puffe of vain hope, & were beſides falſe & unfaithfull in their promiſe.

 For now the kingſ alreadie Syphax and Maſaniſſa, the one upon conference with Scipio iſ ſecredly alienated from uſ in hart, and the other openly revolted in action, and become our moſt deadly enemy: ſo that, there remaineth neither help nor hope for uſ at all in any place. For neither Mago iſ able in Gaule to make any commotions and rebellion, nor yet to joyne with Anniball.
 And as for Anniball himſelf, he weareth apace, and decaieſh daillie both in fame & reputation, and alſo in ſtrength & forcible meanes. When their mindſ being thus diſquieted upon thoſe freſh & preſent tidings, they were fallen to bewaile & lament their wofull ſtate, the inſtant danger recalled them againe to conſult by what meanes they might withſtand the imminent perils. So they thought good to take muſters in all haſt both in the citie and the countrieſ by, to ſend ſome to levie and wage the aidſ of the Affricaneſ, to fortiſie their citie, to bring in ſtore of graine, to provide weapons and armor, to rig their navie, and to ſend it out to Hippo, for to encounter the Romane Armada. Whiles they were deviſing theſe courſes, there came at laſt a poſt with newes, that it was Lelius and not Scipio who waſ ſet aſhore; that there waſ landed no greater power than for to make rodes into the countrie for bootieſ only: and as for the maine ſtrength of the whole armie, it remained ſtill in Sicilie. So they had ſome reſpit to breath themſelves, and began to addreſſe their Embaſſieſ to Syphax and to other Princeſ, for to eſta bliſh and confirme peace and league betweene them. They diſpatched otherſ alſo to Philip, who ſhould make promiſe unto him of two hundred talentſ of ſilver, in caſe he would take the ſeaſ and paſſe over either into Sicilie or Italie. Meſſengerſ alſo were ſent aſ farre aſ into Italie unto their owne Generallſ ſerving there, to will them to raiſe what troubleſ they could poſſibly, for to keepe Scipio a worke, and hold him back from coming into Africk. And unto Mago were ſent not only thoſe meſſengerſ aforeſaid, but alſo five and twentie long ſhipſ of warre, fixe thouſand footemen, eight hundred horſemen, ſeven Elephants, and great ſtore of treaſure beſides for to hire aidſ, whereby he might advance forward with hiſ forceſ neerer to Rome, and joyne with Anniball. Theſe prepa-rationſ were making, and theſe courſes deviſing at Carthage, when aſ Maſaniſſa upon the bruit that went of the arrivall of the Romane ſceere, began to ſtart up and rouſe himſelfe; and accompanied with ſome few horſemen, came unto Lelius, buſy in driving ſtill great bootieſ out of the countrie, which he found altogether diſfurniſhed of armour, and unprovided of guardſ and garriſonſ for defence. He much complained that Scipio waſ ſo ſlack in hiſ affairſ, and grieved that he had not paſſed over ere this time with an armie into Africk, whiles the Carthaginians were thus affrighted, whiles Syphax waſ troubled with the warreſ of the bordererſ: of whom he waſ thus much perſuaded, that if he might have reſting time to compoſe hiſ owne affairſ to hiſ mind, he would not continue faſt unto the Romanes, nor deale in any thing faithfullly & ſoundly with them: willing him to ſolicit Scipio, yea and to ſpur him on and importune him not to ſtand longer at a bay and make delaieſ. And for hiſ owne part, notwithstanding he were diſſeaſed of hiſ fatherſ kingdome, yet he would be readie to aſſiſt him with ſuch a power of foote and horſe aſ were worth god amercy: adviſing Lelius withall not to make any longer ſtay in Africk, for aſ much aſ he beleevved verily, that there waſ a ſceete alreadie ſet out from Carthage, with which in the abſence of Scipio, he might not with ſaferie enter into conſlict and battaile. After this communication, Maſaniſſa waſ diſmiſſed, and Lelius the next day loſed from Hippo, with hiſ ſhipſ laden with pillage and priſeſ: and being returned into Sicilie, declared unto Scipio the counſell and credence that he had from Maſaniſſa.

About the very ſame time thoſe ſhipſ which were ſent from Carthage to Mago, coaſting along the Albignanniſ and the Ligurianſ, arrived at Genua. It fortun'd that Mago at that time, lay with hiſ ſceete in thoſe partſ: who upon the wordſ of the meſſengerſ, and the commiſſion to raiſe aſ great forceſ aſ poſſibly he could, immediatly held a counſell of the Frenchmen and Ligurianſ; for of both nationſ there were great numberſ in thoſe coaſtſ. Where before them all he declared how he waſ ſent unto them for to ſet them at libertie: and how (aſ they might ſee themſelves) to that effect he waſ furniſhed with new aid and ſuccour from home. But what forces, and how great an armie waſ needfull for the managing of the war in hand, it lay in them to determine. Aſ for himſelfe, firſt and formoſt he knew full well, that there were two Romane ar-mieſ

A mieſ abroad, the one in France, the other in Tuſcane: and that Sp. Lucretiuſ would joynt with M. Liviuſ: and therefore they themſelves were to put many a thouſand in armes, for to make head againſt two Generallſ, and two compleat armieſ of Romanes. The Frenchmen made an-ſwere again, That their will waſ good enough, and they had an exceeding deſire to compaſſe and effect the deſignement intended: but for aſ much aſ the Romanes had one camp within their confines, and another in Tuſcane neere adjoining, and in mainer within ſight; if peradventure they ſhould be ſcene in the action to aid the Carthaginians; incontinently both armieſ, aſ well the one aſ the other would in all manner of hoſtilitie invade their territorieſ: and therefore they requested him to deſire of the Gaulſ ſuch thingſ, wherein they might ſtand him in ſteed ſecretly under hand. Aſ for the Ligurianſ, becauſe the Romanes lay far enough off encamped from B their landſ and citieſ, they might diſpoſe well enough of themſelves aſ they liſt: and therefore it waſ good reaſon that they ſhould put their young and able men in armes, and beare a part in the managing of the warre. The Ligurianſ reſuſed not. Only they craved reſpit of two monethſ, for to take the muſters. In the meane time Mago, having ſent away the Gaulſ, cloſely took up and preſt ſouldiourſ throughout their countrey townſ for money. And from the Stateſ of France, there waſ ſent ſecretly proviſion of victualſ of all ſortſ unto him.
Marcuſ Liviuſ led hiſ armie of Voluntarieſ out of Tuſcane into France, and having united hiſ forceſ unto Lucretiuſ hiſ power, waſ readie to receive and welcome Mago, if haply he removed out of the Ligurianſ countrey neerer to the citie of Rome: but in caſe Mago kept himſelfe quiet in a corner under the Alpes, he minded alſo himſelfe there to keepe hiſ ſtanding leaguer C about Ariminum, for the guard and defence of Italie.

After the returne of C. Leliuſ out of Africk, both Scipio waſ prick'd forward by the inſtigationſ and perſuaſionſ of Maſaniſſa: and alſo hiſ ſouldiourſ, ſeeing great prizeſ brought out of the enemyſ land, and every ſhip freight therewith; were mightily incenſed and ſet on fire with a burning deſire to be transported over thither with all ſpede poſſible. But aſ they were plotting about this enterpriſe of greater importance, they thought alſo upon a leſſer that came betweene, namely, the winning againe of the citie of Locri, which in the generall revolt of all Italie, had ſided alſo with the Carthaginians. The firſt hope that they conceived both to affect and effect this enterpriſe, grew upon a very ſmall matter: by occaſion that in the Brutianſ countrey, the whole manner of ſervice waſ performed by way of rob-D bing and roving, rather than by any ordinarie courſe of warre. The Numidianſ firſt began, and the Brutij ſoone tooke it up and ſeconded them: not ſo much becauſe they would keepe the Carthaginians companie, and do aſ they did; but for that of their owne naturall inclination they were proane, and readie enough to follow that courſe. At laſt the Romane ſouldiourſ alſo, infected aſ it were by their example, tooke delight in robberieſ: and ſo farre forth aſ they might have leave of their captainſ, would make inrodeſ into the territorieſ of their enemyſ. It fortun'd ſo, that when ſome of them were gon abroad a boothaling, certaine Locrianſ were intercepted, and brought away with them to Rhegium. In which number of captiveſ, were ſome carpenterſ and malonſ, who aſ it chaunced, were hired to worke for the Carthaginians in the caſtle of Locri. Theſe were diſcovered and known by certain E greatmen, and the principall citizeſ of the Locrianſ, who hapned then to live aſ baniſhed perſonſ in Rhegium: ſuch aſ by the contrarie faction that banded with Anniball and had delivered Locri into hiſ handſ, were driven out of the citie. Theſe men ſell to queſtioning with them (aſ commonly their manner iſ, who have bene long out of their owne countie) of many matterſ, and among the reſt, how all thingſ ſared at home: who told them all accordingly; & therewith, put them in ſome good hope, that if they might bee ransomed, ſet at large, and ſent home againe, they would betray the caſtle unto them: for aſ much aſ within it they dwelt, & the Carthaginianſ put them in truſt of all thingſ there. They therefore, aſ men that were wonderfull deſirous to returne thither, aſ well for love of their native countrie, aſ for to bee revenged of their adverſarieſ, out of hand paid their ranſome: and after they had given order how to worke F the feat, and in what ſort; aſ alſo agreed upon the ſigneſ & tokenſ which they ſhould marke from on high aſ farre off, they were ſent backe againe. Then the exiled Locrianſ repaired unto Scipio at Saracoe, with whom alſo were otherſ of the baniſhed perſonſ of Locri: & there they related unto him the promiſeſ of the captiveſ aforeſaid, and put the Conſul in very good hope that the effect would bee correſpondent to their deſignement. With them were ſent two Tribuneſ or Marſhals, thals, to wit, M. Sergius and P. Matienus, with commission to conduct three thousand souldiours from Rhegium to Locri. Letters also were dispatched unto Q. Pleminius the Viz-pretour, for to be assistant in this action. Who being departed from Rhegium, and carrying with them scaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the castle wall foretold unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to those that were to betray the castle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readinesse also, and looking wistly for them, put downe likewise ladders of their owne made, for the purpose; and in many places at once received them that limbed up so as, before there was any alarme heard, they set upon the watch of the Carthaginians, fast a sleepe as they were, and distrusting no such matter: who first were heard to grone as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noise and keepe a running and much adoe, upon their suddaine starting from sleepe, all the whiles that they wist not what the occasion was. At length, upon the discovery of the matter, one man wakened another, and every one called aloud to arme; crying out, that the enemies were within the castle, and the watchmen slaine. And without question, the Romanes had bene put to the worke and defeated quite, being farre fewer in number than the enemies, but that there was an outcrie & shout set up by them that were without the fortresse; which to long as men knew not from whence it came, put them in great feare: & the tumult besides by night made every smal & vain thing much greater than it was. By means wherof, the Carthaginians astonied (as if all places had bene full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betooke themselves into the other fortresse (for two there were distant not farre asunder.) The townesmen kept possession of the citie, as the prise and guerdon in the mids, for the winners. But out of the two castles there were light skirmishes every day. Q. Pleminius was capitaine of the fort and garrison of the Romanes, and Amilcar over the Carthaginians: and both parts increased their strength, by aids that they had comming unto them from the places adjoining. Vntill at last Anniball thewed himselfe in person: and no doubt the Romanes had never bene able to hold out, but that the whole multitude of the Locrenians fore galled and grieved with the proud government and the covetous polling of the Carthaginians, tooke part with the Romanes. When intelligence came to Scipio, that the Romanes were distressed in Locri, and that Anniball himselfe was advancing thither: for feare least the garrison also should be in some hazard (as having no readie means to retire from thence) himselfe leaving at Messana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, passed over from thence with his vessels downe the water, when he espied the current and the tide together to serve for a fare. Likewise Anniball having sent out a vauntcurour from the river Butrotus (which is not farre from the citie Locri) to signifie unto his men, that by day light they should give a hote charge with all their might and maine upon the Locrenians & Romans both, whiles hee himselfe made an assault upon the towne behind, not looking for him, but wholly turned away and amused upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning hee found the skirmish begun, he was not willing to put himselfe within the castle, for feare of pestering with over great a companie the place so streight and of so small receipt: and for to skale the walls they had brought no ladders with them. So causing all their carriages and packes to be piled tip in one heape together: hee presented all his footmen in battaile array before the citie, to terrifie his enemies withall: and with the Numidian horsemen hee made a bravado under the wals, and rode about the citie. While the ladders and other ordinance meet to give an assault, were in preparing and making readie, hee approached on horsebacke neere to the wall, for to view on which part above the rest, he might give the assault: and there he was shot with a quarell discharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which hapned to be planted next unto him. And being affrighted at this so dangerous an occurrent, he commaunded to found the retreat, & fortified his campe aloofe without the perill and shot of any dart. Now was the Romane fleet from Messana arrived at Locri, and had the day afore them: so as they were all set a land, and entered the citie before the sunne setting. The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmish out of the castle: and Anniball being now provided of ladders, and having all things else in readinesse needfull for the assault, came under the wals: with that, all upon a suddaine the Romanes set open a gate and sallied out upon him, who feared nothing lesse than any such accident: & thus setting upon them at unawares, slew two hundred of them. Anniball perceiving that the Consull was there, retired with the rest into the campe: and after hee had sent a messenger to them that were within the castle, willing them to shift for themselves, in the night season hee dislodged and departed. They also who were in the fort, after they had set on fire the houses which were in their keeping,

A keeping, of purpose by that tumult to cause the enemy to make some stay and tarry behind, ran away in manner of a rout, & before it was night with good footman ship overtook their owne companie. Scipio seeing as well this castle quit by the enemy, as their campe also empty, called the Locrenses to a generall assembly, and gave them a sharpe checke, & rebuked them for their revolt. The principall captaines and authours of that trespass hee put to death; and gave away their goods to the chiefe heads of the other faction, in reward and consideration of their singular fidelitie to the Romanes. But as concerning the publicke state of the Locrians, hee said hee would neither make nor medle therewith, either in giving to them, or taking ought at all from them. But willed them to send their Embassadors to Rome, and looke what the Senate would award in equitie, that fortune they should abide. This one thing he was well assured of, that how ill soever they had deserved of the people of Rome, yet they should live in better condition under the signorie of the Romanes, provoked to anger as they were, than they had already under the government of Carthaginians, pretending love and amitie as they did.

Then himselfe in person cut over to Messana with those forces that he brought with him, leaving Pleminius his Lieutenant, and that power that woon the castle, in garrison for the defence of the citie. The citizens of Locri had been so proudly misused, and so cruelly handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolted from the Romanes, that it seemed they could be content to abide any small wrongs, not onely patiently but also willingly, and in manner with a glad heart. But so farre now exceeded Pleminius, Amilcar the former capitaine of the garrison; so far went the Romane garrison souldiours, before the Carthaginians in wickednesse and avarice, that a man would have thought they had strove together who should passe the other in sinful vice & ungodlinesse, and not in feats of armes and prowess. For neither capitaine nor souldiour forbore to practise upon the poore townesmen any enormous facts, which are wont to make the great and mightie men odious unto the poore and meaner persons. They wrought and committed shameful villanies upon their very bodies; upon their wives and children. And their greedie avarice so farre proceeded; that they could not hold their hands from spoiling and robbing the very religious and sacred temples. Infomuch, as among other holy churches which they polluted, they met even with the rich treasure of Proserpina, which had lien still in all ages, and untouched by all others: save onely it was reported to have bene pilled by Pyrrhus; who indeed carried away the spoile of her, but hee deerly bought it, and paid full sweetly for that sacriledge. And therefore like as before time the kings ships shaken with tempests, and torne and split with the rage of the sea, brought nothing at all in that wrecke safe to land, but onely that sacred monie of the goddesse, which they had stolen and carried away: even so at this present, the very same monie (but in another kind of calamitie and miserie) brought upon all them that were tainted in that wicked action of robbing the temple, a strange and franticke madnesse; which caused captaine against captaine, and souldiour against souldiour, to fare as if they were starke wood, and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Pleminius had the cheefe rule and commaund of all, As for the souldiours, some were under him, such as himselfe had brought from Rhegium; others were commaunded by the Tribunes or Colonels. Now it chanced that one of Pleminius his souldiours had stolne a silver cup out of a townesmans house, and ran away when hee had done; and the owners after him with huy and crie, and fortunated to come in the way, and to meet with Sergius and Matienus the two Tribunes or Colonels, full in the face. Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commaundement of the Tribunes; and thence arose first a braile, and some hard words were dealt between; and from them consequently they went to open clamors and loud outcries, untill at length there grew a very fray between the souldiours of Pleminius & of the Tribunes: and according as they came still one or other in time to helpe their own side, both the number & the riot increased at once. In the end, Pleminius his men went away with the blowes, and moned themselves into Pleminius, running to him with open mouth and great indignation, shewing their bloudie wounds: and reporting besides, what opprobrious words to his disgrace had passed against him without spare, in the time of those brawling fits. Hereupon in a great choler & boiling heate of bloud, hee gat him forth of doores in all the hast; convened the Tribunes before him, and commaunded them to be stripped naked, and the rods to be brought forth readie for to scourge them. But whiles there was some time spent in turning them out of their apparell and uncasing them (for they struggled and made resistance, and called to their souldiours for helpe) all at once they came thick about them (for very lustie they were upon their fresh victorie) & ran from from all places, as if the alarme bell had bene rung against the comming of some enemies. But when they saw once the bodies of their Tribunes tewed with rods, then they fell into farre more furious rage and a very fit of madnesse: and thus incensed as they were, without all regard, not only of the reverent majestie of authoritie, but also of common humanitie, they fell upon the Lieutenant himselfe, after they had most pittiously beaten and evill intreated his Lictours and officers about him. Then having singled him out apart from his ministers & sergents, they cruelly mangled him, cut off his nose, cropt his eares, and left him for dead. Newes hereof came to Messana, and within few daies Scipio highed him apace to Locri in a gallie directed with six banks of oares: who after due examination and hearing of the cause between Pleminius and the Tribunes, acquit Pleminius as innocent, and left him governour of the garrison in that place: but hee judged the Tribunes guiltie as malefactours, and caused them to be bound in chaines for to be sent to Rome unto the Senate: and so he returned to Messana, and from thence to Syracusa. Pleminius not able to over-rule his anger, and thinking that Scipio had dealt but coldly and negligently in the matter, and made too light of the injurie which hee had received, and not punished the offenders accordingly; and supposing that there was no man els able to make true estimate of the cause, but he that in his owne person had felt the indignitie and hainousnesse thereof; commaunded the Tribunes to be haled before him, and after he had put them to all the cruell torments, that any mans bodie is able to abide, he did them to death: and not satisfied either with their dolorous torture whiles they were quick, nor with taking their lives from them, cast their dead bodies forth into the fields, there to lye above ground unburied. The like crueltie he exercised upon the principall Burgeses of the Locrians, such as he heard say went to Scipio for to make complaint of his wrongs and injuries. And looke what foule and shamefull pranks he had plaid afore with his friends and allies, proceeding of lust and covetousnesse; the same now in his fell and furious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers sorts: so as he brought infamie, hatred and obloquie, not onely upon himselfe, but also made the world to thinke hardly, and to speake much shame of the Generall himselfe.

Now drew the time neere of the solemne election of Magistrates; when as there came letters to Rome from Pub. Licinius the Consull, the tenure whereof was to this effect: That himselfe and his armie were fore visited with a grievous sicknes: and that he could not possibly have stayed there, but that the violent contagion and influence of the same maladie, if not greater and more grievous, had not assailed the enemies. Seeing that therefore himselfe was not able to come unto the election, hee was minded, if it might so stand with the good liking of the Lords of the Senate, to nominate as Dictatour Q. Cecilius Metellus, for to hold the foresaid election. And as for the armie of Q. Cecilius, it was for the good of the Common-weale that it should be cassed and discharged, since that there was no employment of them at this present; considering that Anniball was retired & readie with his forces into his standing camp, and taken up his wintering harborough: and againe, the pestilence grew so hote in that leaguer of his, that if they were not discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the LL. of the Senate graunted out their commission unto the Consull, for to doe according as himselfe thought to stand either with his owne credite and trust committed unto him, or the benefit of the Commonweale.

At the very same time there was a certaine religious opinion that had possessed of a suddaine the whole citie, by occasion of a certaine prophesie found in the books of Sibylla. When search was made into them and they diligently perused, about the raining of stones, which happened so often that yeare. The Prophesie ran in this forme: At what time soever an enemy of a strange and forraigne countrey, shall happen to make warre upon Italie, hee may bee chased out of Italie and vanquished, if the goddesse dame Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Pessinus. This prophesie found by the Decemvirs, moved the Senate the more, for that, the Embassadors also who carried the oblation and present aforesaid to Delphos, related, That as they themselves sacrificed unto Pysbius Apollo, all the inwards of the beatt killed for sacrifice, appeared good, and shewed prosperitie: and the Oracle besides gave answer, That there was a farre greater victorie toward the people of Rome than that was, out of the spoiles wherof they brought gifts and offered to the god at this present. And for to make up and fully accomplish these hopes, they alleaged withall, how P. Scipio in demaunding the province of Affricke, did presage (as it were) before-hand in his mind the finall end of this warre. To the end therefore, that they might with more speed

A speed obtaine this honourable victorie thus foretoked, and offering (as it were) it selfe, by all luckie offerings of men and Oracles of the gods, they thought and devised some mean to transport the said goddesse to Rome.

The people of Rome in those daies was confedered with no States of Asia: howbeit the LL. calling to mind, how long age, upon occasion of a sicknesse, and to purchase health unto the people, Aesculapius was sent for likewise out of Greece, before it was joined with the citie of Rome in any league or societie; and considering withall, that there was some friendship & amitie begun already with king Attalus (in regard of the common warre against Philip) and that hee would bee readie to doe for the people of Rome, whatsoever lay in his power, they resolved to send unto him an honourable Embassage, to wit, M. Valerius Levinus, who had been twice Consull, and had warred in Greece; M. Cecilius Metellus, who had ben a Pretour, and Servius Sulpitius Galba: likewise an Aedile, and two late Questours, C. Tremelchius Flaccus and M. Valerius Falco. For these five, they assigned five Quinquereemes or Gallies of five rankes of oares, that according to the credite and dignitie of the people of Rome, they should make a voiage into those lands; with whom they were to win a reputation and majestie to the Romane name and State. These Embassadors, as they held on their course toward Asia, so soone as they were put a land at Delphos, repaired directly to the Oracle, for to know what good hope it might affourd unto them; and the people of Rome, of effecting that businesse and commission, about the which they were sent forth. And this answer by report, was returned to them again, That they should obtain their desire, and effectuate their purpose by the meanes of Attalus the king: advising them moreover, C That when they had conveyed the said goddesse downe to Rome, they should take order, that the very best man of all others in the citie, should give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pergamus they came unto the king. Who having courteously received & welcomed the Embassadors, conducted them into Phrygia to Pessinus, and delivered into their hands that sacred & holy stone, which the inhabitants of the countrey said, was the Mother of the gods; and willed them to carrie it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was sent backe from the other Embassadors to advertise them at Rome, that the goddesse was comming, and that they should seeke out the best man in all the citie, for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q. Cecilius Metellus nominated Dictatour by the Consull in the Brutians countrey, D against the solemne election of the magistrates. His armie was disbanded and cassed, and L. Veturius Philo created master of the horse. Then the Dictatour held the Election. In which were chosen Consuls, M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus in his absence, who at that time had the government of Greece. After them were elected Pretors, J. Claudius Nero, M. Martius Ralla, L. Scribonius Libo, & M. Pomponius Matho. When the Election was finished, the Dictatour resigned up his place of magistracie. The Romane Games were thrice renewed & set forth, and the plaies Plebeij seven times exhibited. The Aediles of the chaire were Cn. and L. Cornelius Lentuli both. This Lucius governed then the province of Spaine: created he was in his absence, and absent as he was he bare that dignitie. The Aediles of the Commons were T. Claudius Asellus, and M. Junius Pennus. That yeare M. Marcellus dedicated the temple of Virtue, neere the gate E Capena, the seventeenth yeare after it was vowed by his father at Clastidium in Gallia, during the time of his first Consulship. There died also this yeare a Flamine of Mars, namely, M. Aemilius Regillus.

For the last two yeares, the affaires in Greece had not bene well followed. Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Aetolians were forsaken of the Romanes (the onely aid upon which they trusted) forced them both to sue for peace, and to contract the same under what conditions and capitulations himselfe pleased: which if hee had not made the better hast, all that ever hee could to accomplish in good time. P. Sempronius the vice-Consul, sent to succeed Sulpitius in the government, had utterly defeated him whiles he waged warre with the Aetolians: considering that he was ten thousand foot and a thousand horse strong, and had five & thirtie tall ships of war, headed with brassen pikes before; a power of no small importance, I assure you, to aid and assist his allies. For the said peace was not so soone concluded, but newes came to the king, that the Romanes were arrived at Dyrrhachium; that the Parthines and other neighbour nations, upon hope of change and a new world, began to rise and rebell; and that Dimallum was already besieged and assaulted: for to that citie the Romanes bent their power (in steed of aiding the Aetolians lians unto whom they were sent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advice and consent, yea and against the tenor of the accord and covenant they had made a peace with the king. Philip upon these advertisements, for feare least some farther troubles might arise among the nations and states there bordering, tooke long journeis, and sped him apace toward Apollonia. Thither Sempronius was retired, after he had sent Leclorius his Lieutenant with part of his forces and thirteene ships into Ætolia, to visit the country, and to see in what termes they stood, yea and to disturb and breake the peace if possibly he could. Philip wasted and spoiled the territories and lands of the Apollonians, and approching the citie with his whole power, bad battaile to Sempronius the Romane Generall. But after he saw once that he kept himselfe quiet within the citie, standing only upon his guard and defence of the walls; distrusting also his owne strength, as not able to force the citie by assault: and desirous withall to enterteine peace with the Romanes as well as with the Ætolians, if he could; if not, yet at leastwise to have truce with them: without effecting any more (seeing he could but only rub an old sore, and renew cankred malice upon fresh contention and quarell) he returned into his owne realme.

About the same time, the Epirotes weery of long warres, after they had first founded the disposition and mind of the Romanes that way, sent their embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a generall and universall peace: affirming, that they had assured hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highnesse would vouchsafe to come to a parlie with P. Sempronius the Romane Generall. And soone they obtained thus much of him, as to passe over into Epirus for the king himselfe was not unwilling thereunto. Now there is a citie in Epirus, named Phœnice: there the king after communication had first with Eropus, Darda, and Philippus, Pretors of the Epirotes, entred into an interview also with P. Sempronius. At this soleme meeting and conference, Aminander the king of the Athamanes was present, and other Magistrates of the Epirotes and Acarnanes. And first Philippus the Pretour began to speake and request, as well king Philip as the Romane Generall, to make an end of all warres, and likewise to give the Epirotes leave to do the same. P. Sempronius propounded and set downe the articles and conditions of peace in this wise, That the Parthines, Dimallum, Bargulum, and Eugenium, should belong to the Seignorie of the Romanes, notwithstanding that they had obtained of the Senate by their Oratours sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip king of Macedonie. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were comprised within the league on the kings behalfe, Prusias king of Bithynia, the Achæians, the Boeotians, the Thessalians, the Acarnanes, and the Epirotes: and on the Romanes, the Illeses, K. Attalus, Pleauratus, Nabis the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, the Eleans, the Messenians, and the Atheniens. And hereof were instruments and Indentures ingrossed and sealed, and truce made for two moneths, untill such time as embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that forme. So all the tribes in generall graunted the same, because the warre now being intended and bent against Affrick, they were willing for the present to be discharged of all other troubles.

P. Sempronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Consulship. Now when as M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Consuls (which was the 15 yeere of the Punicke warre) the Provinces were assigned unto them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Hetruria with the old armie: unto Sempronius the Brutij, with the new legions that he was to enroll. And to the Pretors in this wise were the Provinces allotted, that M. Marius should be lord chiefe Iustice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the jurisdiction of foreriners, together with the government of Gallia. Item, that M. Pomponius Matho should rule Sicilie, and T. Claudius Nero sit as L. Deputie in Sardinia. As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one yeere longer, with the commaund of that armie and Armada which he had conducted before. Likewise P. Licinius had his commission newly sealed, for to have the charge of the Brutians country, with the power of two legions, so long as the Consull thought it good for the Common-weale, that he should remaine in the government of that Province. Also M. Livius and Sp. Lucretius, with the assistance of those two legions with which they had defended Gallia against Mago, continued still in their roume for another yeere. Moreover Cn. Octavius remained in place, with commission, that when he had delivered up Sardinia, and the legion there unto T. Claudius, himselfe should with fortie long gallies skoure the seas, and guard the coasts along the river, within those bounds and limits, for which the Senat had given order. Vnto M. Pomponius nus the Pretor in Sicilie were appointed the two legions of the Cannian armie. And T. Quintinus and C. Hostilius Tullus Viz. pretours, were to governe as they did the former yeere, the one Tarentum, and the other Capua; and both of them were allowed the old garisons. As for the government of Spaine, it was put to question before the people, what two Viz. pretours their pleasure was should be sent into that Province. And all the Tribes with one accord gave their graunt, that the same Proconsuls L. Cornel. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, should sit as governors in those Provinces as the yeere before. The Consuls began now to muster souldiers, as well to enroll new legions for to be sent into the Brutians countrie, as also to supply & fulfill the number of the other armies; according as they were directed by the Senate. And albeit Affrick was not yet openly declared a Province, but dissimuled by the LL. of the Senate, (of purpose I beleieve, that the Carthaginians should have no ynking and intelligence thereof before hand) yet the whole citie was in good hope, and made full reckning that this yeere the warre would be determined and fought out in Affrick, and so an end for ever of those troubles. This perswasion of theirs had possessed their hearts with much superstition: and very forward men were, both to report, and also to beleieve many prodigious and straunge wonders, which dayly were blowne abroad and divulged more and more: To wit, that there were two sunnes seene; that in the night season betwene whiles it seemed day light; that in Setia there was a burning torch or blasing Starre reaching from the East to the West; that in Tarracina the gate; and in Anagnia, as well the gate as the wall in divers parts were blasted and shaken with lightning; lastly, that in the temple of Iuno Sospita in Lanuvium, there was a noyse and a C rumbling heard, with an horrible crack. For the expiation and purging of these prodigies, there was a supplication holden for one day: and a novendiall soleme sacrifice was also celebrated, because it had rained stones out of the sky. Besides all this, there was some consultation about the receiving of dame Idea. For over and besides that M. Valerius one of the embassadors was returned and had brought word that she would be very shortly in Italie, there came a new messenger with tidings, that she was now already at Tarracina. This deliberation (about no small matter, namely, whom they should geve judgement to be the best man simply in the whole citie) held the Senate much amused: considering that every one for his part was more desirous of true victorie, & preeminence in this behalfe, than of any promotions, honors or dignities whatsoever, awarded unto them by the voyces either of Senators or Commoners. In conclusion, they judged P. Scipio, the sonne of that Cn. who was killed in Spaine, a very young man, and as yet not of full age to be a Questor, the very best man without exception in the whole citie. Vpon what motives of his singular vertues they were induced thus to deeme of him, as I could willingly have delivered unto posteritie, what had ben set down in record by the auncient & first writers of those times: so I wil not interpose mine own conceits, in guessing at a thing which hath lien dead and buried so long time. This P. Cornelius was commaunded to go accompanied with all the dames of the citie as far as to Ostia, there to meete the Goddesse, and then to take her forth of the ship, and being once set a land, to deliver her unto the foresaid matrones for to be devoutly caried to the citie. Now when the ship was arrived at the mouth of the river Tyberis, he according as he was directed, went aboard in a pinnace, & launched into the sea: where he took E the goddesse at the Priests hands, & brought her ashore. And the dames which were the noblest and chiefe of the citie, amongst whom, Claudia Quinta was the ladie most renowned, received her. This Claudia, who before time (as it is reported) was of no better name and fame than she should be, now by this religious and devout ministerie, was for her chastitie and continencie recommended better to posteritie. These women caried this goddesse charily and daintely in their hands, and tooke her by turnes, one in course after another. All the citie came forth by heapes to meete her: and along the streets as she was conveighed, they stood at the dores with censers, making sweet perfumes, & burning frankincense: yea & prayed unto her, that she would willingly enter the citie of Rome, and continue propice and gracious unto it. Thus they transported her into the temple of Victoria within mount Palatine, the day before the * Ides of April, which was F alwayes after kept as a festivall holiday. The people with great frequency brought gifts unto Palatium, which they offered unto the goddesse, & solemnized a Lectisternium. And those places called Megalefia came up then, and were first instituted.

Now when the Counsell were busie & sat about the supplie of those legions which were in the provinces, there were certaine of the Senatours began to whisper & blow into their heads; That the

the time was now come, no longer to abide those things which during the troubles and dangerous daies they made a shift to endure; considering that now at length by the goodnesse of the gods, all feare was past, and the daungers overblowne. At which words the lords of the Senate being in great expectation and attentive to heare out the rest; they went on & said, That those colonies of the Latines, which whiles Q. Fabius and Q. Fulvius were Consuls, refused to set out souldiours, now almost for six yeares had intermitted their service in the wars, as exempted from warfare altogether, and enjoyed that immunitie as an honour and reward for their good deserts; whereas in the meane time, other loyall and obedient allies, were by mustering every yeare continually, wasted and consumed, in performance of their faithfull allegiance and dutifull service to the Empire of Rome. At this speech, the lords called not so much to mind a thing long forlet and almost worne out of remembrance, as they were provoked to anger and grew very hote; and therefore would not suffer the Consuls to passe any other matter before, but decreed that they should peremptorily convent to Rome the magistrates, and ten principall citizens out of every of these Colonies, to wit, Neper, Sutrium, Ardea, Cales, Alba, Carscoli, Sora, Sueffa, Setia, Circeij, Narnia, and Interamna, (for these were the Colonies touched in that point above-named) and to lay upon them every one a double levie of footmen, to that number and proportion which they were charged with, when they set out most in the service of the Romane warres, ever since that the enemies were come into Italie: besides one hundred and twentie horsemen a peece. And in case any one of those colonies were not able to make up that full number of horsemen, then to allow for every man of armes three footmen. Provided alwaies, that for foote and horse both, such should be chosen and no other, as were most substantiall and of the best havour, and bee sent to what place soever there was need of supplie, even out of Italie. And if any of them refused thus to do, then the Consuls had commission to stay the magistrates and deputies aforesaid, and not to give them audience in the Senate, (although they should require the same) before they had performed those impositions. Moreover those Colonies were enjoined to pay every yeare a tax or tribute; and that there should be raised and levied, one Assie in the thousand, of their substance by the month; and be assessed in those Colonies according to the rate and rule that the Romane Censors should set downe; which they gave order to bee the same that was laid upon the people of Rome: & the information therof to be exhibited & presented at Rome by the sworn Censors of the foresaid colonies, before they went out of their office. By vertue of this Act of the Senate, the magistrates and chiefe men of those Colonies were sent for, & compelled to repaire to Rome: and when the Consuls demanded of them, those souldiours and tribute aforesaid, they began all of them (but some more than others) to refuse and gainsay it; yea and flatly to denie, that so many souldiours could possibly bee made: nay hardly were they able, although they should streine themselves, to furnish the bare single number, according to the usual proportion and old prescript order: requesting and beseeching them, to give them leave to have recourse unto the Senat, and there to make sute for their release: neither have we (say they) so much offended as thus hardly to be used, nor deserved worthily to be undone. And say, we must needs miscarrie and bee cast away; yet neither our offence, nor the wrath of the people of Rome, can force us to find more souldiours than we have. But the Cons. resolute in their purpose, commaunded the Delegates and Committees of those Colonies, to stay stil at Rome, and their magistrates onely to repaire home and take musters: for as much as s(unless the full number of souldiours which was set downe unto them were brought to Rome) there was no Consull there would graunt them audience in the Senat. Thus when all hope was cut off, to have access into the Senate, and to obtaine a release; those twelve Colonies tooke a levie & enrolled the full number. Which was no hard matter to be don, considering how their youth was increased in that time of long vacation and intermission of warfare. There was likewise another matter (by as long silence forlet and well neere quite forgotten) proposed newly againe by M. Valerius Levinus: who said, That it was meet and good reason, that those private persons which had credited forth their monies to the common-weale, when himselfe and M. Claudius were Consuls, should now at last be satisfied, contented, and paid: neither ought any man to marvaile why he (notwithstanding the cittie were bound for the debt) had a speciall care and regard to call upon them for to have it discharged: for, besides that the Consul for that yeare being, when those lones of money were graunted, was in some sort properly obliged, to see that credit were kept; himself moreover was the very man that made the motion of taking up those monies, in regard that the cittie

A chamber was so emptie of treasure; and the Commons purses so bare of money, that they were not sufficient to pay the ordinarie tribute. This ouverture made by the Consul, was well taken of the lords, who willed the Consuls to put up this matter to the house: and so they entred an Act and decree, that the said debts should be discharged at three payments; whereof the first should be made presently by the Consuls then in place; the other twain, by the Consuls that wer to succeed in the third and fift yeares next ensuing.

But there fell out one new object and occurrence; that drowned all other cares besides; and wholly possessed the heads of the Senate, by occasion of the miseries and calamities of the Locrians; whereof before that day, they had no knowledge nor intelligence; and now were by the coming of their ambassadors declared & divulged. Neither were the people provoked to choller & anger, so much at the lewd behavior and wicked pranks of Q. Plummus, as the slacknes and negligence, or else the partialitie and connivencie of Scipio in dealing between them. These Embassadors of the Locrians, ten in number, presented themselves before the Consuls sitting in the open hall called Comitium: clad they were in homely weeds & coarse apparell, looking pale and poore on the matter; and carrying withall in their hands as tokens of humble supplicants, certaine branches of the olive, according to the manner of the Greekes, fell downe prostrate upon the ground before the Tribunal, with pittieous weeping and sorrowfull lamentation. The Consuls demanded who they were: and they made answer againe, That they were Locrians, who had endured at the hands of Q. Plummus the Lieutenant, and the Romane souldiours, such indignities, as the people of Rome would not find in their hearts, that the very Carthaginians themselves should suffer and susteine: beseeching them to do them this favour, as to give them leave to have access to the lords of the Senat, there to make their mone and complaine of their wofull distresses. Being admitted into the Senate, and audience given them, then the auncientest man of the companie spake in this wise. Right honourable (my LL.) I know full well (quoth he) how important it would be, & available to the due estimat & weight of our complaints & grievances, in case yee were informed sufficiently and knew the truth, as well in what sort Locri was first betraied unto Anniball, as also after what order the garrison of Anniball was thence expelled, and the cittie restored againe under your obedience. For, if it may appeare that the trespasses of our revolt, cannot be imputed any way unto the publicke counsell and consent of our cittie; but contrariwise, that our returne under your signorie and dominion was not onely performed with our good will, but also first wrought & compassed by the meanes of our helping hand & valour: yee have the greater cause to be discontented and displeased with your Lieutenant & souldiours, for offering us (your good and loiall allies) such abuses, so cruell wrongs and unworthie indignities. As for the cause of our double revoltment and change, I thinke it good to deferre the speaking thereof to another time, and that for two reasons: the one is, that the matter might be heard in the presence of P. Scipio, who recovered Locri, and was an eye-witnesse of all that wee have don, be it good or bad: the other is this, that howsoever we be, yet we should not have abiden those calamities in such sort as we have supported them. We cannot dissimule (my LL.) nor conceale, how at the while that we had the Carthaginian garison within our castle, we suffered many foule outrages and shamefull villanies, both at Amilcar his hands (the captaine of the garison) as also from the Numidians and Africanes: but what are they in comparison of the abuses and indignities that we endure at this day? May it please you (my LL.) to give us the hearing of those things with patience, that I shall utter even against my will with grievance. All the world at this day is in suspence, and standeth in great doubt, whither to see you or the Carthaginians, the soveraigne lords of the whole earth. But if they were to weigh and counterpoise the Roman & Carthaginian Empire, by those injuries which have beene offered to us of Locri, either from them or your garison: & which at this day, more than ever before, we still endure: there is none but would rather make choise of them to be their soveraigne LL. than the Romans. And yet consider I pray you, & see how wel affected the Locrians are towards you: when we were nothing so hardly used nor so ill entreated by the Carthaginians, yet we had recourse unto your captaine Generall: and now that we are misused of your garison, and put to more sorrow than if we were professed enemies, yet we have run no whither with our complaints but unto your selves. Either shall you (my LL.) vouchsafe to have compassion of our miserable state, or else we see not what wee have left wherein we should pray unto the immortall gods, for to be good and propice unto us. Quintus Plummus Lieutenant to the General Scipio, was sent with a strong garison & power of men, to recover Locri out of the hands of the Carthaginians; and with the very same garrison was he left there: but this Lieutenant of yours (for the extremitie of miseries and afflictions whereinto wee are driven, maketh us bold, and putteth courage in us to speake our minds freely) hath nothing at all in him of a man, my Lords, but the bare shape and outward forme; nor of a Roman citizen, unlesse it bee the habite of apparrell which hee weareth; and the sound of the Latine tongue which hee speaketh. A verie plague hee is and no better, a monstrous and ouglie beast, like unto that, which sometimes (if old tales and fables bee true) haunted the narrow seas betwene us and Sicilie, for to destroy all passengers that sailed by. Who, if he could have been content himselfe alone to have practised and wrought upon us your Allies, all mischeivous acts and prances, of wickednesse, of filthie lust, and greedie covetousnesse, we would peradventure in all patience and long sufferance, have filled up that one gulfe and pit were it never so deepe, and satisfied one gorge never so unsatiabie. But now so great a delight and pleasure hath he taken, that all lewd and licentious parts, all shamefull acts and villanies should be commonly practised, and in every place committed, that hee hath made all your Centiniers very Pleminius, yea, and your souldiours as bad as himselfe. All of them can skill now of robbing, rifling, spoiling, beating, wounding, and killing: they are all good at forcing of dames and ladies of honor, at ravishing and despoiling of young virgins, at abusing (against kind) of younglings, free borne and well descended, whom they pull perforce from between the armes, and out of the very bosomes of their parents. Daily is our citie assaulted and taken; daily is it sacked and pillled, night and day, there is no place free, but ringeth againe with the pittieous shrieks and lamentable plaints and cries of women and children, harried and carried away in every place. He that were a stranger to these things, and knew nothing, might wonder well ynough, how either we can possibly hold out in suffering such outrages, or they which are the doers, not yet be satisfied and full of committing so great wrongs and injuries. For neither will my tongue & utterance serve to deliver, nor needfull is it and expedient for you to heare every thing in particular, what we have sustained. But in general I will comprise and knit up altogether. I will abide by it, that there is not one house throughout all Locri, I dare avouch there is no person either one or other, exempt from the wrongs that he hath done. I say, and stand to it, that there is no kind of wickednesse, no manner of filthie lust and uncleannesse, no unsatiabie avarice besides, that hee hath not assaied to practise upon as many as were capable thereof, and fit subjects to worke upon. Hardly can a man devise and thinke, whether of these two mischeefes incident to a citie bee more detestable, either when the enemies force it by assault in time of warre, or when a pestilent and cruel tyrant oppresseth it by force and armes during peace. All calamities we endured before, that townes woon and lost are put unto. And now at this houre, more than ever (my LL.) Pleminius hath perpetrated upon us, our children and our wives, all those excessive villanies, that the most inhumane, cruell, and outrageous tyrants can devise to exercise upon those subjects, whom they keepe downe with oppression, and tread under foot. Yet one thing there is (right Honourable) whereof both sense of religion imprinted and engrafted naturally in our minds, constraineth us to make particular complaint by specialtie; and also our desire is, that yee should have the hearing, yea, and to assoile and discharge your Commonweale of the scruple of conscience, in case ye thinke it so meet and requisite. For we have observed and seen with our eyes, with what devotion and ceremoniall reverence, you not onely honour and worship the gods of your owne, but also receive and entertaine those of strangers and forrainers. We have in our citie a chappell of Proserpina, concerning the holinesse of which house, I suppose verily, that ye have heard some report and fame, during the warre of king Pyrrhus: who in his return out of Sicilie, passing along the sea side with his fleet by Locri, among other shameful villanies and outrages which he committed against our citie in despite of us, and for our fidelitie shewed toward you, pillled also and robbed the treasure of this Proserpina, which to that day had never been touched by any man whatsoever. And when he had so done, he embarked the monie, & sent it away by water, but journeyed himselfe by land. But see what happened my LL. hereupon! His whole navie the morrow after, was all to tossed, split, and torn a peeces in a most hideous ghuft and horrible tempest, save M only those ships wherein that sacred treasure was bestowed, which were cast upon our coast, & driven ashore. Whereupon this king, as proud and fierce a prince as he was, being taught by so great harmes and losses, to beleve that there were gods in heaven that ruled all; made diligent search for all the said monies, and caused the same to bee brought backe againe, and laid up in the treasure

A surie of Proserpina. And yet for all that, never sped he well in any thing that hee went about, from that day forward. Hunted hee was and chased cleane out of Italie; and coming by chaunce on a night, and entering unadvisedly the citie of Argos, he died an obscure, base, and dishonourable death. And notwithstanding your Lieutenant, your Colonels and knight Marshals heard of this, and a thousand more such instances and examples which were recounted unto them (not for to amplify and set out with the highest the great religion and holinesse of the place; but as we and our auncestours have had right evident prooffe, and that full oftentimes, to shew the manifest power and puissance of that goddesse) yet were they so hardie, as to lay their theevish and sacrilegious hands upon those treasures, that were inviolate and not to be touched; & so by that cursed prize and bootie have polluted themselves, their houses, and your souldiours. Whose service take heed my LL. as ye tender your selves and your credite, how yee employ either in Italie or in Africa, in any of your affaires and warres there; before ye purge and expiate this foule & heinous fact: for feare least they make amends, and pay for this detestable forfeit, not onely which their owne blood, but also with some publicke losse and calamitie of the whole State. And even already die my LL. the yre and displeasure of the goddesse hath ben well seen upon your captains & souldiours both, and at this present day continueth still. Sundrie times they have ben together by the eares, and skuffed one against another with banners displaied. Pleminius the captain bare up one side, and two Marshals or militarie Tribunes another. Never fought they more fiercely & sharply with the Carthaginians in the field, than amongst themselves in fraies at the sword point. And through their furious rage they had given Annibal good opportunitie and vantage to regaine Locri into his owne hands; but that Scipio, whom we sent for, came in the meane time upon him. C But peradventure (some will say) this madnesse and furie hauntheth and tormenteth the souldiours onely, who are tainted with the foresaid sacriledge, and no power at all of the goddesse hath been shewed in punishing the leaders and captaines themselves. Nay ywis, in them it hath most evidently appeared. The Tribunes have been beaten with rods by the Lieutenant, and the Lieutenant againe, being laid for by the said Tribunes, and caught in a traine, hath not only been manegled all his bodie over, but when they had cut off his nose, and cropt his eares, was left for dead in the place. And afterwards, when the Lieutenant was recovered and cured of his hurts, hee first imprisoned the Tribunes; then he scourged them; and after he had martired them, and put them to all exquisite tortures that might bee devised against bondslaves, he did them to death; & when D they were dead, would not suffer them to bee enterrd. Thus yee see how the goddesse hath punished and taken vengeance of them that have pillled and robbed her temple: and never will shee give over to torment and harrie them with all manner of furies and hellish fiends, before the sacred money bee againe bestowed in the chests and cofers of her treasure. Our auncestours long agoe, in time of greivous and cruell warre betwene them and the Crotoniates, because the temple standeth without the citie, were desirous to remooove that treasure and money from thence, into the citie. But in the night there was a voice heard from out of the shrine, that they should hold their hands off; for that the goddesse herselfe knew well ynough how to defend her owne temple. And because upon this warning they made it a matter of conscience, and were afraid to stirre the treasure from thence, they would needs cast a strong wall about the said temple: and when it was brought up to a good heigh from the ground, behold, suddainely at once all the E worke came tumbling downe. But both now, and oftentimes besides, hath this goddesse either guarded her seat and chappell, or else if it hath been any way violated, shee hath been grievously revenged by some fearefull example of them that have seemed to offer violence to the same. Now for the wrongs that we abide, she is not able; neither is there any other but your selves (my lords) to right us, and revenge our quarrell. You are they whom wee flie unto; unto your protection only in all humble maner, we have recourse. And all one it is to us, whether ye suffer Locri to be under that Lieutenant and that garrison, or yeeld us unto Annibal in his anger, and to the Carthaginians, for to wreke their teene upon us and our throtes. Neither require wee, that you should credite and beleve our complaint of him that is not now in place, without libertie of F his answer, and pleading for himselfe. Let him come hardily; let him be at the hearing himselfe, and spare not, let him a gods name cleare and acquit himselfe, if hee can. If when all is done and said, it can be proved, that he hath left undone any mischeefe against us, that one man can devise to doe unto another; we will be content to abide and endure all those miseries once againe (if it were possible) which wee have suffered already, yea, and to hold and declare him guiltlesse of all offences done both to God and man.

When the ambassadors had laid abroad those matters, and Q. Fabius demanded of them whether they had complained unto P. Scipio, and uttered these their griefes before him, they made answer and said, That they had sent ambassadors unto him, but he was busied in making preparation for the warres, and was either passed already over into Affrick, or upon his voyage ready to take the seas within few daies: and they had scene by good experience, in how great favour the Lieutenant Pleminius stood with his generall: and namely they were not ignorant how Scipio after he had heard the matter betweene the Tribunes and him, committed them to prison: but as for the Lieutenant, who was as faultie as the other, if not more, him he left there still in his full authoritie. Now after that the ambassadors were willed to go forth of the temple where the Senate sate, the chiefe LL. of the Senate began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipio as well as Pleminius. But above all others, Q. Fabius girded at him, and said, That he was borne even to corrupt and marre all militarie discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spaine also we have lost more by mutinies of our owne souldiours, than by the warres with our enemies: for why? after a strange and forrein maner, and according to the guise of kings, one while he cockered his souldiers and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be overharp & cruell to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with a heave & sharp sentence, namely, That Pleminius the Lieutenant by his consent should be had away bound in chaines to Rome, and there clapt up in prison, untill his cause were heard, and judicially determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commensed against him, he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscate and forfeited to the chamber of the cite. As for P. Scipio, in that he presumed to depart out of his province without commission and direction from the Senate, he should be called home: and the Tribunes of the Commons dealt withall to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him besides his place of government. As touching the Locrians, his opinion was, That the Senate should geve them their dispatch, and returne them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senate nor of the people of Rome that they were done; who wished with all their hearts they had bene undone: Item, that they acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies, and so would accept of them and call them. As to their children, their wives, and other goods taken from them whatsoever, their mind was that they should be restored againe: Item, that enquire should be made what summes of money were taken out of the treasury of Proserpina, and that two-fold restitution should be made and laid up there in stead of it: Item, that there should be a solemne purgatorie sacrifice celebrated for amends and expiation of that sinne; but so, as the collidge first of the Priests and Bishops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalfe, (considering the sacred treasure was disquieted, laid open and violated) namely, what manner of expiations and cleansing were to be used, to what gods, and with what beasts they should sacrifice: Finally, that all the souldiers which were at Locri should be transported over into Sicilie; and in their rounce foure cohorts of allies from out of the Latin nation should be brought to lye in garison there. But every Senatour could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of their difference and disagreement of minds so hotely incensed, some in favour, other in disfavor of Scipio. For besides the lewd part of Pleminius, and the calamitie and oppression of the Locrians, they began to speake against the apparell of the Generall himselfe, how he went not like a souldier and a warriour, no nor so much as like a Roman: walking up and downe, and squaring it out in the schooles and open places of exercise with his mantle and cloke, and in his slippers and pantofles, after the Greeke fashion: And that he was over bookish, and set his mind too much upon reading; and tooke delight to be in the sense schoole and wrestling place: and all his men and gard about him, as idly and wantonly given as he, tooke joy in the pleasures & delightfull seat of Syracuse. As for Carthage and Anniball, they were quite forgotten: and his whole armie through loosenesse and libertie was spilled and cleane lost, like to that of late at Sucro in Spaine, and all one with them at this time in Locri, more to be feared of their friends than their enemies. And albeit these matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some truths, and therefore founded all very probable; yet the opinion of Q. Metellus prevailed: who in all other things gave his assent unto Maximus, onely as touching Scipio, he varied from him. For I can not see any reason (quoth he) how this can stand, that whom

A crewhile the whole cite chose at those young yeeres of his, to be the only captaine for to recover Spaine; of whom they made speciall choyse to be their Consull, after that he had gotten Spaine from the enemies, to end at once the Punick warre; and in whom they reposed great hope, that he was the man to draw Anniball out of Italie, and to subdue all Affrick: he now should all of a sodaine be called for home out of his province, as a person almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his cause, as if he were another Pleminius: considering that even those leawd and cruell parts which the Locrians complained of, were by their owne words and confession not committed, whiles he was present in place: neither could he be charged & accused directly for ought els but only for his sufferance & connivencie, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenant, he was too remisse; and forbore to punish him with rigor. His advice therefore and opinion was, that M. Pomponius the Pretour, unto whose lot the government of Sicilie was fallen, should within three daies next and immediately ensuing, take his journey into his province: & that the Consuls, should elect x. Commissioners or Delegates out of the Senat, such as they thought good of, & send them with the Pretour; likewise two Tribunes of the Commons, and one Edile: that the Pretour with the assistance of these personages, should sit upon a commission to enquire and know the truth: and in case they could find that those things wherewith the Locrians found themselves so much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Scipio, or with his will and consent; then to charge him to depart out of the province. But in case that P. Scipio were already passed over into Affrick; then the foresaid Tribunes of the Commons, and the Edile, joyning unto them two of the Delegates above said, (such as the Pretor deemed most meet) should saile into Affrick: & the Tribunes and Edile bring with them Scipio from thence: and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the armie, untill such time as a new L. Generall succeeded and came in place. But if M. Pomponius and the ten Delegates above said, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. Scipio these enormities were committed, then P. Scipio should remaine still with the armie, and go forward with the warre as he intended. When this decree of the Senate was once passed, and an act made thereof, they were in hand with the Tribunes either to agree betweene themselves, or els to cast lots, which two of them should go with the Pretour and the Delegates. And then the collidge of the Bishops were consulted with, about the expiation and making satisfaction for those things which in the temple of Proserpina at Locri were either handled, polluted, or caried forth from thence. The Tribunes of the commons that went the journey with the Pretor & the Commissioners, were M. Claudius Marcellus, & M. Cincius Alimentus: who also had an Edile of the Commons to assist them, whom they might commaund, if Scipio would not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Affrick, to apprehend and attach his bodie; and by vertue of their sacrosanct and inviolable authoritie to bring him home with them. And first they resolved to go to Locri before they went to Messana. But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth two waies. Some say, that when he was advertised what was intended and devised against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Naples into banishment, and chanced by the way to light upon one of the Delegates above said, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegium. Others asseirme, that Scipio himselfe sent out one of his Lieutenants, accompanied with 30 of the most noble knights or gentlemen that he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Pleminius, and with him the principall authors of the sedition, and to lay them fast in irons. But certaine it is that they all, were it by the commandment of Scipio before, or then by warrant from the Pretor, were put in ward and safe custody with the Rhegines. The Pretour & the Delegates being come to Locri, first and foremost, according to their commission, had a principall care of religion. For all the holy money which they found by diligent search in the custodie either of Pleminius, or of the souldiers, together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they bestowed againe in the privie vestries where the treasure was kept: and besides, they made a solemne purgatorie sacrifice for the sacrilege. After this, the Pretour assembled the souldiers together, and commanded them to carrie their ensignes out of the citie: where himselfe encamped upon the plaine; and proclaimed that no souldiour, as hee would answer at his uttermost perill, should either carrie behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his owne. Then he gave the Locrians leave, that every man should lay hold upon that which he knew to be his owne: and if ought were not forthcomming and to be seen, to challenge and put in his claime for it. And above all things, his pleasure was, that all bodies of free persons persons whatsoever, should without delay be restored unto them, & if any made default of restitution, he should abide the smart and be grievously punished. Then he assembled the Locrians to an audience, and pronounced before them all, That the people and Senate of Rome granted unto them their auncient libertie, and their owne lawes: giving notice unto them, that whosoever had any thing to say against Pleminius, or any other person by way of accusation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there give attendance. Also if they were desirous to make a publike and open complaint of Scipio, namely, That the facts committed at Locri most impiously and wickedly, against both God and man, passed either under his warrant, or with his leave & liking, then they should send embassadours to Messana, where he together with his Counsell and assistants would give them audience of all matters, and determine accordingly. The Locrians yielded great thanks to the Pretours and to the Delegates or Commissioners: as also to the Senate, and people of Rome: and said, they would go to accuse Pleminius. As for Scipio, although he set little to the heart the injuries and wrongs done unto their citie, yet hee was a man whose friendship they desired rather to embrace, than to entertaine his enmitie. And this they knew assuredly, that so many lewd pranks, & so horrible parts ther plaid, wer neither by the direction nor yet with the connivencie and tolleration of P. Scipio: but his onely fault was, that either hee trusted Pleminius overmuch, or credited them too little. And some men (say they) be of this nature, that they will have a carefull regard for to prevent sinne, and an earnest desire that no offence be committed, rather than courage and heart to punish and correct faults when they are once done & past. Hereupon both the Pretours and also the Commissioners with him, thought themselves well eased of no small burden and charge of making farther inquisition and sitting upon the cause of Scipio. But Pleminius and two and thirtie persons more with him, they condemned & sent bound in chaines to Rome. They themselves went also in person to Scipio, to be eie-witnesses & to make report at Rome of their owne knowledge, as touching the manner of apparrell, the ydle life of the Generall, and the lose, dissolute, and corrupt militarie discipline of his fouldiours; so ripe and common in many mens mouthes. Against their comming to Saracose, Scipio was provided of deeds to approve his innocencie, and not of words to excuse his follie. He gave order for all his forces there to meet, & for his armada to be in readinesse, as if he were that day to give battaile both by land and sea to the Carthaginians. The very same day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received & courteously entertained by Scipio. The morrow after, he shewed them all his forces, as well for land as sea service, not onely furnished, well appointed, and in readinesse, but the one sort, namely the land fouldiours, running and charging one another at turney; and the sea servitours likewise within the haven, representing a navall combat with their shippes. Then he led the Pretour and the other commissioners all about, to see the arsenall and armorie, the store-houses, the garners of come, and all other provision and furniture for the warre. At the view and sight whereof, they were stricken with such exceeding admiration, both of every thing in particular, and of all in generall, that they were fully persuaded, that either by the conduct of that captaine and valour of that armie, the Carthaginians might be overcome & conquered, or by none other in the world: yea, and they willed him in the name of God, without more ado to passe over into Africke, and with all speed possible to make the people of Rome to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centuries nominated and declared him with one voice the former Consull of the twaine: and with so joyous hearts they tooke their leave and departed from thence, as if they were to bring tidings to Rome of a glorious victory; and not to make relation and report of a magnificall & stately preparation for warre. Pleminius and all they that were likewise attaint and guiltie, after they came to Rome, were immediately clapt up and laid fast in prison. At the first time when they were brought out before the people by the Tribuns, they could find no grace, no favor nor mercie amongst them, their minds were so tormented & possessed aforehand, with the consideration of the worstill miseries & calamities of the poore Locrians. But afterwards, being produced oftener unto them, as the hatred conceived against him, began to weare and decay, so mens anger grew to assuage and soften: besides the pittious plight and deformed hew of Pleminius there present, and the remembrance withall, of Scipio now absent, gat him some favour with the people. Yet he died in prison, before his cause was judicially tried, and definitive sentence of him passed. Clodius Licinius reporteth in this third booke of the Romane stories, that this Pleminius in the time of the games which Africanus second time Consul, exhibited at Rome, according to a vow by him made; went about (by the helpe of some whom he had corrupted and waged for money) to set the citie on fire in divers places, thereby to have opportunitie to breake prison and make an escape: but when his wicked purpose was once disclosed and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by an act of Senat to the dungeon Tullianum. But as for Scipio, ther wer no words made of him, neither came he in question any where else but in the Senate: where all with one accord, both commissioners and tribunes, by extolling and magnifying with glorious words, the navie, the armie and the captaine, brought it so about, that the Senate thought good and were agreed, that with all convenient speed Scipio should over into Africke, and have libertie granted out of those armies which were in Sicilie, to make choise of those whom hee would himselfe transport over with him into Africke, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the province.

Whiles these things passed thus amongst the Romanes; the Carthaginians also having spent all the winter time in much suspicion and continuall feare, hearkening to all newes, and enquiring leasurably of every messenger, and keeping watch upon all their promontories & high hills by the sea side, bestirred themselves likewise, and procured the societie and alliance of K. Syphax, a matter of no small importance for the safegard and defence of Africke, in hope & confidence of whose amitie and friendship especially, they were persuaded, that Scipio intended to faile over into Africke. Now there had been already betwene Asdruball the sonne of Gisgo and the king, not onely familiar acquaintance by way of kind welcomming and reciprocal hospitalitie, since the time (as hath ben said before) that Scipio and Asdruball fortunated to meet at one time together in the kings house, when they came out of Spaine; but also some treatie was already begun of alliance and affinitie, and a motion made, that the king should espouse and wed the daughter of Asdruball. For the assurance of this matter, and the appointment of a certaine day for the solemnizing of the mariage (for now the Damosell was readie for an husband, and marriageable) Asdruball tooke a journey, and seeing the king burning in love (as these Numidians of all other barbarous nations are most given that way, & exceeding amorous) he sent for the maiden from Carthage, and hastened the wedding. And among other congratulations that passed betwene, to the end, that besides the private affinitie, there should be also a publicke league, there was an alliance concluded betwene the people of Carthage and the king, by giving and taking their faithfull promise interchangeably, and obliging themselves by a solemne oth one to the other to observe it as wel offensive as defensive, & to have the same enemies & the same friends for ever.

But Asdruball remembring both the friendship begun betwene Scipio and the king, and also how fickle & variable the natures of the Barbarians are; & fearing if Scipio should passe over into Africke, that this bond of wedlock would not be strong ynough to hold the king in; took the time whiles this Numidian prince was enamored with his fresh love, induced him what with reasons, and what with the faire words and allurements of his young spouse, to send Embassadours into Sicilie to Scipio, for to advise him not to passe over into Africke, nor to relie upon any confidence of him, ne yet to build upon his former promises. For as much as himselfe was not only linked in matrimonie with a citizen of Carthage, the daughter of that Asdrubal whom he saw entertained as a guest in his court, but also joined in a publicke league with the people of Carthage. And first he exhorted him that the Romanes would war with the Carthaginians far from Africke, as hitherto they had done; for feare least he should of necessitie be forced to have an hand, and intermeddle in their quarels; and so whiles hee desired to avoid the daunger and hostilitie of one part or other, be driven at length to side one way: giving him more plainly to understand, That if Scipio would not forbear Africke, but needs come with an armie against Carthage, then must he necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africke, wherein himselfe was borne, and for the native countrie, for the father and house of his owne wife. With this commission & direction were certaine Orators sent unto Scipio, who met with him at Saracose, and there delivered their message. Scipio, albeit he was disappointed greatly of his groundworke that he had laid for his warres in Africke, and put besides his good hopes, gave the Embassadours letters into Africke unto the king; and sent them backe againe in all hast, before the thing were published and come abroad. In which letters hee requested him earnestly to be advised and bethink himselfe that hee brake not the rights either of friendship and hospitalitie begun with him, or of the league and societie entered with the people of Rome: nor violated justice and faithfull promise made by giving right hands: ne yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants & agreements made. But forasmuch as the comming of those Numidians could not bee concealed (for they went all about the cittie, & were daily conversant in the Generall his lodging: & if it should have been kept secret wherabout they came, it was to be doubted least the truth the more it was smothered and dissimuled, the more it would break forth & come to light: and so the armie was to stand in feare, that they were to warre at once both with the king and Carthaginians. Scipio therefore buzzed aforehand into mens heads, false devised matters, and so withdrew them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He assembled all his souldiours together, and said unto them; That now it was no longer staying and trifling out the time: bearing them in hand, that the kings, his allies and confederates, importuned him to set over into Affricke with all convenient speed: that Masinissa beforetime himselfe in person came to Lelius, grieving & complaining that the time ran thus on in delaies and doing nothing: and Syphax now sent his embassadours, musing much and wondring what the cause should be of so long temporising: and requiring that either the armie without more adoe, should be set over at once: or else if their minds & purposes were changed, to certifie him so much, that hee likewise might provide for himselfe & his kingdome. And therefore he did them to weete and understand, that hee intended (now that hee was sufficiently provided & furnished of all things; & considering that the impresse might abide no farther stay) to conduct his armada to Lilybæum, to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the seas for a bon-voiage, and with Gods grace and favour to set saile for Affricke. His letters hee dispatched to Marcus Pomponius to this effect, That if hee thought so good, hee should repaire to Lilybæum, to the end they might commune and consult together, what legions especially, and what number of souldiours he should transport over with him into Affricke. In like manner, hee sent all about the maritime and sea coasts, to stay all the carrickes & ships of burden, & to bring them away at once to Lilybæum. Now when all the shippes and serviceable men in Sicilie were assembled to Lilybæum, so as neither the cittie was able to receive the multitude of souldiours, nor the haven conteine the number of the vessels; so earnestly minded they were all, and so hotely set upon their voiage into Affricke, that they seemed as if they were conducted not to fight a warre, but to enjoy the assured rewards of a victorie. But especially above all others, the souldiours remaining of the Cannian armie, were verily perswaded, that under this capitaine, or else none, by valiantly quitting themselves in the service of the Commonweale, they should be able to end and finish their ignominious and shamefull souldierie. And Scipio himselfe made no base account of those kind of souldiours, as knowing full well that the defeature received at Cannæ, was not occasioned by their cowardise: neither were there throughout the Romane armie any souldiours so auncient and of so long continuance, or so well experienced not onely in many and sundrie foughten fields, but also in the assaulling of townes and citties. And these Legions of Cannæ were the fift and sixt in order. Now when hee had once resolved and given out, that hee would transport them over with him into Affricke, then hee tooke a particular view of them, man by man. And having culled out those, and left them behind, whome hee supposed unmeet and unsufficient, hee substituted in their place those whome hee had brought with him out of Italie: and so fully hee supplied and made up the number of those Legions, that either of them had sixe thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of armes. Hee chose also out of the same armie of Cannæ, both horsemen and footmen, of the allies and confederates of the Latine nation. What power of souldiours in the whole were set over into Affricke, writers differ not a litle in the number. In some authours I find, that they were tenne thousand foot, and two thousand and two hundred horse: in others, fiftene thousand footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen. In some records againe, they were more by one halfe and better, namely, that of horse and foot there were embarked five and thirtie thousand. And others there be, that have set down no number at all, amongst whom, as in a matter so doubtfull and uncertaine, I would myselfe be counted for one. But Cælius for his part, as he forbearth to put down any number at all, so he seemeth to imple an infinit multitude of them, in that he saith, That with a crie and shout that the souldiours set up, the very fowles of the aire fell down to the ground: & he that had seen the multitude of them when they went a shipbord, would have said, there had not been a man left behind, either in Italie or in Sicilie. Well, how many or how few soever they were, Scipio himselfe took the charge to see the souldiours embarked in good order, & without any tumult. As for the sailers & mariners, who were forced before to shipbord, C. Lelius the Admirall of the navie, kept them still & quiet within their ships. M. Pomponius the Pretor had commission for to furnish the armada with corn & victuals: who made provision of food and sustenance for 45 daies: of which there was of baked meats

A meats and other viands already dressed, as much as would suffice for fiftene daies. Now when they were all embarked, he sent about to all the ships, certaine pinnaces or cock-boats, and commaunded all the pilots and maisters of every ship, with two souldiours apeece, to come into the market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and assembled together, first hee enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into their vessels fresh water sufficient both for man and beast, to hold out so many daies as their come would serve: and when answer was made, that they had water in their ships to last five and fortie daies: then he charged and commaunded the souldiours to keepe silence and be quiet during their navigation, & without any strife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and willing to helpe in any ministerie and service whatsoever, saying, That himselfe and L. Scipio would keepe on the right wing with twentie strong ships with brazen beake heads, and C. Lelius the Admirall with M. Porcius the Treasurer on the left, with as many of the same sort, to waite over and guard the hulkes and ships of burden: willing and requiring that there should be lights in all their vessels, namely, that every brazen headed ship should have one; each Carricke twaine; and the Admirall ship, wherein the Generall was, three lights, for a speciall marke, to bee discerned from the rest in the night. And so hee commaunded the Pilots to steere and direct their course for Emporia. [The territorie hereabout is most fertile and fruitfull, whereby the whole countrie aboundeth in plenty of all things: the barbarous peasants (as commonly it falleth out in battell and plentiful lands) are cowards, and unfit for warre, and it was thought they might bee surprised and subdued before any succour could come from Carthage.] When these directions were given, C they were commaunded to retire unto their ships, and the next morrow at the signall, with the helpe of the gods to weigh anchor, hoise up sailes and away. Many Romane Armadaes had aforetime set out of Sicilie, and the very same port: but never any viage all the time of that warre, nor during the former, made so goodly a shew, and was so much looked on. And no mervaille, for most of their other fleets were sent out only to rob and to fetch in booties and prizes. And yet if a man would esteeme navies by the number and greatnesse of ships: there had bene aforetime two Consuls together, who went over with the power of two complete armies: and in every of those fleets there were weneere as many warre ships with brazen beake heads, as hulks and carricks in those that Scipio transported over. For besides fiftie long ships of warre, he had not all o.: foure hundred ships of burden and passage to transport over his armie with. But if wee D will compare both warres together, the second seemed unto the Romanes more sharpe and cruel than the former: both because it was fought within Italie; and also by reason of so great overthrowes of so many armies, together with the losse and death of their Generall capitaines. Moreover, great expectation there was of Scipio the Commaunder and Generall of this voiage, a man much renowned and talked of, both in regard of his owne noble acts of chivalrie, and also for a special and singular fortune that followed him in all his exploits; whereby he grew every day more glorious than other, which caused all mens hearts to be set upon him: beside his very resolution and mind that hee carried, to passe over into Affricke, which all the while of that warre entred not into the head of any capitaine before him: in that hee gave it out abroad, That hee meant to goe over, with intent to draw and fetch Anniball out of Italie, and to divert and translate E the warre into Affricke, and there to finish and make an end of it. There came running unto the haven to see the setting out of this Armada, the whole multitude, not onely of the inhabitants of Lilybæum, but also the traine of all the Embassages out of Sicilie, which were come together for to accompanie Scipio, and to doe him honour, and also attended upon the Pretour of the province M. Pomponius. Over and besides, those legions also which were left behind in Sicilie, went forward to beare their fellow souldiours companie. So that not only the navie was a goodly prospect unto the beholders upon the land, but also the strand so overspread all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleasant shew unto these passengers that were in the ships. When day light once appeared, Scipio from out of the Admirall (after silence commaunded by voice of the crier) praied in this wise: O ye gods & goddesses al, that haunt & inhabite the seas and lands both, I beseech and pray you to vouchsafe, That all that ever hath ben done already, is now intended, or shall hereafter bee enterprised, during my conduct and government, may speed well, and turne to the good of my selfe, the people and Communitie of Rome, our allies, and especially those of the Latine nation; who by land, by sea, by rivers, follow the direction, commaund, government, and fortune of my selfe, and of the people of Rome, and that that in all our actions yee would bee good, gracious, favourable, and helpfull unto us, and advance all our proceedings: that ye would graunt us the victorie over our enemies: and after we have subdued them, to continue safe and sound: and adorned with their goodly spoils, laden with their rich pillage, to returne home all together with glorious triumph: and geve us the hand and opportunitie to be revenged of our foes and mortall enemies: and deigne me and the people of Rome that power and strength, to execute upon the citie of the Carthaginians those fearefull examples of crueltie, which the people of Carthage intended to practise and bring upon our citie and state. After these prayers thus pronounced, he tooke the raw inwards and purtenance of the beast killed for sacrifice (as the manner is) and flung them into the sea: and with that by sound of trumpet, gave the signall of departure.

Now were they under saile: and having a good great gale of a forewind, they soone lost the sight of land. In the afternoone, there began to fall a thick mist; by reason whereof the ships could hardly avoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the maine and deepe sea, the wind became more mild: and all the night following, the same darke mist continued still. After the sunne was once up it brake and disperfed, and then the wind againe grew big and high, by which time they might discover land. And not long after, the pilot said unto Scipio, that they were not full two leagues from Affrick; and that he saw well and discerned the cape or point of Mercurius: and if his will and pleasure were thither to direct their course, presently the whole armada should be in the rode. Scipio so soone as he was within view of land, after he had made his prayers unto the gods, to blesse this first discovery of Affrick to his owne good and the benefit of the Common-weale; gave commaundement to saile still, and to put with the shore and tide at anchor in some bay beneath. So they made way with the same wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were misted againe, and lost the sight of land. And as the fogge increased, the wind fell: the night also that came upon them: besides, made all things more doubtfull. Whereupon they cast anchor, for feare that the ships should either hit one upon another, or run aground. When day light arose, the same wind was up againe, but the foggie mist scattered; and then they might see plainly all the coast of Affrick. Scipio then demanded what promontorie it was that he saw next; and hearing that the name of it was The head Pulchrum, [or The faire Cape] The name (quoth he) pleaseth me, and the presage ther-of I like full well; even thither put the ships a land: and so the Armada entred the bay, and all the host was set ashore. Thus have I reported that they had a prosperous voyage without any fearefull danger, or much trouble; geving credit herein to very many writers, as well Greekes as Latines. Only Celcius (setting aside that the ships were not cast away and drowned amid the surging waves) writeth, how all other dangers both of water & weather encountered them in so much as at last the Armada was driven by tempest from the coast of Affrick, and fell upon the yland * Egi- murus, from whence they had much ado to recover their direct course againe: and finally when the ships were at hand to sinke under the water, that the souldiers faring like men at point to suffer shipwrack, without licence and commaundement of their Generall, and without their armour, in great feare made shift with boates to recover the shore.

The Romanes thus being landed, pitched their tents among the hils next adjoining. By which time the terror and fearefull fright of this their arrivall was not entred only into the Maritime coasts and territories bounding upon the sea, first upon the discovery of the fleet, and afterwards by reason of the rumor and tumult of the armie, as it came ashore; but also spread forward as far as to the good townes and very cities. For not only the high waies were all filled and overspread with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heapes together one with another; but also the country pezants drave before them whole herds of cattail: as a man would have said that had seene it, how all Affrick was like to be abandoned at once on a sodaine: in such sort, as they put the cities in deede in greater feare and perplexitie than they were themselves, and especially Carthage above all others: where there was no lesse trouble and hurlybur-ley, then if it had bene surprised and forced by the enemy. For since time that M. Atilius Regu- lus, and L. Manlius were Coss. for the space almost of fiftie yeeres, they had not once so much as seene an armie of Romanes, but only certein fleets of rovers and men of warre, who had landed at times, and made some rodes into the lands lying upon the sea side: and when they had harried some prizes, such as came next hand, they ever were retired againe to their ships, before the alarme could be given to raise the country. The greater therefore now was both the sight and fright

* Gaius.

A fright within the citie. And to speake a truth, good cause they had; by reason that there was neither at home in readinesse an armie of puillance to encounter the enemy, nor a Captaine of valour to conduct and leade an armie. Asdruball the sonne of Gisco, for nobilitie and high parentage, for honor and renowne, for wealth and riches, and besides for the new affinitie then contracted with a King, was of all others the greatest personage by many degrees, yea & the only man of the whole State. And him they remembered very well to have bene foiled, discomfited, and beaten out of the field in Spaine, by the selfesame Scipio in divers and sundrie batailles. Also they made account, that they were no more able to match the Captaines man for man, than to compare and set their tumultuarie power raised in hast, with the staide and experienced armie of the Romanes. Therefore they gave the alarme presently, as if Scipio were readie to assault Carthage out of hand: the gates with all speede were shut and made sure: the walls manned with souldiours: the corps de guard set: watch and ward kept: and all the night following the Sentinels duly relieved and mainteined. The next day, 500 light horse were sent out as espials & vancuriers to discover and scoure the quarters to the sea side; and withall to empeach them that were a disembarking and comming a land: who chaunced to light upon the Romanes corps de guard. For Scipio had sent away the fleet already to Utica, and before he was gone up into the land far from the sea, had encamped upon the next hils thereby, placed guards of horsemen in convenient places, and put out certaine foragers into the fields and villages for to raise booties. These having entred skirmish with the Carthaginian corner of horsemen, slew a few of them in the very conflict, but most of them as they fled and were followed in chase: amongst whom was Hanno C also the Provost marshall, a noble young gentleman. Scipio not only wasted the country all about, but also won a citie of the Affricanes that stood neereest, and was of sufficient wealth: where besides other pillage which was presently imbarcked in the ships of burden and sent into Sicilie, there were taken prisoners eight thousand polles of free and bond one with another.
 But the greatest joy and contentment that the Romanes tooke in this new entrance and beginning of their warlike affaires, was for the comming of Masanissa; whom some report to have presented himselfe with two hundred horse and no more: but the most do write that he came with two thousand. But for as much as this Masanissa was of all other kings for his time the greatest Prince and most puissant, and withall, he that stood the Romanes in best sted, and helped their state, none like unto him: me thinks it wereworth the labour, and would quit for all the D paines, to digresse a little out of the way, for to shew and declare in what varietie of alternative fortune he was tossed, both in the losse and also in the recoverie of the inheritance of his fathers kingdome.

This Masanissa, while hee was employed during the warres of Spaine, in the defence and quarrell of the Carthaginians; his father, whose name was Gala, hapned to dye: and then the kingdome fell by descent, according to the custome and manner of the Numidians, unto Desfalces the late kings brother, a man of great yeeres, and very aged. And not long after, when Desfalces also was departed this life, Capusa the elder of his two sonnes, (for the other was a very child) succeeded in his fathers kingdome. But for as much as hee the fore-said Capusa maintained his royall estate and throne, more by reason of the authoritie and E reputation that hee caried among his friendes and favorites, than by power and strength; there arose up in armes one named Mezetulus (who also was descended of royall blood, but of an house that was ever of the adverse and contrarie side) and contended in much varietie of fortune about the crowne, with those who then swayd the scepter. This Mezetulus having gathered a powre of his tenants, followers, and paisants of the country (with whom he caried a great stroke and was highly esteemed, by reason of the hatred that they bare unto the kings race) encamped openly and shewed himselfe in action, yea and forced the king to come into the field, and to try the title of the crowne in a set battaile by dint of sword. In which conflict, Capusa, together with many of his peeres and nobles was slaine, and the whole nation and seignorie of the Massylians, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Mezetulus.
 F Howbeit he forbore to be called king; and contenting himselfe with the meane name of Tutor or Protector, gave the kings stile unto the child Lacumax, who only remained alive of the kings issue & line. He tooke to wife a noble dame & ladie of Carthage, Annibal his neece by his sister, who had bene lately wedded unto king Desfalces; hoping thereby to enter into league and alliance with the Carthaginians: and besides, for to renew the ancient familiaritie and amitie with Sy- phax, phax, he sent embassadors unto him of purpose. Thus made he himself strong aforehand against G Masanissa.

Masanissa likewise for his part, being advertised of his uncles death, and also how his cousin germaine was deceased: crossed the seas out of Spaine over to Mauritania, at what time as Boc- char was king of the Mores. At whose hands by humble sute & importunate prayers in most lowly manner, he obtained a power of foure thousand Mores to accompanie him in his journey, for otherwise to imploy them in warre he might not. And after he had dispatched a messenger aforehand to those that were his fathers friends and well-willers to himselfe, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realme, there met him almost five hundred Numidians.
Having therefore sent backe againe the Mores from thence unto the king, according to covenant, albeit there was assembled together a smaller number of people than he hoped and looked for, and not so sufficient that he durst adventure upon so great an enterprise; and supposing with-all, that by entering into some action, and by travaile and endeavour, he should gather strength still to performe some greater exploit, he encountreth at Thapsus the young king Lacumax, as he journeied unto Syphax. And when the kings companie in great feare fled into the towne, Masanis- sa both at the first assault woon the said towne, and also of the kings traine received some that yeelded themselves, and slew other some that made resistance in their owne defence. But the greatest part with the child himselfe the young Prince, got away in that tumult and escaped unto Syphax, unto whom at first they intended their journey. The same of this small thing, so happily atchieved in the first beginning & entrance of his affaires, caused all the Numidians to revolt and side with Masanissa. So as there flocked unto him from all parts of the countrie, and out of the villages, the old souldiours of king Gala, and incited the young Prince and set him on to recover his fathers kingdom. Now in number of souldiours, Mezelulus was a good deale superiour: for both himselfe had the same armie still entier, with which he had vanquished Capusa, besides some others that after the slaughter of the king, he had received upon their yeelding: and also young Lacumax the infant, had brought great aids from Syphax: so that Mezelulus was fiftene thousand foot, and ten thousand horse strong. With whom Masanissa, albeit he were nothing so puissant either in foot or horse, fought a battell; yet atchieved hee the victorie through the approved valour of the old souldiours, and his owne politicke wisdom, being a captain well experienced and exercised both in Romane and Punick warres. The young prince together with his tutour and protectour, and some small number of Massylians, fled and escaped into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Masanissa having recovered his fathers kingdom, & foreseeing that there remained still behind a farre greater bickermment and encounter with Syphax, & taking it to be the best course and pollicie for him, to be reconciled and made friends with his cousin germaine: addrested certaine messengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope & assurance, that if he would submit and yeeld himselfe under the protection of Masanissa, he should live in as honourable place and degree with him, as Desalees sometime had done with his father Gala: & also to Mezelulus to give their word & promise unto him, not onely for impunitie of all trespasses, but also for faithfull restitution of all things that were his. By which meanes hee persuaded both of them to take part with him: who made choise of a mean estate at home in their owne countrie, rather than to live in exile: notwithstanding the Carthaginians labored all that ever they could to the contrarie.

Asdruball hapned at that time when these occurrences fell out, to make his abode with Sy- phax: who finding the Numidian king Syphax resolved upon this point, and fully persuaded, That it mattered not, nor imported himself much, whither Lacumax or Masanissa were king of the Massylians: replied upon him and said, That he was foully deceived, if he thought that Masanis- sa would keepe himselfe within those teames, that either his father Gala or his uncle Desalees, held them contented with: No, no, (quoth he) there is much more towardnesse in him, and farre greater signes of haucie mind and forward wit and spirit appeare in him, than ever shewed in any of his house and line before him. Full often hath hee in Spaine made good proove of rare valor and singular prowesse, as well unto his friends as his enemies. And let both Syphax and the Carthaginians looke as well about them as they can, for unless they put out this sparke of fire betimes, and even at the first beginning, it will be their chauce to be caught therewith, when it shall burne soorth; and able they shall not bee to helpe the matter and quench the rage thereof. Mary as yet his strength is small and slender, his forces fraile, tender, and feeble, and not well united

A united together to maintaine his state, unsettled as he is in his kingdom. Thus hee importuned him still by reasons and persuasions, untill at length he reduced him to lead forth an armie into the confines of the Massylians: and there in that territorie, about the title whereof he had oftentimes noisily contended by plea and words with Gala, but also by armes and dint of sword, to encampe himselfe in his rightfull and undoubted inheritance; with this direction, That if any came against him to warne him off the ground, then to trie his interest by sword: which was the only way of necessitie to be taken, and most for the purpose: but in case for feare of him they quit the possession quietly, then to advance forward into the heart of the kingdom: for either the Massylians would without battaile render themselves under subjection, or else in a pitched field not be able to stand out against him. Upon these suggestions Syphax was incited & pricked on so much, as he made warre upon Masanissa, and in the first battaile discomfited and put to flight the Massylians. And Masanissa with some few horsmen fled out of the field & escaped unto a mountaine, which the inhabitants call Balbus. Certaine whole families and householdes with their sheds and tents, together with their catraile (which is all their riches) went after and followed the king. But all the multitude of the Massylians besides, did homage unto Syphax and came under his obedience. This mountaine aforesaid, which these exiles that fled their countrie was possessed of, was plentifull of grasse and well watered; and being so good for pasture to feed their catraile, it yeelded sufficient maintenance and food abundant, for the people that used to live up-pon flesh and milke. From hence they began at first to steale out by night and make rodes; but afterwards in open day light to rob & spoile al the countrie about; but above all others to fire and burne the territorie of the Carthaginians: both because there were more prizes to be had from thence, than from the Numidians; and also for that it was more safe robbing & harrying there without danger. This they practised so long, so licentious, and in such scornfull manner, that now they would carrie their booties to the sea side, and make markets and sale therof to the merchants: and for this purpose divers ships arrived thither to traffick: yea & otherwhiles there were many of the Carthaginians cut off and came short home, and more of them were either slaine or taken prisoners, than oftentimes in open warres and set battailes. The Carthaginians bewailed and complained of these matters unto Syphax, and spurred him forward (disposed well enough as hee was of himselfe to revenge) for to pursue the reliques of the warre, in his owne person. But forasmuch as it was not thought to stand with the roiall maiestie of a king, to chase and hunt a ra-ble of vagrant theeves about the mountaines; therefore Bocchar, one of the kings captaines, a right hardie and valourous man, was chosen to do the feat, and to performe that service. Who had the conduct of foure thousand foot, and two thousand horse: and was promised besides, great gifts and mightie rewards, in case hee brought away the head of Masanissa: but if hee could take him prisoner alive, that were alone indeed, & a peecelesse peece of work, of inestimable joy beyond all measure. Hee waiting his time when the enemies were stragling rechelessly abroad, came upon them at unawares and charged them, and having singled out from the guard of the armed soldiours, a huge number both of people and catel, he forced Masanissa himselfe with some few horsmen to take the top of the mountain. From whence after he had sent away unto the king (as if the warre had now ben at point of an end) not onely a great bootie both of people and catraile, the which hee had taken, but also part of his forces, as being much greater in proportion, than for to dispatch the remnants of a war: accompanied with no more than five hundred foot, and two hundred horse, he pursued Masanissa being come downe from the hill tops, & there having beset & stopped the passages at both ends, enclosed him within the streight & narrow vallie.
Where there was committed a great execution and carnage of the Massylians, but Masanissa with fiftie horsmen and not above, got away through the unknowne and hidden cranks of the mountaine, and escaped the hands of the pursuers. Howbeit, Bocchar traced him still, and followed him at heeles so narrowly, that neere to the cittie Clupea hee overtook him in the plaines, where he so streightly environned him about, that he killed all his companie every one, save only four hundred horsmen. With whom, in that tumult hee let slip as it were out of his hands Masanissa also himselfe, sore wounded, and lost him cleane. As he fled, he had still in his cie certain corners of horsmen disperfed all over the plain, & some of them crossing the waies overthwart to meet the enemy at every turn, and to intercept him. But he and the foure horsmen with him fled forward still, and tooke the great river before them: for their feare & fright was greater than to make any stay at the banke side, but to put their horses to it, and plunge in: where they were caried with the current of the streame, and borne to a side: two of them in the sight of the enemies, were swallowed up of the deepe hurtpits; himselfe also was supposed to have perished with them, but he and the other two horsemen besides caught hold of certaine twigs of officers that grew under the bankes on the farther side. So Boichar made an end of farther pursuit, as neither daring to take the river, nor beleiving that hee had any enemy for rescue. And thus returned hee to the king with false newes, that Masanissa was drowned. And divers poits and courtiers were sent out to Carthage, to report these exceeding joyfull tidings. This rumour and false fame of Masanissa his death, being noised all over Affricke, wrought diversly in the minds of men. But Masanissa keeping himselfe close in a secret cave, whiles hee cured his hurt with certaine herbes, lived for some daies by the breiving and robbrie of the other two horsemen. So soon as the wound was once healed up and skinned over, and that he thought himselfe able to abide the sitting & thinking of his horse, with exceeding courage and boldnesse he set forward againe to claime and recover his kingdome. And having in the way as he passed, gotten together unto him not above fortie horse, by that time that hee was come among the Malythians, and gave out openly who hee was, he prevailed so much with them, that as well in regard of their ancient favour and love toward him, as also for the unexpected joy, that they saw him alive and sound, whom they verily beleived to have beene dead; within few daies there were gathered and assembled unto him 6000 foot, and 4000 horse. So as not onely hee was restored againe, and put in full possession of his fathers kingdome, but also waited and spoiled the confederate nations of the Carthaginians, yet, and the frontiers and confines of the Masæyli, which belonged to the kingdome and dominion of Syphax. Having thus provoked Syphax to war, he set him downe and encamped betwene the cities of Cirtha and Hippo, upon the ridge of certaine hills, places of advantage and commodious in all respects. Then Syphax supposing it a greater peece of work, and of more importance than to be managed by his captaines, sent part of his forces under the conduct of his sonne, the young prince, named Vermina, and gave order unto him to wheele about with his power, and whiles the enemy was amused upon himselfe one way, to charge upon him behind another way. So Vermina set forth, and tooke his way by night, because he was to give the charge closely, and in secret. But Syphax, who was to shew himselfe with banner displayed, and to bid the enemy battell, marched openly by day light, and advanced forward. And when the time (as hee thought) was come, wherein they that were sent about to fetch a compass, might reach to the place appointed, himselfe also trusting as well in the multitude of his men, as in the ambush laid before at the enemies backe, set his battell in array; directly upon the side of the hill, which with gentle and easie ascent ariseth, and leadeth toward the enemy. Masanissa likewise arranged his men, presuming most of all in the plot of ground, which served much better for his advantage to fight. The battell was sharpe and cruell, and for a long time doubtfull. While the site of the place, and valour of the souldiours much helped Masanissa; and the number againe on the other side, which exceeded beyond all measure, and made too great odds, availed Syphax. This multitude divided into two battaillons, whiles the one was opposed affront the enemy, and the other compassed about their taile and backe part, gave the victorie cleere unto Syphax: insomuch, as the enemy thus enclosed both before and behind, had no way in the world to escape. Whereupon all the footmen and horsemen both were either killed or taken prisoners. Onely two hundred horsemen or very neere so many, which were gathered in a ring together about Masanissa, hee commaunded to cast themselves by troupes and squadrons into three severall companies, and so to pearce and breake through: but first he appointed them a certaine place before, where they should rallie and meet together againe after their scattered flight. Himselfe in person, at one side which he had proposed to himselfe before, made meanes to passe through the very pikes & darts of the enemies, and escaped. Two of those squadrons tarried still behind, the one for feare yielded to the enemy, the other sticking to it, & making more resistance, was overcharged with shot of arrowes and darts. But Masanissa winding in & out, to and fro, deluded Vermina, who pressed hard upon him, and followed him fast at heeles: and after he had wearied him out at length in tedious travaile and desperate pursuit, caused him perforce to give over the chase. While he himselfe with seventie horse gat away as farre as to the lesse * Syrtis. Where he set up his rest, & quieted his conscience, in that hee had so often right valiantly fought to recover the inheritance of his fathers kingdome: and led his life betwene the * Punicke Emporia, and the nation of the Garamants, untill the arrivall of the Romane navie, and C. Lælius into Affricke. These presumptions

* Golfo di Capri. These Syrtis, as well they are called as the lesse, as the Mediterranean sea near Tripoli, full of shelves and brars: & are called Secche or Baros de Barbaria.
* The sea coast, neere the Syrtis, so called for their sterility, as Ortelius hath mentioned of Polybus.

A tions induce me to thinke and beleieve, that Masanissa came afterwards also to Scipio with a small power of horsemen, rather than with any great aid. For that multitude was besitting the state of a prince, established in his kingdome, but this small number befecmed the meane condition and fortune of a poore exile and banished man.

Now to return againe unto our storie. The Carthaginians having lost the cornet of horsemen aforesaid, together with their captain, and raised another power of horse, by taking new musters, made Hanno the sonne of Amilcar commaunder over them. And first by messengers and letters missive they sent for Asdruball and Syphax one after another, and at last also even by Embassadors and Orators. As for Asdruball, they required him to succour his native country, beset in manner round about: Syphax they besought and requested to provide for the safetie & defence of Carthage and all Affricke.

B At that time Scipio was encamped neere Vtica, within a mile of the citie: for he was removed from the sea side, where some few daies, he kept a standing camp close to the fleet. Hanno having received a power of Cavallerie, nothing sufficient and strong ynough to charge upon the enemy, nor so much as to guard and defend the countrie from wasting and spoiling, first before all other things cast about and devised, how he might augment his number of horsemen by a new levie and enroulement. And albeit hee rejected none of other nations, yet hee levied and waged the Numidians especially, the best horsemen simple in all Affricke. Now had hee gathered together upon a foure thousand horse, when hee surprised a citie named Salera, almost fiftene miles from the Romane campe. And when word was brought to Scipio, that so great a Cavallerie tooke up their summer standing harbour within a towne; Tush (quoth hee) I passe not, if they were more than they are, so long as they have such a one for to be their leader. And thinking with himselfe, that the more slowly the enemies went to worke, the lesse hee was to slacke his businesse, he sent Masanissa before with the horsemen, and gave commaundement to ride up and down before the gates, to brave the enemy, and to traine him forth to fight: with this direction, that when their whole multitude was issued forth, and the skirmish growne so hote, that hee might not well endure the charge, hee should give ground and recule by little and little, for hee would himselfe come in due time to the battell. And staying no longer behind, than whiles he thought Masanissa who was gone afore, had time ynough to traine the enemies forth, he followed after in person with the Romane horsemen, and marched closely under the hills (which stood fide for the purpose, opposite betwene him and the enemy) about every turning of the way. Masanissa for the nones according to the direction given him, one while right courageously galloped before the gates, as one that would brave and terrifie the enemy, another while as if he had been afraid himselfe, gave backe; and by this counterfeite shew of fearefulnessse, hee made the enemies more bold and venturous, and drew them on to pursue him rashly. But as yet they were not all gone forth, and their captaine was diversly troubled, and had much adoew with them, whiles he was faine to force and compell some that had taken their load of wine, and were heave headed and sleepe withall, to arme themselves, and to bridle their horses, and to stay others from running out of all the gates at once confusedly, without order and array, and without their colours. Masanissa caught up those, and cut them short, that apart from their companie at the first setting out, rode venturously forward, and tooke no heed to themselves: but anone when more of them rushed forth at once out of the gate, the skirmish was maintained with equall valour on both sides, and at last, when all the horsemen were abroad and joined in battell, Masanissa was not possibly able to hold out any longer. Howbeit he fled not outright, but as he gave backe leisurely, he received them as they violently charged upon him, so long, untill he had trained them to those hills, under which the Romane Cavallerie lay hidden. Then rose the horsemen from out of their ambush, themselves in heart, and their horses fresh; and environned Hanno and the Africanes, who with fighting and following were tired out and overwied: Masanissa likewise turned his horses so daimeily, and made head againe, and returned to battaile afresh: so there were environed, intercepted, and killed in the place together with Hanno himselfe the Generall, fast upon a thousand, even as many as were in the vaward, and could not well retire themselves backward. The rest affrighted with the death of their leader, fled with bridle on horse necke: whome for the space of three miles the conquerors followed in chase upon the spur, and either slew or tooke prisoners two thousand horsemen of them besides. Amongst whom there were, as it is for certaine knowne, no fewer than two hundred naturall Carthaginians, men of armes, and divers of them of good marke, both in regard of wealth and riches, as also of birth and noble parentage.

It fortune that the very same day when this hapned, the ships which had transported over the bootie into Sicilie, returned back charged with provision of victuals, as if they bodened and foretoked by their arrivall, that they were come for a new pillage and fresh prizes. But all writers do not accord, that two Carthaginian captaines of one name were slaine in two battailes of the Cavallerie: for feare (as I verily take it) least by telling one thing twice, they might seeme to deceive and abuse the reader. Certes, Calius and Valerius report that Hanno was taken prisoner. Then Scipio bestowed rich gifts upon the captaines and horsemen according to their good service, and as they every one deserved: but Above all the rest, he highly rewarded Masinissa. And when he had placed a strong garison in Salera, himselfe with the rest of his armie made rodes; and not only wasted and spoiled the lands and villages all the way as he went, but also forced and woon certaine cities and borough townes: and so having filled all places farre and neere with the terror of warre and hostilitie, he returned to the camp, the seventh day after he set forth; bringing with him great numbers of people, much store of cattaille, and prizes of all sorts; and so dispatched away the ships a second time freight and laden with the spoiles of enemies. After this, he sent all light expeditions, small rodes and sassage of the country townes, and bent his whole power and all his forces against Vtica: intending if he had once woon it, to settle himselfe there, and to make it his seate against forward, and a sure place of defence in all his other exploits that he meant to perform. Thither at one time were the sea servitours brought from the armada, to that part of the citie where the sea beateth upon the walls: likewise the land souldiers advanced from the hill that overlooketh the towne, and joyneth in manner hard to the very walls. As for artillerie and engines of batterie and assault, some they had brought with them, and others were sent out of Sicilie with the victuals: and daily new were made in the common Armorie and Arsenall, where there were of purpose artificers continually kept at worke for the framing of such fabricks and peeces of batterie. The men of Vtica beset thus round about on every side with so great preparation and ordinance of war, reposed their whole hope and confidence in the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians relied themselves upon Asdruball, in case that he could sollicite Syphax for to set to his helping hand. But all things went but slowly forward, and they bestirred themselves not so quickly, as they should have done who wanted so much aid as they did. And Asdruball when he had with all the meanes and the best shift that he could make, gathered together thirtie thousand foote and three thousand horse, yet durst he not approach the enemy, before the coming of Syphax to joine with him. At length came Syphax with fiftie thousand foote, and ten thousand horse: and immediately departing from Carthage, encamped not farre from Vtica and the Romane campe. Whose arrivall yet was so important, and wrought this effect, that Scipio after fortie dayes welneere (during which time he had invested Vtica and tried all mastries but in vain) was compelled to remove his siege and dislodge, without doing any good at all. For now the winter approached, and he fortified his standing leaguer for winter harbour upon a promontorie, which joyneth to the continent by a thin and narrow ridge of a banke, lieth out a good way and beareth into the sea. And with one and the selfsame trench and rampier, he empaled both his armie, and also the ships that lay up in the dock. The legions were quartered and lodged in the mids of the said cape: the ships that were drawn up to land, and likewise the sailers and mariners, kept the strond on the north side of the hill: the horsemen tooke up the vale toward the south, upon the hanging and side thereof, shooting to the other shore. And these were the acts atcheived in Affricke untill the end of Autumne.

Besides the provision of corne gathered from all parts out of the countries pilled and wasted round about, and other store of victuals brought out of Sicilie and Italie, Cn. Octavius the Vizetor arrived with a mightie deale of graine out of Sardinia, sent from T. Claudius the Pretor, who had the government of that Iland: so as not onely the old garners already made were replenished, but also those that were newly built. Onely there wanted apparell for the armie. Whereupon Octavius had in commission to breake with the Pretor about that matter, namely, what liveries might be provided out of that province, and sent for the supplie of that defect. Which businesse was not slackly followed, but with all diligence performed, in such sort, as in short space there were sent over 1200 side horsemens cotes, and twelve thousand short cassocks and jackets.

During

A During the time of that summer wherein these occurrences passed in Affricke, P. Sempronius the Confull who governed the Province of the Brutij, skirmished suddenly in a disordered manner with Anniball upon the very way, within the territorie of Croton: where the fight was maintained rather by Squadrons and companies one to one, than by any set bodie of a ranged battaile. The Romanes were discomfited; and having lost in this conflict (which might more truly be called a tumultuous skuffling than a full fight) upon 1200 of the Confulls armie, they retired in great hast and feare into their camp. Yet durst not the enemies make an assault upon them within their hold. But the Confull dislodged from thence in the dead time of the next night, and having dispatched a courier before unto P. Licinius the Viz-confull, for to come forward with his legions, he joyned his power unto them. So they returned againe unto Anniball, being now two Generals, and two entier armies. And without any stay, to battaile they went: whiles the Confull on the one side stood upon this his power redoubled and reenforced, and Anniball on the other side tooke hart for his fresh victorie aforesaid. Sempronius advanced with his legions into the vaward; P. Licinius with his, kept the rereward. The Confull at the very first shock and beginning of the medley, vowed a chappell to Fortune under the name of Primigenia, in case he might have the honor of that day, and vanquish his enemies. And surely his vow was heard, and he obtained his desire: for the Carthaginians were discomfited and put to flight, and more than foure thousand armed men slaine, three hundred or somewhat under taken prisoners, fortie horse of service gotten alive, and eleven ensignes woun and caried away. Anniball dismayed and daunted at this adverse and unluckie battaile, withdrew his forces to Croton.

C At the same time M. Cornelius the Confull, in another side of Italie held in awe Herruria, not so much by force of armes, as by rigorous processe of law and severe justice: for all that country in manner was turned to Mago, and by his meanes and favor hoped for a change, and were altogether set upon novelties and an alteration of the state. The examinations & judicall trials of these matters the Confull followed by vertue of commission from the Senate, and not upon his owne motive & seeking: and went through therewith, setting aside all partialitie, nothing respective either of favor or displeasure. In such sort, that many of the nobilitie of Tuscanie (such as either had repaired themselves in person, or had sent their agents unto Mago, for to treat with him about the revolt and rebellion of the States wherein they lived) were at first, as many as made personall apparance, condemned: but afterwards, such as had guiltie consciences, went into D voluntarie exile: and being condemned in their absence, in stead of their bodies which were gone out of the way, they yielded and left behind them their goods only, which might be forfeit and confiscate as pawns to pay for the punishment of their persons.

While the Coss. were thus employed in divers places one from the other, the Censors in the meane time at Rome, M. Livius and C. Claudius, held a new choise and review of Senators: and Q. Fabius was once againe chosen the principall Senator and President of the Senat. Seven in number of them were noted with ignominie and disgrace, but not one of all those had suten in the yvorie chaire and borne office of state. They looked narrowly & most faithfully to the publicanes, that had the charge of the city-buildings to see them kept wind-tight & water-tight, and in sufficient reparations. They publicly gave order for a paved causie to be made, from the beaulty market unto the temple of Venus, and all about the shops and scaffolds in the shew-places. Also the church of Magna Mater [the great mother of the gods] they caused to bee built in the mount Palatine. They instituted also a new tax and impost out of the provision of salt. And whereas both at Rome and throughout all Italie, salt was sold at a * Sextant by the Modius, they set and fermed this commoditie, to be served out at the same price still in Rome: but in the market townes and faires, they enhaunfed the price higher, and in sundrie places they rated it at divers prices. This tax was devised as all men verily beleaved, by the one of the Censors, for anger, and an old grudge that he bare unto the people; because he had bene in times past unjustly judged and condemned by them, and therefore in the pension and price of salt they supposed that those tribes were most pinched and charged who were the means of the hard doome that passed against him. And hereupon it came that this Livius was furnished Salinotor. The Cense and numbring of the citizens was finished the later, because the Censors had sent about into all provinces, that the full number should be taken of all Romanie citizens, who were without in the armies, and presentment made accordingly. So there were registred in all, with those abroad, two hundred and seven and fiftie thousand persons. And C. Claudius Nero was he that performed and accomplished this numbring and assessment. After this there was a Cense or taxation taken of the twelve Colonies, a thing then brought up and never before. And according to the relation of the Censors they were entred into the subsidie booke at Rome: that it might appeare upon record in the publicke instruments and writings, what number of able men for warre they could make, and what every man was worth in money and goods. Then they began to take a survey of the gentlemen and knights of Rome. And it fortuned so, that both Censors had horses of the cities provision and charges. And when the crier came to cite those of the tribe Pollia, which in the name of M. Livius was enrolled, and made some stay to call the Censor himselfe by name: Call hardly (quoth Nero) for M. Livius. And whither it were upon the relics of an olde cankered malice, or that he tooke a foolish pride and vaine delight to seeine forth to be severe and precise, hee commaunded M. Livius to sell his horse of service, because hee had bene sometimes a man condemned by the doome of the people. Semblably M. Livius when the crier was come to the tribe Narniensis, and to the name of his colleague, awarded C. Claudius to sell & make away his great horse likewise: & that for two causes, the one for that he had borne false witness & deposed wrongfully against him: the other, because he was not soundly and in truth of heart reconciled unto him, when they were made friends. Whereupon there grew a foule jarre and contention betweene them, whiles they passed not to impeach and stein the credit one of the other, even with the touch and hazard of their owne good name and reputation. At the end of the Censureship, when C. Claudius had sosome to keepe and observe the lawes, and was ascended up into the chamber of the cities treasure; among the other names of those that hee left as disfranchised and tributaries, he declared his colleague for one, and gave up his name in the roll. Afterwards came M. Livius into the chamber aforesaid, and setting aside the tribe Metia only (which neither had condemned himselfe, nor elected him a condemned person for Consull or Censor) he declared the whole people of Rome likewise suspended, even foure and thirtie tribes; and lett them all, no better than meer straungers and aliens, in regard of taxes & tributes: and why? because they had both condemned him, an innocent and guiltlesse man; & being thus condemned, had created him Coss. & Censor notwithstanding: neither could they denie but that they had erred and done amisse once in their judgement, and twice in their elections. And among those foure and thirtie tribes, he pronounced that C. Claudius also should be reckoned for one: protesting moreover, that if he could have found any one precedent, to have led him to the disfranchising of one man twice, he would have left C. Claudius by name, as a noted person by himselfe, in the checkroll of the cittie chamber.

Surely that reciprocall debate betweene the two Censors, in depraving and diffaming one another, was but a lewd & naughtie part by them plaid: but this chastisement of the peoples levitie and inconstancie, was a worthie thing, and becomming the Censors gravitie of that time. While the Censors stood thus in exceeding disgrace and hatred with the people, Cn. Bebius a Tribune of the Commons, taking his time and occasion hereby to rise and become great, ended them both and commenced an action against them before the bodie of the people. But this designation of his was soone dashed and came to nothing, through the generall accord and content of the lords of the Counsell: to the end that in time to come, no such example might bee extant upon record, that the Censors dignitie should be exposed to the variable & inconstant pleasure of the people.

The same summer in the Brutians countie, Petilia had bin alreadie forced & wooen by the Col. when as Consentia and Pandosia, with other mean and base peeces, willingly yeelded themselves to his devotion. Now when the time drew nere of the election of new magistrats, it was thought good that Cornelius should bee sent for to Rome out of Tuscane, where there was no warre at all, rather than the other Consull out of his province: who being come, created for Consuls Cnaeus Servilius Capio, and Cn. Servilius Geminus. After this, the court was assembled for the chusing of Pretours, wherein were elected P. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Quintilius Varus, P. Aelius Paterius, and P. Valerius Tappalus. These two last were Ediles of the Commons when they were chosen Pretors. The Consull after these elections were finished and past, returned to his annie againe into Hetruria. Certain Priests and Prelats that year died, & new were chosen in their roumes. P. Veturius Philo, Flamin of Mars was created, installed, and inaugurated, in steed of M. Aemilius Regillus, who deceased the year before. And in place of M. Pomponius Matto, who was both Augur and Decemvir, there was advanced into the dignitie of Decemvir, M. Aurelius Cottus: & into the office of Augur,

A gur, Tit. Sempronius Gracchus, a very young man: a rare thing to be seene in those daies, in the bestowing of sacerdotall and church-promotions. In that year was set up in the capitoll a chariot drawne with foure steeds, all of beaten gold, by C. Livius and M. Servilius Geminus, Ediles of the chaire for the time being. The Romane games also were exhibited and renewed againe for two daies: likewise the plaies and pastimes called Plebeij, for other two daies by the Ediles of the Commons, P. Aelius and P. Villius. And for the greater honour of those games, the feast of Jupiter was solemnly kept and celebrated.

THE XXX. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS

of Padoa, from the foundation of the

Cittie of Rome.

The Breviarie of L. Florus upon the thirtith Booke.

N Africk, Scipio by the helpe of M. Asiniss a in sundrie battels vanquished the Carthaginians, together with the aforesaid Syphax king of the Numidians, & Asdruball. He woon & sacked two camps of the enemies, wherein there perished by fire and sword, to the number of 40000 men. By the means of C. Laelius he tooke Syphax alive. M. Asiniss a when he had taken prisoner queen Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax & daughter of Asdrubal, by & by fell in love with her, and by way of marriage tooke her to wife: but being chastised & rebuked therfore by Scipio, he sent unto her a cup of poison: which she drank, & therof died. By the manifest willies of Scipio it came to passe, that the Carthaginians driven to despair, were faine to call for Anniball out of Italie, to save the maine chance, and defend their whole state: Who, in the sixteenth yeare of the warres, departed out of Italie sailed over into Affricke, and assaid by meanes of conference, to make peace with Scipio. And when they could not agree about the conditions and capitulations thereof, he fought, and was overthrowne in the plainesfield. The Carthaginians at their suite and request, had peace granted. And when Gisgo dissuaded that peace, Anniball plucked him backe with his hand, and so after some excuse made of his rude rafhnesse in that behalfe, himselfe spake for peace. Mago who had fought with the Romanes in the countie of the Isurians, was grievously wounded, and being sent for home into Affricke by certaine Embassadors, in the way died of his hurt. M. Asiniss a was fully restored to his kingdome. Scipio being returned to the cittie of Rome, had the glorie of a most honourable and noble triumph: whom Q. Tereus Culeo, a Senator, followed with a cap [of freedome] upon his head. Scipio was surnamed Africinus: but doubtfull it is, whether he came by that title through the favour of his soldiers before, or the generall applause and affection of the people. But this is certaine, that he was the first Generall that ever was intitled in his style, with the surname of a nation by himselfe conquered.

*W*hen Cn. Servilius Capio, and C. Servilius Geminus (Coss. in that yeare, which by computation was the sixteenth of the second Punick war) proposed unto the Senate, concerning the affaires of the State, the managing of the warres, and the government of the provinces: the LL. ordained and gave order, That the Consuls should either agree betweene themselves, or els cast lots whether of them should goe into the Brutian land against Anniball: and whether should take upon him the charge of the province of Hetruria and the Ligurians: with commissiion for him, whose hap it was to rule the province of the Brutij, to receive the armie from P. Sempronius the Consull; & the said P. Sempronius (for he also as Vice-consull was to continue in place of government one year longer) to succeed in the roume of P. Licinius, who was to return home to Rome.

Rome. This P. Sempronius among other commendable parts (wherein no citizen in his time was counted more sufficiently furnished than himselfe) was taken also for a brave warriour and man at armes. For being richly endued with all those good blessings that either nature or fortune can afford unto a man, he was both noble in birth, & wealthie in substance. In beautifull personage he excelled, for strength of bodie he farre surpassed. Of tongue and speech he was thought most eloquent, whether he were to plead a cause at the barre, or occasion offered either in Senat house or before the assemblie of the people to perswade or dissuade, to give counsell one way or other. In the Pontificall canons and laws, he was singularly well learned and skillfull. Besides all these praise-worthie qualities (I say) his Consulship had given him experience also in militarie affairs, and made him a worthie soldiour. The same order that was taken for the Brutians province, was also decreed for Hetruria & the Ligurians. M. Cornelius was commaunded to put over & deliver up his armie to the new Consul: & himselfe to continue still in government, & to rule the province of Fraunce with the strength of those legions which L. Scribonius the Pretor had under his charge the yeare before. After this, the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. Vnto C. Cato fell the Brutii, unto Servilius Geminus, Hetruria. Then the Pretours provinces also were put to the choise of lotterie. And P. Aelius his lot was to have the civile iurisdiction of the citie of Rome: P. Lentulus to rule Sardinia: P. Villius to governe Sicilie: and Quintilius Varus to have the charge of Ariminum with two legions, which were commaunded by Sp. Lucretius. And Lucretius had his commission revived againe for a longer time, to the end, that hee might reedifie the towne Genua, which by Mago the Carthaginian had been rased and destroyed. As for P. Scipio, his commission and government was not limited by any expresse time, but onely with the end of the warres, and to continue untill those wars in Affricke were fully determined. A decree also passed, that there should be a solemne procession and supplication holden to this effect, and in these termes, That whereas he had failed over into the province of Affricke, this voiage and expedition of his might turne to the safetie and good of the people of Rome, of himselfe, and his armie. In Sicilie were enrolled three thousand souldiours. And for as much as the whole strength and manhood of that province had been shipped over into Affricke: for feare least some Armada should cut over out of Affricke, it was thought expedient to guard all the sea coasts of Sicilie, with a fleet of shippes saile. And Villius had with him into Sicilie thirteene shippes, newly built; the rest of the old shippes in Sicilie were repaired. For Admirall of this armada was appointed M. Pomponius, the Pretour of the former yeare, whose government was prorogued, and hee embarked the new souldiours brought out of Italie. The like number of shippes the LL. of the Senat assigned unto Cn. Octavius the Pretour of the former yeare, with the same commission of government, for to defend the coasts of Sardinia. And Lentulus was commaunded to allow unto the Pretour two thousand souldiours for to man and furnish those shippes. Moreover, the sea coasts of Italie, because it was uncertaine to what parts the Carthaginians would make out their navie (and like it was, that where they could espie any place weake and disurnished of sufficient strength and garrison, thither they would direct and bend their forces) were committed to M. Martius the Pretour of the former yeare, that hee should scour the seas, and keepe that side, with as many shippes as the other. And for to furnish that fleet of his, the Consuls by order from the Senat enrolled three thousand souldiours, and reserved two legions besides, against all doubtfull chaunces of warre whatsoever. As for the two provinces of Spaine, together with the armies there, and the whole government, they were appointed to the old Generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidennus. So the Roman warres for that yeare were maintained with twentie legions in all, and with a hundred and sixtie shippes of warre. Then the Pretours were commaunded to take their journey into their several provinces. But the Consuls were charged before they departed from the citie, to exhibit those great Games, which T. Manlius Torquatus the Dictator had vowed against the fift yeares end, if so be the Commonweale remained in the same good and fortunate estate, during that time.

Now there entred into mens minds new doubts and strange scruples of conscience, by reason of divers prodigious sights and tokens reported out of many places. For beleevd it was that certaine ravens not only pecked and rased with their bills, but also ate and devoured the gold in the Capitoll. At Ancium the mice and rats gnawed a crowne of gold. About Capua, a huge number of locusts (but from whence they came, no man knew for certaine) overpried all the grounds, and filled the fields. At Reate there was a horse-colt foled with five feete. At Anagnia were seene in the element, at the first, divers fire-lights shooting and flashing here and there; and after-

A afterwards a mightie blasing comet burning. At Frusino a certaine arch compassed the sonne with a thin course like a line: and afterwards a greater circle of the sonne enclosed the said rundle from without-forth. In the territorie of Arpi, the earth in a plaine champain field setled and sunke downe and made an exceeding great chinke. As one of the Consuls killed the first beast for sacrifice, the liver thereof was found headlesse. These monstrous tokens were expiate and purged with sacrifices of the bigger sort: and the colledge of the priests and bishops shewed unto what gods the sacrifice should bee made. These things once done and performed, the Consuls and Pretours went forth into their provinces: yet so, as all of them had a speciall regard of Affricke, as if it had bene their owne province fallen unto every one of them by lot; either because they saw that therein rested and consisted the whole importance of all affaires, and the maine state of the warre: or els because they would grauise and currie favour with Scipio, whom now the whole citie made court unto, and chiefly respected. And therefore not only out of Sardinia as is before said, but also out of Sicilie and Spaine, there was transported thither raiment and corne: yea and armor also out of Sicilie, and all kind of victuals, for the maintenance of the armie. And albeit it was winter season, yet Scipio flaked no affaires and works of war: which being many, amused his mind at once on every side, and kept him continually occupied. For Vtica hee besieged and encamped, he lay opposite to Anniball, and even within his sight: the Carthaginians were with their shippes aforesaid, and put to sea, and a navie they had rigged, furnished and trimmed, for to intercept all victuals that came. Amid these cares he forgot not to win againe the love of Syphax, if haply now hee had his fill of love-delights with his fresh wife, since hee had the plentifull fruition thereof, as much as heart could desire. But Syphax rather tendered conditions of peace betweene the Romans and the Carthaginians, to wit, that the Romans should depart out of Affricke, and the Carthaginians out of Italie; than seemed to give any hope, that he would revolt from the Carthaginians, in case the warre continued still. And for mine own part, I would rather beleevd that these matters were treated upon by entercourse of messengers, as most writers doe report, than that Syphax himselfe in person, as Antias Valerius recordeth, came into the Roman campe to a parle and conference thereabout. At the first the Roman General, would scarcely lend his eare to heare those ouvertures: but afterwards, to the end that there might bee some colourable and probable cause for his people to resort unto the campe of the enemies, he seemed not so streight laced, nor to denie the same articles so stiffely, but pretended some hope, D that by often debating thereof to and fro betweene them, they should at length grow to some good point and finall agreement. The wintering harbours of the Carthaginians were in a manner all of wood, but built of slender stufte gathered out of the fields at adventure hand over head, where they could meet withall. The Numidians for the most part lay in cabbins and sheds, walled and wound with reeds especially, and covered and thatched with mats of sedge & such like, here and there scattering without all order: in such sort, as some of them taking up their lodging at their owne pleasure, without direction and commaundement of any officer, quartered without the trench and rampier. Scipio advertised hereof, conceived good hope to find some opportunitie one time or other to fire the campe of the enemies. Vpon a certaine day therefore, he sent in traine of those Commissioners whom he addressed unto Syphax, in steed of pages & drudges, and disguised in slaves and bondmens weed, the bravest souldiours of a band, (men of approved valor, wisdom, and discretion) who whiles the Commissioners were busie in conference, should range about the campe, some one way, some another; to espie and marke all the passages and waies in and out; the site and forme generally of the whole leaguer, and particularly of every part; where the Carthaginians quartered; where the Numidians lodged; what distance there was betweene Asdruball his tents, and the kings pavilions; to observe also and learne withall, the order and manner of their sentinels, their wards and watches, whether by night or by day they lay at more vantage to be surprised by an ambush. And according as there were divers meetings and conferences, so of purpose some were sent at one time, some at another; to the end that more and more still should have the spiall and full knowledge of all things in the enemies camp. Now when as the oftener that this matter was treated of, the greater hope of peace both Syphax had and the Carthaginians likewise by his means; the Delegates or Commissioners aforesaid of the Romans, said that they were expressly forbidden by their General to returne without a full and resolute answer. And therefore they willed him to make short worke at once, and to bethinke himselfe what to doe, either to stand upon his owne determinat purpose (if he were resolved) or els to consult sult with Asdruball and the Carthaginians, and determine accordingly. For now high time it is, say they, either to conclude peace, or to prosecute warre freshly, and to go through with it lustily. Thus while Syphax consulreth with Asdruball, and Asdruball with the Carthaginians, both the espials had sufficient time to view and see all, and Scipio also good leasure to provide necessities for his purpose. Moreover, by this motive and hope of peace, as well the Carthaginians as the Numidians, began (as commonly in such cases it falleth out) to be negligent & slack in forecalt, and to provide that in the meane while they came by no harme and detriment from the enemy. At length an answer was returned, and some clauses put in, without all reason, and founding to much inconvenience, by occasion that the Romanes seemed too too faine and desirous of a peace. Which fell out very fitly for Scipio, whose only desire was to pick some just quarrell for to breake the truce and abstinence of warre: and so the next day (for in the meane time he said he would conferre with his counsell) he answered the kings messenger in this wise, That besides himselfe alone, who laboured all in vaine and could do no good, there was none liked of the peace; and therefore he willed him to report unto the king his maister, that there was no other hope for Syphax to haue peace with Romanes, unlesse he renounced and cast off quite the friendship of the Carthaginians. And thus he ended the truce, that with free conscience being discharged of his promise in that behalfe, he might go forward in his designements, and bring his enterprise to his desired issue. So having put his ships to sea (for now the prime of spring was come) he embarked in them his artilerie, his ordinance and engines of batterrie, as if he meant to assault Vtica on the sea side. And sent out two thousand souldiers, to possesse themselves of the hill that overlooked Vtica, which he had held and kept before: both to withdraw the minds of the enemies from that which he secretly designed and intended, and amuse them upon the care and regard of another thing; and also to prevent a mischief, that whiles himselfe should go against Syphax and Asdruball, they might not fall forth of the citie, and assaile his camp, left with a small guard to defend it. Having made this way, and laid this ground aforehand, he assembled his counsell, where he commaunded as well the foresaid spies to lay forth and utter what they had scene and found, as also Masanissa; who was acquainted with all the manner and fashions of the enemies: and then at last he declared and shewed unto them, what himselfe intended to execute the next night. Then he gave commaundement to the Tribunes or Kn. Marshals, that so soone as the counsell was risen, and the court dismissed in the Generals pavilion, at the first sound of trumpets immediately they should bring their legions out of the camp. Thus according to his edict, the ensignes began a little before sunne setting to set forth. About the first watch they put the souldiers in aray readie for to march, and by midnight (for they were to journey seven miles) they going a faire & soft pace, approached the enemies camp. There Scipio gave unto Laelius a part of the forces together with Masanissa and his band of Numidians, with direction to invade the camp of Syphax, and to set fire thereupon. Then calling them by themselves both apart one from the other, Laelius Imean and Masanissa, he earnestly besought them of all love to make up and recompence by carefull industrie and devot that providence and forecalt, which the darknesse of the night disappointed them of. As for himselfe, he ment to set upon Asdruball and the Carthaginian camp: but begin he would not, before he saw the fire amongst the kings tents. And that was not long first ere it began: for so soone as the fire caught hold of the next pavilions whereupon it was cast, by and by it tooke all that stood neere it, and so forward to those that joynted unto them, untill it spred into all places of the camp. And verily into a great fright they were all put, as they could not choose, but needs must in a night skare fire, which was runne all over in so short a time. Howbeit, they thought it some fire by mischance only, and not the hand of enemy, by occasion and meanes of warre: and therefore unarmed as they were, and lightly appointed without weapons, they ran forth by heapes to quench the fire, and light full upon their armed enemies, the Numidians especially; who by Masanissa that was well acquainted with the manner of the kings camp, were bestowed in convenient places, at the ends of every avenue and passage. Many in their very beds and couches, betwene sleeping and waking, were consumed with the flame: many running headlong in this their hasty flight, one upon another, were in the streights of the gates troden under foote, or els thrust and crushed to death. The Sentinels and watch of the Carthaginians, espied at first the fire thining and flaming out: after whom others awakened and raised out of their nests by this nightlie tumult and alarme, might behold and plainly see the same: but they likewise were deceived as well as the other, and beleevd verily that

A that the fire began of it selfe by some misfortune, no man wist how. The confused noyse and cry also, which was heard whiles they were a killing, slaying and wounding, would not suffer them to know the truth indeede, whether the same arose upon their affright and sodaine feare by night, or otherwise. And therefore every man naked as he was, and suspecting no practise at all of the enemy, at all the gates as they stood next, did what he could to bring with him such instruments and meanes as were to put out the fire; and happened unwares upon the armie of the Romanes. Now after they were all massacred and put to the sword to the last man, not only upon an ordinarie hatred betwene enemies, but also because there might not escape so much as one to cary newes unto the rest: Scipio immediately entred the gates, being not warded, but altogether neglected, as in such a fearefull garboile and hurlyburly it was no mervaille. Then they fell a flinging of fire upon the lodgings and sheds that stood next, so as the flame brake out and shewed at first as if it had bene dispersed in many places: but afterwards catching and spreading from one tent to another as they joynted close together, they were all at once on a light fire, and burnt every stick downe to the ground. Men and cattails both, fenged and scorched at the first, as they ran in piteous and fearefull sort away: but afterwards as they tumbled one upon another by heapes, stopped and choked up all the waies and avenues of the gates. And looke who escaped the fire, fell upon the edge of the sword. Thus in one day were two camps cleane consumed. Howbeit, both the Generals, and of so many thousands of armed men, only two thousand foote, and five hundred horse armed by halves, and many of them either wounded or els fenged and halfe roasted with the fire, got away, and escaped. There were either slaine or burnt to ashes upon C fortie thousand men: taken prisoners there were above sixe thousand: among whom there happened to be many gentlemen of the Carthaginians, and eleven Senators. Of ensignes were taken 178. Of Numidian horses for service more than 2700. Sixe Elephants gotten alive, eight perished either with fire or sword: and a mightie deale of armour came to their hands: all which the L. Generall Scipio consecrated to Vulcane, and set on fire. Asdruball with some few Africanes that fled with him, rid away upon the spur to the next citie: and thither got all the rest, who remained alive, following the tracks of their captaine, and there saved themselves. But afterwards fearing least that citie would be yelded to Scipio, he quit the place and departed. Anon the Romanes were received within the same at the gates standing open for them: and because willingly of themselves they rendred the towne, there was no kind of hostilitie or violence offered unto D them. But two other cities one after another were forced and put to the ranack. All that pillage, as also whatsoever was saved out of the fire in the two camps, was freely given to the souldiers. Syphax encamped and fortified himselfe in a strong hold, almost eight miles off. But Asdruball made hast to Carthage, for feare least upon the sodaine fright occasioned by this fresh and late overthrow, things should go backward, and the Senat resolve upon some unmanly and unworthy course. Thither at the first arrived such fearefull newes, that all men thought verily that Scipio would give over Vtica and forthwith lay siege unto Carthage: whereupon their Suffetes (who are the Consuls as it were, of the citie) called the Senate: where three opinions were delivered amongst them. The first, advised to dispatch embassadors to Scipio to treat for peace: the second, to send for Anniball home to the defence of his owne countrey, against so dangerous and deadly a warre: the third gave counsell, by example of the Romanes constancie and resolution in their adversitie, to repaire the armie and gather new forces, and to request Syphax not to abandon and give over the quarrell. This opinion, because Asdruball was in place (and all those that sided with the Barchine house and faction, evermore enclined to warre) prevailed and tooke effect. Heereupon, they began to take musters in towne and countrey: Oratours were addressed to Syphax, who of himselfe with all his might and maine, was busie in levying fresh forces, and preparing for new warre. For his wife now, not as aforetime, by inticing words, flattering speeches, and pleasant allurements, that might serve the turne to winne and moove the heart of an amorous lover, E but by way of prayer and pitifull compassion had prevailed so much with him already: yea, and with plenteous teares besought him, not to betray her naturall father and native countrey, nor suffer Carthage to be burnt with flaming fire, like as the campos were consumed already. The Embassadors also brought with them new hopes besides, which were presented unto them in as happie a time as might be; who reported, that they fortun'd to meet with 4000 Celtiberians, brave and lustie young men, about the citie named Olba, which had bene beene levyed and hyred in Spaine by their Commissioners, of purpose sent to take up new souldiers: and that Asdruball himselfe in person would be present with a power of no small importance. Syphax not onely entertained these Oratours with gracious speeches and courteous answeres, but also shewed them a great number of Numidians, gathered out of the country townes, which some few dayes before he had furnished with armour and horses; promising besides, that he would assemble all the young & able men for service throughout his whole realme. For well he wist, that the late losse and deffecture happened by occasion of fire, & not by fight; and never in warre is a man to be reputed inferiour, before he be vanquished by fine force in ranged battaile. In this wise answered he the Embassadors. And after some few daies, Asdruball and Syphax once againe joyned their forces together: so as in all, their host amounted to the number well neare of 30000 armed men.

Now when Scipio was wholly set upon the assault of Vtica, and at the point to bend his ordnance and artillerie against the walles, as thinking verily that the warre was alreadie done with Syphax and the Carthaginians; the fame of the warre renewed by them afresh, averted him from his purpose, and caused him to give over that enterprise for a time. So leaving behind him certaine small guards, as well by water as land, onely for a signe and shew of sieges; himselfe with all the strength of his armie, set forward to meet the enemy. At the first he fate him downe and encamped upon an hill, foure miles (or verie neere) distant from the kings campe. The next day after, he descended with his Cavallerie, downe into the Great plaines or downes (for so they call them) lying neere the same hill; and spent that whole day in braving the standing corps de guard of the enemies before their campe, and playing upon them with light skirmishes. And so for two daies together next ensuing, they passed the time in divers tumultuous excursions betwene the one part and the other, without doing any great exploit worth the remembrance. On the fourth day, they entred on both sides into the field, and embattailed themselves. Scipio marshalled his men in this wise: Behind the Principes in the vaward, he placed the foremost ensignes of his Hastati, or Speares; & the Triarii he bestowed in the rereward, for to second them. The Italian horsemen he set in the right point: the Numidian horse and Masaniissa he ranged in the left. Syphax and Asdruball put their Numidian horse opposite to the Italians, and the Carthaginians to affront Masaniissa. In their maine battaile were planted the Celtiberians, to make head against the ensignes of the Romane Legions. Thus ordered and arraunged, they encountered one another, and joyned battaile. At the first onser, both wings at once, as well the Numidians as the Carthaginians, were put backe and forced to give ground: for neither the Numidians (being for the most part country people and rusticall) were able to receive the Romane horsemen; nor the Carthaginians (raw and untrained souldiers) sufficient to hold out with Masaniissa; who (besides all other things) for his late and fresh victorie, was so terrible, as there was no dealing with him. So the battaile of the Celtiberians, (naked and disurnished of both her points) stood still: for neither saw they any likelihood to escape and save themselves by flight, considering they knew not the coast of the country; nor hope to obtaine pardon at Scipio his hand, against whome, (deserving so well of them and their nation) they were come into Affricke with a power of waged mercenarie souldiers. So being environed on every side with the enemies, they fell one upon another, and obstinately dyed to the last man. But whiles all the enemies were wholly employed about them, Syphax and Asdruball gained themselves some time to get away and escape. The victours (wearing rather with continuall killing than long fighting) were overtaken with the night. The morrow after, Scipio sent out Laelius and Masaniissa, with all the Romane and Numidian horse, and the nimblest and lightest appointed footmen, after Syphax and Asdruball for to follow the chase. Himselfe with the strength and bodie of the armie, subdued all the cities thereabout that were within the seignorie of the Carthaginians; whome he partly forced by assault, and partly tooke by surrender for feare. Great was the fright yee maybe sure at Carthage: & they thought no other but that Scipio being now in the traine of conquest, would make halt to overrunne the country; and when hee had once brought under his subjection (and that with speed) all the other States there bordering, then at once he would come to assault Carthage. Therefore they fell to repaire and make up the breaches of their walles, and to fortifie them with strong bulwarkes: and everie man did his best to bring out of the country all kind of provision, against the time they should abide a long and tedious siege. Few words or none at all of peace, but much talke of sending Embassadors to call home Anniball. The greatest

A greatest part were of mind and gave advise, to make out the Armada which stood readie rigged, for to intercept the Romanes victuall, and to surprise and assault the Romane fleet, riding before Vtica restlessly without feare, and distrusting nothing: for peradventure they might also force the navall campe, left with a small guard for the defence thereof. And to this counsell the most enclined: yet they thought it good to send Embassadors to Anniball. For suppose that their navie should speed full well, and haue the happiest successe that they could wish; this onely good would come thereof, that Vtica thereby might be in some sort eased of the straight siege wherewith it was invested: as for the defence of Carthage it selfe, they neither had any other Generall besides Anniball, nor armie left but onely his. Whereupon the next day after, the ships were shot into the water, and set a float: and withall, the Embassadors tooke their way toward Italie. All things were huddled up and done in hast; such was their fortune that pricked them forward, and gave them no further time. And looke if any one man slackted his businesse here, he was reputed to betray the whole state, and the safetie of all.

Scipio now marching with an armie, laden with the spoile and pillage of many cities; sent the prisoners away, and all the prizes besides, unto the old campe before Vtica. And wholly set upon the conquest of Carthage, he surpriseth Tunes (a citie abandoned of her guard left for defence) situate from Carthage almost twelve miles. The place, both by mans hand was strongly fenced, and by nature fully seated: and as it might be easily seene from Carthage, so it yeelded a goodly prospect to Carthage, and also to the sea all about Carthage. From thence the Romanes (as they were hard at worke in fortifying themselves with a trench and rampier) discouraged the enemies fleet, sayling from Carthage toward Vtica. Laying therefore their worke aside, they founded the remoove, and presently in all hast advanced their ensignes, to prevent that their owne shippes which stood close to the shore, bent wholly to the siege, and nothing fitted and furnished for a sea fight, might not be surpriséd and boarded. For how possibly could ships heavily charged, carrying artillerie, ordnance, and engines of batterie, be ever able to withstand an Armada nimblely appointed, rigged and trimmed for the purpose with all shippe furniture meete for battaile, and manned besides with armed souldiers? How might our ships (I say) withstand the enemy, which either are converted to the use of merchant-shippes of burden; or else too nere set to the walles, that they serve in stead of a platforme and banke, or else of bridges to enter upon the citie? Scipio therefore, after he was thither come, and had bestowed his warre shippes with brasse beakes behind in the rereward neare to land, which (as the manner is in sight at sea) might guard and defend the rest: opposed the Hulkes and Carricks in a fourfold ranke and course, in stead of a wall afront the enemy. And because that in the tumult of the fight, those raunges might not be broken and disordered, hee laid the masts and saile-yards over-crosse, reaching from ship to ship; and with strong cables he linked and fastened them all in one together, and laid boards and planks over them, that men might passe euerie way from one ship to another. But under those verie bridges, he left certaine spaces betwene, from whence the light pinnaces and frigats might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and retire themselves thither againe in safetie. Having thus in hast (according as the time would give him leave) set these matters in order; there were to the number almost of a thousand elect and choise souldiers put a board into those ships of burden, to make head in the forefront, and withstand the violence of the enemies: and furnished they were with offensive weapons, but missive especially, to shoot and sling from them: and such store thereof they had together, as might serve for the assault, were it never so long. Thus appointed and prepared, they waited the coming of the enemies. The Carthaginians, (who if they had made good speed, might have surpriséd them unawares, & found all pell mell and out of order whiles they were troubled, frightened, and to seeke what to do upon that sodaine occurrence) fearing still, as men out of heart and dismayed with so many foiles by land, and thereupon distrusting themselves even at the sea also; where (no doubt) they were the better and more puissant: and having trifled out all the live-long day, and sailed but slowly; about the sun-set arrived in the haven, which the Affricans call Rufcinon. And the next morning by sun-rising, they put forth into the open sea, and ranged their ships in order, as against a set navall battaile; supposing that the Romanes would make out and receive them. When they had stood thus a long time, and perceived the enemies not to stir or once to set forward, then at last they charged upon the foresaid hulkes and ships of burden. The service was nothing like a sea-fight, but resembling for all the world the ships that are to as-

side the walls of the towne. For the hulks were a good deale taller, and stood aloft over the enemies. And the Carthaginians from out of their war-ships armed & breasted with brazen beakes, let fire many a shot in vaine, as launcing them from beneath faintly against the higher place; whereas the shot from above out of the Caricks, was levelled with more strength, and by reason of their owne poise light also with greater force. The light pinnasles for spiall, and the other small barks, which made sallies from under the bridges aforesaid, framed of planks upon masts and saile yards, at the first were encountered, overcharged and hidden onely with the violence and greatnesse of those warre-ships: but afterwards they were some trouble to the defendants of their owne side; for that being intermingled amongst the enemies ships, their owne fellows were forced oftentimes to stay their hands, and neither shooe arrow, nor launce dart, for feare of missing their enemies, and lighting among their owne part. At the last the enemies from out of the Carthaginian ships, began to cast out certaine loggets, with yron hookes at the end (which the souldiors use to call Harpagones) [Grapples] for to take hold upon the Roman ships. Which when the Romanes were not able to cut in sunder, no more than the very chaines whereto they hung, and whereby they were slung, then yee might have seene (as any one of the enemies warre-ships and gallies rowed backe, and towed after it a Romane Caricke hanging by the grapple end) the bords and ropes cut asunder, by which it was tied & fastened unto others, or else another raunge and course of more ships together, to follow after the taile of the other. By this devise especially were all the bridges torne and rent in peeces, and scarcely had the defendants any time and space to retire and passe into the second ranke of ships behind. Thus there were upon a fixe Carickes of the Romanes drawne away to Carthage, hanging at the poores of their gallies. Their gladnesse and rejoicing hereat was much greater than the thing it selfe came to, and the more acceptable, in that amid so many continuall losses and plenteous teares of theirs, one onely joy as small as it was, shining upon them beyond their expectation, eased and lightened their hearts: considering withall how neere by all likelihood and apparence the Roman armada was to a mischeefe and finally destruction, had not the captaines of their owne gallies forefollowed so much, and Scipio come in time to helpe.

It fortuned about the same time, that Lalius and Masanissa were come within 15 daies into Numidia; the Masafylians rendered Masanissa the auncient realme belonging to him by inheritance from his father, and received him with joy, as their king whom they had long time desired. Syphax seeing his captaines and garrisons disseized and displaced, kept himselfe within the auncient limits of his owne kingdome, but was not like to be long at rest and quiet. For his wives father on the one side, and his wife againe on the other, set him on, and pricked him forward continually to take armes against the Romanes: and so dored he upon her in excessive love, that needs he must yeeld to her, there was no remedie. Besides, so mightie hee was in numbers of men and horse, that the puissance of a kingdome flourishing so many yeares together, offering and presenting it selfe daily to the eye, had ben yough to have made a prince proud, that was not so barbarous and uncivile as he, and had some better rule and maistrise of his affections than himselfe had. When he had assembled together as many as were able for service, hee furnished them with horses, and with armour, as well offensive as defensive. The Cavallerie hee sorted and divided into small troupes and cornets, the infanterie into cohorts and squadrons, according as hee had learned long since of the Roman centurions. And thus having raised an armie, equall for number to the former, but standing all together in manner, of new and untrained souldiours, hee put himselfe on his journey against the enemies. And after hee had encamped neere unto them, at the beginning some few light horsemen advanced forward from before the corps de guard, in espiall, so neere as they might with safetie, but being set backe from thence with arrowes and javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began of both sides to make out one against another, and to maintaine light skirmishes; and when of any part they had taken the foile, they would for anger returne againe in greater number, which is the wonted manner to kindle a battell betweene horsemen: for whiles the winners hope still of better, & the loosers chafe for having the worse, the companie ever encreaseth on both sides. And thus now, after some few had scuffed and blowed the coales, at length the whole armie of either part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to strike a set battell. So long as the horse-service lasted, the Masafylians were so many, as there was hardly any dealing with them, Syphax sent them out in such great troupes: but after that the Romane footmen once had suddainly entred betweene the cornets of their

A their horsemen, which gave way as they came, and had gotten sure footing and made head, and so frightened the enemy charging so freely upon the spurre as hee did: then the Barbarians began to ride their horses more easily, and within a while gently to stand still, and seeme as it were amazed at this strange and new kind of fight; and in the end, not onely to give ground unto the footmen, but also to recule from the horsemen, who now were the more bold and hardie, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the standers of the legions advanced forward, and approached neere hand. But then the Masafyli were so farre from receiving & enduring their first charge, that they might not abide the very sight so much, as of their ensignes and armour, so mightily wrought with them either the remembrance of former overthrowes already passed, or the present feare of imminent daunger. Where Syphax, while he rode bravely in the face of the enemies troupes and squadrons, if happily for very shame, or for the perill of his owne person, hee might stay his men from running away, had his horse under him fore wounded, and being cast off his backe to the earth, was overpressed with the number, taken prisoner, and brought alive unto Lalius, for to represent unto Masanissa above all others a goodly shew and joyfull sight to behold. Now was Cirtha, the head citie of all the kingdome of Syphax; and thither after the fight, betooke themselves a mightie multitude of people. The slaughter in this battaile was lesse in proportion, than the victorie, because the horsemen onely maintained the medley. Not above five thousand were slaine, and not halfe so many taken prisoners. And when they had made an assault upon the camp whither the frightened multitude, after the losse of their king, had retired, Masanissa came unto Lalius and said, That for the present there could bee nothing more pleasing and honourable unto him, than upon his victorie to visit and see his fathers kingdome, which he had recovered & woon againe after so long a time. But as in adversitie, so likewise in prosperitie (qd. he) tract of time & delais are never good. In case therefore Lalius would permit him and his horsemen, together with conquered Syphax to goe before unto the citie Cirtha, he would surprisethem on a suddain, finding all out of frame and to seeke, by reason of this so suddaine and unexpected feare: and Lalius with his footmen might travell faire and softly, & come after by easie journeys. Lalius grunted hereunto. Whereupon, being gone afore unto Cirtha, he commaunded the principall citizens of Cirtha to bee called forth unto a parle. But all the whiles that they were ignorant of the kings unhappie fall, and so long as Masanissa uttered nothing of that which was happened, hee might not prevaile either with threats or faire words and persuasions, until he presented the king D before them a bound prisoner. Then at so heave an object and miserable spectacle, they lift up a pittuill crie, and made great lamentation. And so partly for feare they abandoned the defence of the walls, and partly by a generall consent to court the conquerour, and to seeke for grace and favour at his hands, they set the gates open. Then Masanissa, after hee had bestowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the walls, certaine strong guards, to keep that no man should stirre and make an escape, hee rode a gallop to the roiall pallace, for to bee possessed of it. As hee entred within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisba the wife of Syphax, and daughter of Asdruball the Carthaginian, met him on the way: & espying in the midst of the armed traine Masanissa full gorgeously dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly array and ornaments, imagining him to be the king (as he was indeed) she fell downe prostrate at his feet, and spake in this wise: True it is (quoth she) O Masanissa, that the gods above, together with your owne vertue and felicitie have given you full power and puissance, to doe with us according to your pleasure: but if it be lawfull for me a poore prisoner and captive woman, to open my mouth, and make an humble speech unto my Lord, in whose onely hands lieth my life and death; if I may be so bold as to touch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours; I would beseech and pray you for the honour of the roiall majestie of a prince, wherein we also our selves erewhile were interested; in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is commune to you and Syphax, by the domesticall gods, protectours of this regall house and princely palace, who vouchsafe to receive you into it at this present with better prefaces and more fortunate tokens, than lately they sent Syphax out of it: to deigne me a lowly suppliant this favour, and graunt me this petition, as to determine your selfe of me your captive whatsoever pleaseth you, & not to suffer me to fall into the proud hands and inhumane disposition of any Romane. If there were nothing els but this, that I was sometime wife and queene to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the courtelie and humanitie of a Numidian, and one borne in Affrick as well as my selfe, than of a stranger stranger and alien. But what hard measure a Carthaginian lady, and the daughter of Asdruball, may feare at a Romans hand, you see and know full well. Wherefore once againe I request and intreate your highnesse upon my knees, to regard my suite; and if there be no way els to save and keepe me from the will and appetite of the Romanes, to do me to death out of hand. For beautie she surpased and was incomparable: for yeeeres lustie, & in the very best of her age. And therefore when as now she held him fast by the hand, and requested his protection and honorable word, only for this, That she might not be delivered and betrayed to a Romane; placing and setting her words so well, and couching them so cunningly, that they sounded neerer to speeches for to win love, than prayers to crave pitee: see the fanisie and affection of this victorious prince! he enclined presently not only to mercy and compassion, but also (as all the kind of these Numidians are full of love, & have no stay of their wanton lust) a conquerour otherwise though he were, yeelded himselfe prisoner to the love of his captive: and so after he had given her his right hand for assurance to performe her request, he went into the palace. This done, he began to cast about with himselfe how he might make good his promise unto Sophonisba: but finding no meanes els to compasse and bring it about, he borrowed foolish, rash, and shamelesse counsell of blind love. He made no more ado, but commaunded in all hast to prepare that very day for the solemnization of a marriage with Sophonisba, because he would give neither Laelius, nor Scipio himselfe, any libertie at all to proceed against her as a prisoner, after she were once the wedded wife of Masanissa. The wedding was no sooner done, but behold Laelius came, a guest unsent for and nothing welcome: who so little dissimuled how much he misliked the thing, that he was once about to have plucked her forth of the bride-bed, and sent her away even with Syphax and other prisoners to Scipio. But overcome with the earnest prayers of Masanissa, who besought and importuned him to referre the matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrate and decide unto whether of the two kings Sophonisba should be awarded, for to mend their state, and better their fortune; he sent away Syphax alone with the rest of the prisoners, and by the help of Masanissa, wan and recovered the other cities in Numidia, which were held by the garisons of the king. When news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth as it were to behold a triumph. Himselfe went bound before all the rest, and a number of Numidian noblemen and gentlemen followed after. Then every man, to set forth and amplifie this victorie, magnified what he could the greatnesse of king Syphax, and the glorious renoume of the nation, in these termes: That he was the king, unto whose majestie the two most mightie and puissant states of the world, to wit, the Romanes and the Carthaginians attributed so much, that Scipio the Generall of the one, for to seeke his amitie, left the province of Spaine and the armie there, and with two Caravels or Gallies ruled with five banks of oares, sailed over into Affrick: and Asdruball the great commaunder of the Carthaginians, not only repaired himselfe in person unto him into his kingdome, but also gave him his daughter in marriage: so as at one time he had in his power the two grand-captaines, of Carthaginians and Romanes both. And like as both these nations killed sacrifices unto the immortall gods, and craved thereby their grace and favour, so of both parties at one time was his friendship sought for and desired. And as for his power and puissance, it was so great, that he expelled Masanissa out of his owne realme, and drave him to this narrow point, that the best meanes he had to preserve his life, was either the running rumor of his death, or the lurking holes in the wild woods, wherein he was glad to live by rapine and stealth, after the guise of savage beasts. The king thus talked of in every mans mouth that stood about him, was brought at length into the Prætorium or Generals pavilion, and there presented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to consider the former state and fortune of the man, compared now with this present condition: and to remember withall and call to mind the hospitall intertainment, the geving interchangeably of the right hand, and the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In these regards likewise Syphax tooke hart, and spake more frankly unto the conquerour. For when Scipio demanded of him, What he meant, and for what intent he not only renounced alliance with the Romanes, but also began himselfe first to make warre upon them: he made answer againe and confessed, That he had in dedde done amisse, and plaid the foole. As for his taking armes against the people of Rome, that was not the beginning of his follie, but rather the very end of his frantick foolishnes. Then it was, and never els but then, that he went besides himselfe and was bereft of his wits; then he abandoned out of his mind and cleane forgot, as well privar amitie by hospitall enterteinment, ment, as all publick alliance by solemne covenants; when as he received into his house a Carthaginian ladie for his wife: then his royall court and palace was set on fire and burned with those nuptiall torches. That furious fiend it was (quoth he) and pestilent dame, that by all kind of pleasant alluring baits, and flattering enticements possessed my mind, drew away and alienated my hart; and never rested she, untill with her owne hands she did upon my body impious and ungodly armour against mine owne guest and loving friend. And yet as desperate and as wofull as my case is, in all my miseries and calamities this one thing doth me good and joyeth my heart, that I see the same pestiferous furie, that fiend of hell, and limme of the devill, gotten into the house and familie of him, who is the most deadly and mortall enemy that I have in all the world. Neither surely will Masanissa demean himselfe more wisely, soberly and constantly than Syphax: nay, considering his youthfull yeeeres, he will be as apt to be misled by love, and more subject to the temptations of a woman. Certes in this action of espousing her, he hath shewed more folly a great deale and want of government. When he had uttered these words not only upon a spitefull hatred against an enemy, but also upon some new pricks of jealousy rising in his heart, seeing her whom he loved, in the possession of his concurrent: Scipio was driven into no small dumps, and wist not well what to make of it. And as he began to be suspicious of Masanissa for this marriage, so, to speake a truth, the circumstances thereof hammered in his head, and made him conceive hardly of him; for feare that another day by the suggestions of the same woman, he would play false, and trespass as well as Syphax. The marriage was so huddled up as it were in the mids of warre and hostilitie, without the advise, without the privie, and without the expectation of Laelius his companie. Such hast he made all on the head, and without advisement, that the very same day that he set eye first upon the queene his prisoner, he must needs espouse and marry her out of hand, and in the very house of his greatest enemy consummate and solemnise the complements of sacred wedlock. Moreover to aggravate these matters, and make them seeme more foule and shamefull, Scipio knew full well, that Masanissa during the time that he remained in Spaine a lustie yong gentleman, it was never knowne that he was enamoured upon the lovely beautie of any captive woman. As he tossed and revolved these things in his mind, Laelius and Masanissa chaunced to come in place. And after he had welcomed them both alike, and shewed them a loving and gracious countenance, yea and honoured them with singular praise and commendations openly in a frequent audience and court, he within his lodging tooke Masanissa into a secret place apart, & began to speake unto him in this manner. I suppose Masanissa, that you saw in me some good parts, for love wherof both at the first you were induced to come into Spaine and contract amitie with me, and afterwards also in Affrick, you reposed your selfe and all your hopes in my fidelitie and protection. But of all those vertues, for which I have seemed worthe of your affectionate love, there is not one wherein I may so much glory and take joy and comfort, as in temperance, continencie, and the bridling of carnall desires, and fleshly pleasures. This vertue Masanissa, I wish that you also would have joined unto the rest that are in you so rare and excellent. For our age (trust me truly) standeth not so much in danger of armed enemies, as of those earthly pleasures that compasse us on every side. And hee that by his sobrietie and governance hath been able to rule and tame the same, hath won himselfe more honour, and gotten a greater victorie, than wee have done by the conquest and subduing of Syphax. What valiant exploits & wortheie acts you have achieved in mine absence, I have willingly reported, and still remember. For the rest, I had rather you would consider of them by your selfe, than change colour & blush at my rehearfall of them. Syphax through the good fortune, and by the forces of the people of Rome, is vanquished and taken prisoner. And therefore, himselfe, his wife, his realme, his lands, his townes, the inhabitants thereof, and finally all things els whatsoever that belonged unto Syphax, are become a bootie to the people of Rome. The king himselfe, and the queene his wife, in case she had not been a cittizen borne of Carthage, in case wee had not seene her father to bee the grand captaine of our enemies, ought by right to have been sent to Rome; that the Senate and people of Rome might passe their censures, award, and judgement of her, who is reported to have alienated a confederate king from us, and to have caused him rashly and inconsiderately to take armes against us. Strive then to rule and maister your lusts and affections; take heed you staine not many good vertues with one bad vice. Marre not the grace, deface not I say, the thanke of many wortheie deserts, by one fault and trespass greater indeed, than the subject cause and occasion thereof. Masanissa, whilst he heard these words, not onely blushed as red as fire, but also began to water his plants. And when he had promised for his part to be overruled and set downe by the Generall, and requested him withal, to farre forth as possibly the case would permit, to tender and regard his promise, wherein rashly and inconsiderately he had entangled himselfe (for given his faithfull word he had, that he would not deliver and betray her into the hands and power of any other) he departed out of the Pretorium or Generall his court, all dismaied and exceedingly troubled in spirit, and betooke himselfe to his owne pavillion. Where all solitarie and alone by himselfe, after hee had passed over some time, with fetching many deepe sighes and sobs, so as he might easily be overheard by them that stood about his tent, at the last hee gave one greivous grone above the rest, and with that called for one of his trustie groomes, who had under his hand the keeping (as the manner was of kings and princes) of a speciall poyson, against all doubtfull chaunces that might happen. Which hee commaunded him to temper in a goblet of wine, and to carie it to Sophonisba, and withall to tell her thus much from him. That Masanisa would have been most willing to performe his plighted troth and first promise, which an husband ought unto his wedded wife. But since that the superior powers, and those that were mightier than himselfe, had bereft him of that puissance and libertie, he was readie and able yet to accomplish a second behest, namely, that shee should not come alive into the hands of the Romanes: and therefore hee advised her, that in remembrance of her father a noble warriour and Commaunder, of her native countrie, of two kings to whom she had been married, she would provide for her selfe, and save her owne honour. This credence and message, together with the poyson, the servant when he was come unto Sophonisba, delivered unto her. Whereat, I accept (quoth she) this marriage present, & welcome be it unto me, if this be the best token that an husband could find to send unto his wife. Yet thus much signifie unto him from me againe, that better content I would have beene to die, if my marriage bed had not stood so neere to my grave. Shee spake not the word so stoutly, but shee did the deed as resolutely: for shee tooke the cup in hand, and shewing no signe at all of feare, she roundly dranke it of. When tidings hereof came unto Scipio, for feare least the hote, humorous, and passionate young prince, might doe himselfe some mischeefe, he presently sent for him. One while hee gave him good and comfortable words; another while he gently rebuked him, in that he would seeme to make amends for one follie with another, and to play a more cruell & tragicall part than there was need. The next day after, to the end that he might withdraw his mind away from this present fit of trouble some fancies, hee mounted up into his Tribunall seat, and assembled an audience. There first, he openly styled Masanisa by the name of king, and honored him with singular praises and commendations: which done, he gave him a golden crowne, a faire cup likewise of gold, a chaire of estate and a scepter, both of yvorie, a rich long robe embroidered of divers colours, and a coat wrought with needle worke, representing the Date tree. These honourable presents wanted no words to set them out. For as (quoth hee) there is nothing among the Romanes more stately & magnifical than triumph, so they that ride in triumph, have no ornaments more rich & sumptuous than this, which the people of Rome esteeme Masanisa onely of all strangers and aliens to be worthie of. After this he gave Laelius also his due and deserved praises, and bestowed upon him a coronet of gold. Other martiall men likewise according to the service which they had done, were rewarded with sundrie gifts. The king having these honours done unto him, was well quieted and contented in mind, and conceived some assured hope, now that Syphax was displaced and rid out of the way, shortly to compasse and enjoy the whole kingdome of Numidia. Then Scipio having sent C. Laelius with Syphax and other captives unto Rome, accompanied also with the Embassadors of Masanisa, returned himselfe with his power againe to Tunes. And there, what fortifications and workes hee had begun afore, now hee finished perfittly and brought to an end.

The Carthaginians, who were filled with a kind of joy that was not onely short, but also in manner vaine and foolish, grounded upon their late assault of the Romane Armada, which (considering their present state) was fortunate enough; after they heard that Syphax was taken prisoner, in whome they had reposed more hope (well neare) than in Asdruball and their owne army, were mightily affrighted and daunted; and would give no more care to any that perswaded war, but sent as orators to sue for peace, thirtie of their principall auncients: and they amongst them were (as one would say) their privie counsell of state, and had the greatest power and authoritie to sway and overrule the whole bodie of the Senate. Who being entred into the Romane campe and the Generall his lodging and pavillion, fell downe prostrate (after the manner and guise as I take it, of the country * from whence they were first descended) like those that worship and adore the gods. And to this their humble and lowly reverence, their language was suitable and correspondent; not excusing themselves and their fault, but transferring the beginning and occasion thereof, upon Anniball and his favorites about him, that soothed him and bare him up in his willfull pride & insolent ambition: craving pardon for their citie of Carthage, which twife already had bene subverted and overthrowen by the inconsiderate follie of her owne citizens: and once againe yet would gladly be saved and stand upright by the meanes and goodnesse of their enemies: for as much as they knew full well, that the people of Rome sought not the utter extermination and destruction of those whome they had vanquished by force of armes, but onely the soveraigntie and rule over them: promising fealtie and homage unto them; readie to serve in all loyaltie, and to performe whatsoeuer it should please them to impose and lay upon them. Scipio made them this answer againe and said, That as he came into Affricke upon hope to returne home with conquest and not with peace; so that hope of his by the prosperous and happie successe of his warres hitherto, was much bettered and augmented. Howbeit, although hee assured himselfe of the absolute victorie, at if he had it fast enough in his hand, yet a good accord he would not refuse: that all nations of the world might know, that the people of Rome can both begin warres rightfully, and also end the same as justly. My will therefore (quoth he) and pleasure is, that the conditions of peace shall be these. In primis, That the Carthaginians shall restore and deliver backe all the prisoners that they have taken in the wars: with all the renegates & fugitives that have fled to their side from us. Item, that they remove their forces out of Italie and Fraunce. Item, that they forbear to meddle in Spaine. Item, that they abandon and quit all the Ilands betwene Italie and Affricke. Item, to yeeld up all their shippes of warre, saving onely twentie. Item, that they deliver unto the Romanes, of wheat 500000 Modij, and of barley 300000. [Now what was the summe of money that he required or demanded of them, it is not certainly agreed upon. In some writers I find 5000 talents: in others, five thousand pound weight only of silver: and there be that have set downe, that he laid upon them a double pay of all the souldiers.] Upon these conditions (saith he) whether ye will like of peace or no, ye shall have three daies respite & libertie to consult and consider. If you will accept thereof in these tearmes, make a truce with me for the present, and send your Embassadors unto Rome to the Senate there. Thus the Carthaginians, when they had agreed together, and concluded to refuse no articles and conditions of peace whatsoeuer, were dismissed. But in truth they sought for nothing else but delays and tract of time, untill Anniball were sailed over into Affricke. So they addressed certaine Embassadors unto Scipio to enter a truce: others they dispatched to Rome to treat for a peace; who brought with them for shew, some few captives, renegates, and fugitives, to the end they might obtaine their sute more easily. But Laelius with Syphax and other captives (the principall nobles and gentlemen of the Numidians) was many dayes before arrived at Rome, and had declared unto the LL. of the Senate all things in order astouching their good speed and successe in Affricke, to the great contentment and joy of all men for the present, and with exceeding hope for the time to come. Then the LL. after consultation had, gave order that the king should be sent to Alba, there to lye in ward and safe custodie; and that Laelius should be kept still at Rome, untill the Carthaginian Embassadors came. A solemn procession for foure daies was decreed. And P. Aelius the Pretour, after he had dismissed the Senate, called presently an assembly of the people, and together with C. Laelius went up into the Rostra [or pulpit for publicke orations.] Where, the people hearing that the Carthaginian armies were defeated, that a king of great name and renowne was overcome and taken prisoner; that all Numidia was overrunne from one end to the other with a noble and singular conquest; they could no longer containe their joy in silence, but with shouts and acclamations and other tokens (usual in the assembly of a multitude) expresse and signifie their exceeding gladnes and contentment of heart. Whereupon the Pretour immediately made proclamation, that the churchwardens and sextaines should set open all the holy temples and chappels throughout the citie, and give the people libertie and leave all the day long, devoutly to goe about the gods, reverently to salute them, and heartily to render thanksgiving for this achieved victory. The next day following, he admitted the Embassadors of Masanisa into the Senate house, and gave them audience, who first and foremost rejoyced in the behalfe of the Senate, for the profperous warres and happie successe of P. Scipio in Affricke: then they gave thanks, that hee not only had entituled Masanisa their lord & master by the bare name of king, but also invested him a king indeed, by restoring him into his fathers kingdom. Wherein, if it pleased the LL. of the Senate, he might reigne, now that Syphax was remooved and gone, without feare & trouble at all. Also, for that hee solemnly in the open assembly praised him in most honourable tearms, & adorned him richly with right stately and precious gifts. For to deserve which favors and honours done unto him, as he had endeavoured already, so would he henceforth not faile to doe his best. Then they made a petition, that the Senate would confirme and ratifie by their acte and decree, his royall style and title of a King, with other benefits and favours received of Scipio. And this moreover particularly Masanisa would request, (if hee might be so bold, and that it stood with the pleasure of the Senate) that they would enlarge and set at libertie all the Numidian captives that lay in prison at Rome: for this would be a thing whereby he should acquire much honour and reputation, and gaine great love and favour among his people and countreymen at home. To these points the Embassadors received this answer. Concerning the prosperous affaires of the warres in Affricke, they congratulated likewise, and rejoiced reciprocally with the king. As for Scipio, they liked well, and confirmed his act in giving Masanisa the name of king: and therein he had done well and justly and according to good reason. And whatsoever he had passed else to the honour of Masanisa, the LL. approved and commended the same. Then they decreed certaine presents, that the Embassadors should carry unto the king: to wit, two purple souldiers cassocks, each of them with a clasp of golde; and as many rich coates embroidered and betudded with purple. Also two courfers barbed and trapped, with their rich caparisons; two complete armours for horses, with their cuiraces: likewise pavillions, with all their militarie furniture, in as full and ample manner as a Consull is allowed. These presents (I say) had the Pretor direction to send unto the king. As for the Embassadors themselves, there was bestowed upon them no lesse than 5000 Asles a peece; and upon their followers in the traine, each of them 1000 Asles. Also a double sute of apparell for either of the Embassadors, and one single sute to everie one throughout their traine; as also to those Numidians, who being set at large out of prison, were to be delivered againe to the king. Over and besides, there was appointed for the Embassadors, lodging of free-cost; gardenage and walking places of pleasure; allowance for their table, and all provision else whatsoever, at the cities expences.

In that somner when these decrees passed at Rome, and those affaires were achieved in Affricke, P. Quintilius Varus Pretour, and M. Cornelius Viz. consull, fought a set battaile with Mago the Carthaginian, in the territorie of the Insubrians, within the province of Fraunce. In the vaward were placed the legions of the Pretour. Cornelius kept his legions in the rereward, and himselfe in person rode to the standards in the forefront. And before both wings, the Pretour and Viz. consull encouraged all that ever they could, the souldiers for to advance their ensignes, and give a charge upon the enemy. But seeing they could not prevaille nor doe any good, then quoth Quintilius to Cornelius: You see how the fight slaketh and waxeth cooler, and the enemies that were timorous, are hardened and heartened by this resistance beyond their hope and expectation, yea, and it is to be feared, that they will turne to bee hardie also, and make head against us. Wee must needs raise up a storme of Cavallerie, if wee would disorder them, and put them out of array. And therefore either doe you maintaine fight here in the front, whiles I bring the men of armes into the battaile, or else will I here fight in the vaward, whiles you send out the horsemen of foure legions upon the enemies. And when the vice-consull was willing to accept of whether service the Pretour would, then Quintilius the Pretour, with his sonne forenamed Marcus, a lustie young gallant, went to the horsemen, commaunded them to mount on horsebacke, and suddainely all at once sent them against the enemy. The tumult and noyse which the horsemen made, was answered and redoubled by a shout that the footmen set up. And verily the enemies battaile had not bene able to have kept their ground, but that Mago at the first stirring of the Cavallerie, made out the Elephants forthwith into the battaile, whom he had in readinesse for such a purpose. At the uncouth braying, the strong smell, and hideous sight of which beasts, the horses were affrighted: and so the aid of horse-fight proved vaine. And as the Romane Cavallerie interlaced among the Infanterie was more strong and forcible, where they had the use both of launce point aloofe, and of swords edge close at hand: so when they were transported and caried farre off with their panting and fearefull horses, the Numidians horsemen had the more rounge to shoot their darts against them with better advantage. Besides this disorder, the twelfth legion of footmen (whereof a great part was beaten downe and slaine, more for shame than upon any strength and valour, kept their place still; but never had bene able to have held out any longer, but that the thirteenth legion drawne forth of the rereward into the vanguard, reenforced the medley that was in hazard and lay a bleeding: and Mago withall for his part, came in with the Frenchmen out of the rereward, and opposed them against this fresh legion: but when they were once discomfited and put back (which required no great ado nor long fight) the Hastati or Laveliniers of the eleventh legion gathered round together; and charged upon the Elephants, which now also began to breake the ranks of the footmen. But when they had launced their javelins against them standing thicke together in plumps (and lightly there was not one of them hit amisse but did his errand) they forced them all to turne back upon their owne battaile: so, foure of them were fore wounded and fell downe dead. Then the vaward of the enemies began somewhat to geve ground; and withall, the whole strength of the Romane footmen, seeing the Elephants turne taile, came forward at once for to encrease the disordred tumult, and put them in greater feare. But so long as Mago stood stoutly to it, and kept his standing in the forefront of the ensignes, the ranks and files as they went back softly, and retired by little and little, still maintained fight as before in good order: but after that they saw him shot through the thigh and fallen, and therewith caried forth of the battel for dead, incontinently they were all defeated and put to flight. That day were slaine of enemies upon a five thousand, and of militarie ensignes eightene woon and carried away. The Romans likewise bought not this victorie without losse of blood. For of the Pretors armie were lost two thousand and three hundred, and the greater part of them by farre were of the twelfth legion. Whereof two Tribunes militarie or Colonels also lost their lives, M. Cosconius, and M. Menius. Likewise of the thirteenth legion, which came last to the conflict, Cn. Helvius a Colonell, in renuing the fight was slaine, and eighteen men of armes besides, most brave and excellent horsemen, with certain Centurions who were by the Elephants troden down, trampled underfoot, and so perished. And no doubt the medley had continued longer, but that by occasion of the Generall his hurt, the victorie was given away and yielded. Mago in the dead time of the next night dislodged and departed; and stretching out his journey so farre as possibly for his wound hee might, hee marched away untill he was come to the sea side, unto the Ingauni in Liguria: where the Embassadors sent from Carthage (who a few daies before were arived in the French gulf) repaired unto him: commaunding him with all speed possible to saile over into Affricke, for as much as his brother Annibal likewise (unto whom also there were Embassadors gone with the like message and commission) would doe the same. For the State of Carthage now was not in case, nor upon tearms, to defend and keepe in obedience by force of armes Fraunce and Italie, but to see to home. Mago not onely moved with the commaundement of the Senate, and the daunger of his countrie, but fearing also least the enemy following the traine of his victorie, would pursue and set upon him, if hee made long stay; and doubting least the Ligurians likewise, seeing Italie abandoned of the Carthaginians, would revolt and turne unto those, under whose obedience they were like shortly to bee reduced: albeit hee had no hope that his hurt should have lesse shaking at sea by sailing, than on land by travelling, or to find things there more handsome and readie for the cure, embarked his armie and departed. But before hee was well gotten beyond the point and lands end of Sardinia, he died of his wound aforesaid. Certaine ships also of the Carthaginians, being scattered asunder in the deepe sea, were by the Romane Armada that kept about the coasts of Sardinia surprised and boured. These were the Acts performed both by sea and land, on that side of Italie which lieth along the Alpes.

Cn. Servilius the Consull having performed no worthie and memorable exploit, either in his province Hetruria, or in Fraunce (for thither also he went in the end) but onely that he redeemed his father Cn. Servilius and his uncle C. Lucatius, from servitude and bondage, now sixteene yeares after they had bene taken prisoners by the Boij before the village Tanerum, returned to Rome, with his father going on the one side, and his uncle on the other: a man famous rather for his private deeds, than renowned for any publicke and honourable act & worthie of remembrance. And a bill was preferred unto the people, that it should not bee imputed for a trespassse unto Cn. Servilius, that whiles his own father (who had sitten upon the yvorie chaire of estate) was living (and that unknowne to him) hee had been both Tribune and Aedile also of the Commons against against the lawes in that behalfe provided. This Act being passed and graunted, he returned againe into his province. Vnto Cn. Servilius the Consull who was in the Brutians countrey, there revolted Contentia, Vifugum, Vergæ, Besidia, Hetriculum, Syphæum, Argentanum, Dampetia, & many other peeces of small account, upon occasion that they saw the Carthaginians were waxe cold and feeble. The same Consull fought a battaile with Anniball in the territorie of Croton: the manner of which fight is darkly and obscurely reported. For Valerius Antias saith there were slaine five thousand of the enemies: a thing of such consequence, that either it was meere impudencie to forge it, or great negligence to overslip it. But the truth is, from that time forward nothing was done by Anniball in Italie: for to him also there came from Carthage embassadors to cal him home into Affrick, even about the same time that the others did unto Mago. And as it is reported of him, all the whiles that he gave audience to the embassadors, he gnashed and grinded his teeth, he kept a sighing and groning, yea and hardly could forbear to shed teares. After they had delivered their message according to their commission, Yea mary, qd he, now they go no more about the bush with me, by covert meanes and under hand to send for me home, but openly are seene in the action: who all this while in suffering no supplies either of men or money to be transported over unto me, sought to draw and hale me from hence. Well then, it is not the people of Rome so often by me defeated and put to flight, that hath by armes overcome Anniball, but it is the Senate of Carthage, with their backbiting and malicious envy. Neither will P. Scipio rejoyce so much, and beare himselfe proud upon this disgrace of myreturne, as Hanno will; who with the ruine and subversion of Carthage, hath overthrowne our house and familie, when by no other meanes he could effect it. Now Anniball, whose mind foregave him that such a thing would fall out, had prepared shipping afore-hand. And therefore after he had sent away the multitude of souldiours that were of small or no service, into the townes of the Brutians countrey, under a colour & shew of garisons for defence, which townes were but few, and the same rather held in by awe and feare, than abiding in obedience for love and loyalty, he tooke with him the whole strength & floure of his armie, and crossed over into Affrick. But before he went to sea, many of the Italian nation, who refusing to follow him into Affrick, had taken for sanctuarie the chappell of Iuno Lacinia, which never to that day had bene violated and broken; notwithstanding the libertie of the place, he cruelly massacred in the very temple. Seldome by report had ever any man bene knowne to leave his native soile and countrey, and depart into exile with more heave heart, than Anniball did when he went out of his enemies land. Oftentimes he looked back to the coasts of Italie, blaming both God and man, yea cursing himselfe and his owne life, for that he led not straightwaies upon his fresh victorie at Cannæ, his souldiours embrued as they were with blood directly even to Rome. Scipio (quoth he) had the hart to go to Carthage, who when he was Consull, had never seene in Italie the Carthaginian enemy: and myselfe, having slaine at Thrasymenus and Cannæ 100000 armed men, have sitten still about Casilinum, Cumes, and Nola, wearing and decaying in strength every day more than other. In this manner he blamed himselfe, and complained of his hard hap and cursed fortune: and so he was pulled out of the possession of Italie that he held so long.

Newes came to Rome about one and the same time, that both Mago and Anniball were departed and onward on their journey: The joy of which twofold gratulation was the lesse in two regards, both for that their owne captaines seemed to have either little courage or small force to stay them behind, and impeach them for going, considering they had expresse order from the Senate so to do: as also because they at Rome were pensive and doubtfull, what would be the issue and end of all, seeing the whole weight of the warre to beare and rest upon the shoulders of one onely Capitaine and armie.

And much about this time came the Saguntine Embassadors, bringing with them certaine Carthaginian prisoners, who were taken with summes of money upon them, and had sayled into Spaine for to levie and wage men for aid. The monie they laid downe in the very port-hall or entrie of the Senate house, amounting to 250 pound weight of gold, and 800 pound weight of silver. The men they received and clapt them up fast in prison: the silver and gold both, they delivered againe to the Embassadors, with many thanks: over and besides they gave them rewards and ships to returne againe into Spaine. Then the grave and auncient Senators began to reason and discourse in this wise, That men naturally have lesse sense of good things than of bad; and feel not so soone their owne weale as their woe. We remember, say they, what feare,

A what fright and terrour we were put in, when Anniball passed over into Italie. Lord, what losses, what lamentable misfortunes hapned thereupon! The enemies camp was discovered and seene from the walls of the citie; what vowing, what praying was there then, both of all and some! How often in assemblies and counsels were men seene to stretch out their hands to heaven, and to utter these words and cry aloud; VVhen will that day come? and will it never be, that we shall see Italie againe cleere of enemies, obtaine repose, and flourish once more, injoying happie peace? Now at length, even at 16 yeeres end and not before, the gods have vouchsafed us this blessing; and no man saith a word, nor maketh a motion of thanksgiving to their divine majestie therefore. And surely, if men know not how to accept with joy and thankfulness a benefite when it first commeth, they will be farre short, and faile much more to remember the same when once it is past. Hereupon they cryed out and called aloud with one voyce from all parts of the Senate-house to P. Aelius the Pretor, for to propose the matter to the court there assembled: and a decree was graunted, that for five dayes there should be solemn processions and supplications in every church and chappell before the shrines of all the gods and goddeses: and greater beasts killed for sacrifice to the number of 120.

Now when Laelius and the embassadors of Masaniissa had their dispatch and were dismissed, tidings were brought that the Carthaginian embassadors comming to the Senate to sue for peace, were seene at Puteoli, and that from thence they would travaile by land unto Rome. Whereupon it was thought good unto the Senat, that Laelius should be sent for againe and called back, that he might be present, and at the hearing of the treatie of peace. Qu. Fulvius Gilla a Lieutenant of Scipio had the conducting of the Carthaginian embassadors to Rome: who being forbidden to set foot within the citie, were lodged without in the great hall named Villa Publica, and had audience given them of the Senate, assembled in the temple of Bellona. VVho made in manner the very same speech that they had before unto Scipio, clearing the whole State and their publick counsell, and laying all the fault and blame upon Anniball for making warre: saying that he had no warrant, commission, and commaundement from the Senat to passe over the Alpes, nor so much as over Iberus: and that of his owne head he tooke armes, and warred not upon the Romanes only, but also upon the Saguntines. In consideration whereof, he that would esteeme all things aright, and weigh the truth indeed, must needs judge, that for any thing done by the Senat and people of Carthage, the auncient league made with the people of Rome, hath continued to that day sound and entier. And therefore nothing els had they in commission to sue for and request, but that they might mainteine and remaine still in that accord and league which was last concluded and contracted with Lutatus the Consull. Now when the Pretor according to an auncient custome of their forefathers, had given libertie to whomsoever that would, for to put Interrogatories unto the Embassadors; and the elder sort, such as had ben present at the making of the capitulations and covenants concerning the said peace, had demanded of them, some one thing, and some another; and the Embassadors answered againe, that by occasion of their young age (for they were all in manner but young men) they remembred no such thing: the whole court from all parts thereof cryed out and said, that this was but a fraudulent and fainerous Carthaginian trick, to chuse and send such for to sue for the old peace, which they themselves could not remember. And when the Embassadors were voided out of the Senate-house, and the opinions of the LL. demanded, M. Livius was of this mind, that Cn. Servilius the Consull, who was the neerer of the twaine, should be sent for, that the treatie of peace might in his presence be consulted upon. For since that there could not lightlie a weightier matter than it was, come afore them to be determined of, he thought it stood not with the honor and reputation of the people of Rome, that such a matter should be debated of, without the personall presence of both, or at the leastwise of one of the Consuls. Qu. Metellus, (who three yeares before had bene Consull and Dictatour) spake to the cause in this manner. For as much as P. Scipio by defeating and putting to the sword whole armies, by wasting and spoiling the territories of the enemies, had driven them to this exigent, that in humble sort they came to crave peace: and considering that no man living was better able to judge with what mind and intent they sued for this peace, than himselfe, who warred even before the gates of Carthage; therefore no mans advise was to be heard, but onely his, either to accept of the said peace in question, or to reject it. M. Valerius Levinus, who had bene twice Consull argued, That they were spies and not embassadours, who now were come; and that it were a good deed to command them to avaunt and be packing out of the confines of Italie; and to send with them certaine men of purpose to guard them to their ships; yea, and to write unto Scipio to go forward with his warres, and not to flake one jote. Lelius and Fulvius added more over and said, That Scipio laid this especially for his ground, to hope there might be peace, in case Anniball and Mago were not called out of Italie: As for the Carthaginians, they would make semblant of any thing whatsoever, so long as they expected those leaders and those armies: but afterwards without remembrance of covenants, were they never so fresh and new, yea and without respect of all the gods, they would (no doubt) maintaine and continue the warres. In these regards, they inclined the rather to Lavinus, and approved his opinion. So the embassadours were sent away without any peace obtained, or certaine answer returned unto them.

Much about that time, Cn. Servilius the Consull, who made full reckoning that he should have the honour of bringing Italie into quietnes, made pursute after Anniball, as if he had bene coured and driven out by him; and first sailed over into Sicilie, and then into Affricke. Which beeing commonly noised and bruted abroad at Rome, at the first the LL. of the Senat thought good, that the Pretour should write to the Consull to this effect, That the Senate judged it meet and reason for him to returne into Italie. But afterwards upon the Pretour his words, saying that the Consull would set nought by his letters, P. Sulpitius was created of purpose Dictatour, who by vertue of that more soveraigne rule and authoritie, called the Consull peremptorily home into Italie. And the rest of that yeare, he together with M. Servilius the Generall of the horse, spent in progresse and visiting all the cities of Italie which in time of warre had shaken off their allegiance, and in taking due knowledge of all their causes and reasons severally.

During the time of the truce, there set forth also out of Sardinia from Lentulus the Pretour, an hundred hulkes laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twentie gallies of warre, and passed over into Affricke safe, both from the daunger of the enemy, and also from the perill of tempests by sea. But Cn. Octavius as he was in his voyage from Sicilie, with a fleet of two hundred hulkes and thirtie strong gallies, had not the like good speed. For as hee sailed (well neare) within the kenning of Affricke, first hee was calmed: then the wind turning South, troubled and disordered his ships, yea and scattered them over the sea one from another. Himselfe with his gallies of war wrought against the wind and the current, and with exceeding toile and labour of the oar-men, doubled the point of the cape of Apollo, and there in the bay rode at anchor: but the hulks for the most part fell with the lland Ægimurus (which shutteth up the foreland, and lyeth in the very mouth of that creeke from the sea wherein Carthage standeth) almost ten leagues from the citie: and some were driven by wind to a place called the Hote waters, over against the citie. All this happened within the sight of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the citie, was great running to the market place. The magistrates assembled the Senate; the people at the entrie and porch of the councill house, called upon the Senatours and cryed out, That they should not let slippe so greata bootie out of their eyes and hands. Some alledged against them, the fidelitie of treating for peace: others also objected the faithfull promise of truce (the tearme wherof was not yet expired.) But at last, when both Senate and people were enterningled all in manner together, agreed it was by a generall consent, that Asdruball with a fleet of fiftie saile, should cut over to Ægimurus; and so from thence rallie and gather together the Romane ships disperfed along the coasts and the havens. And the hulkes (abandoned of their mariners that were fled, fust from the lland Ægimurus, and afterwards from the Hote waters aforesaid) were drawn and towed as it were at the railes of their owne ships to Carthage. As yet the embassadours were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the resolution of the Romane Senat was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined. Scipio taking the wrong and indignitie to be more hainous, in that the hope of peace and the assurance of truce should be violat by them first, who sought both for the one and the other; presently dispatched in embassage to Carthage M. Bebivus, L. Servilius, and L. Fabius; who being by the concourse and running together of the people, neare to a shrewd turne and mischief; and foreseeing their returne like to be as dangerous, craved of the magistrates (who saved them from violence) to send certaine ships to waite them. So they were allowed two gallies called Tritemes, which having conducted them untill they were arrived at the river Bagrada, where they were within sight of the Romane campe, returned backe againe to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armada lay in the rode before Vuca. From thence there made out three gal-lies of foure rankes of oares; whether it were upon some secret direction from Carthage so to doe, or that Asdruball the Admirall of the fleet, upon his owne head adventured so foule an action (the state having no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and espying the Romani galley of five bankes of oares past the point of the cape, sodainly assailed her from the maine sea. But neither could they invest and strike her with their beake heads, making so good way, and shifting so well by reason of her swiftnes; neither could the armed souldiers from out of their lower vessels boord her, being so tall a ship over them. And right valiantly shee defended her selfe so long as her shot lasted; which when it once failed, and that shee had no other means to helpe her selfe, but onely the nearenes of the land and a number of souldiers who from the camp were run to the shore, with the losse only of the ship all the passengers escaped safe to land.

Thus the truce being doubtlesse broken with one wickednes comming in the necke of another, Lelius and Fulvius came in the verie nicke from Rome, together with the Carthaginian embassadours; unto whome Scipio having given his word, that although the Carthaginians had not onely broken the faith and assurance given of the truce, but also the law of armes, in abusing and evil intreating the persons of his embassadors, yet himselfe would do nothing to them unworthie either the order of the people of Rome, or unfitting his owne manner and custome, dismissed the Embassadours, and made preparation for warre.

When Anniball now approached the land of Affricke, one of the mariners was commanded to climbe up to the top of the mast to discover the coast, and to see what part they were directed to: and when he made answer and said, That the prou made head upon a place called, the Ruinat sepulchre; he misliked the osse and presage of that place, and commaunded the pilot to passe by, and leave it: and so he put his fleet within the bay of Leptis, and there he set his armie ashore. And these were the affaires of Affricke for that yeare. The actes ensuing, reach to that yeare, wherein M. Servilius Geminus, who then was Generall of the horse, and T. Claudius Nero were made Consuls. But in the end of the former yeare, when the embassadours of the confederate cities of Greece made complaints, that their territories were wasted by the kings garri- sons: and when they sent their embassadors into Macedonia, for demand satisfaction and restitution, they could not be admitted unto the king, nor have audience: and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were foure thousand armed souldiers transported over into Spaine, under the conduct of Sopater, to aid the Carthaginians; and certaine summes of money likewise sent with them: the Senate gave order that embassadours should be addressed unto the king, to give him to understand, that the LL. of the Senate tooke all this to be done against the tenure and forme of the league. So there were sent C. Terentius Varro, Cn. Manlius, and M. Aurelius. And three gallies of five course of oares they were allowed.

This was a yeare of speciall note, for a great skare-fire, whereby the publick cliffe was burnt to ashes down to the ground: also for much abundance of rain & many floods, & exceeding cheapnesse of victuall. For besides that all Italie was open by reason of a generall peace throughout, M. Valerius Falto, and M. Fabius Buteo, Ædiles of the chaire, devided the great store of corne that was sent out of Spain, among the people, street by street, and set the price at four* Asses the Modius. The same yeare Q. Fabius Maximus departed this life, a man of great yeeres and exceeding old, if that be true which some writers report, that hee was Augur 42 yeeres. But certaine it is that he was a man worthie of so great and honourable a surname, yea, and if it had begun first in himselfe. He surpassed the dignities of his father, hee was equall in honor to his grandfather: Rullus his grandfather, I must needs say, had more titles of victories, and of greater battailes; but one enemy of his, Anniball, may countervaille them all, as many as they were. Howbeit, this man was counted more warie and advised, than hardie and forward: and as a man may wel doubt whether by natural disposition he loved to take leisure in all his actions, or that it was a policie of his agreeable to the warres properly then in hand; so verily nothing is more certaine than this, that as the Poet Ennius saith,

This onely man by wise delay, Restor'd our state fall'n to decay.

His sonne Q. Fabius Maximus was invested or installed Augur in his place, and for bishop in his room (for two sacerdotal dignities he had) Ser. Sulpitius Galba was chosen. The Roman plaies were exhibited one day, and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly renued by the Ædiles M. Sextius Sabinus, and Cn. Tremellius Flaccus. They both, were made Pretours; and with them C. Livius Salinator, a peece, not only the greatest and bravest captaines of their time, but also equall to the mightiest Kings or Emperours of realme or nation that ever had bene afore them in any age and remembrance of man. For awhile they stood one beholding the other, and said never a word, ravished and astonied with a mutuall admiration: and at last Anniball began and spake in this wise. If the gods by destinies have so appointed, that I who first levied warre against the Romanes, and who so often have had the victorie as it were in mine owne hands, must needs of my selfe and mine owne motion, come now first likewise to sue for peace: glad I am and well pleased, that it is my good hap to meete with you above all other men, at whose hands I should seeke the same. And certes you also for your part among many your singular and excellent praises, may skore up this for none of the least, namely, That Anniball (unto whom the gods have vouchsafed the upper hand over so many noble captaines of the Romanes) hath yielded the bucklers, and given place unto your selfe; now that you have had the honor to end this warre, more notable and renowned at the first for your losses and overthrowes than ours: and that fortune (as it is fallen out) hath made this pretie sport with me, who at the beginning tooke armes when your father was Consull, gave him battaile first of all other Romanes Generals, and am now come unarmed unto his sonne to crave peace. Verily much better it had bene, and simply the very best, that the gods had inspired into our forefathers this mind, That both you might have contented your selves with the dominion of Italie, and we likewise of Affricke. For surely, Sicilie and Sardinia both, are nothing sufficient to make amends and satisfaction, and it were but only of your part, in recompense of so many brave fleets, so many puissant armies, and so many noble captaines that yee have lost. But faults done and past may well be blamed and reproved, when they can not be corrected and reformed. So greedie were we on both sides to conquer the lands of others, that in the meane time we have hazarded our owne. Neither had ye warre in Italie only, or we againe in Affricke alone: but both ye have seene the ensignes and armies of enemies hard at your gates, and in manner under your owne walls: and we likewise from Carthage have heard the noyse and bruit of the Roman camp. Now then, that which we have cause most to detest and abhorre, and you to wish above all other things in the world, the treatie of peace is fallen out in time of your better prosperitie, and more favourable aspect of fortune unto you. We againe are the agents therein, whom it most standeth upon and importeth that there should be peace; and who are assured, whatsoever we conclude, that the States and cities from whence we come, will approve and ratifie the same. There needs no more but a willing mind, well affected and enclined to those courses which tend to repose and quietnes. For mine owne part, one while age hath taught me, who am returned an old man into my countrey, from whence I came a child: another while prosperitie and adversitie both, hath so schooled me, that I would now rather be ruled by reason, than swayed by fortune. But I feare me greatly that you as well in regard of youth, as also of your continuall felicitie and fortunate traine of successe, are over-hautive and stout, for to yeeld unto any peaceable wayes. For commonly he fore-casteth no variable chaunces, who never tasted of adverse fortune. And the same are you at this day, that sometimes I was at Thrasymentus and at Cannæ. You being hardly come to that age which is meete for war-service, had the charge and command of an armie: and looke what enterprises you tooke in hand most venterously, the same you ever exploited as happily. You pursued the vengeance of fathers and uncles death, and wan by the calamitie of your house and familie a notable name and reputation of singular vertue and pietie. Spaine full and wholly you have recovered and conquered againe: foure armies of Carthaginians you have chased from thence: no sooner were you created Consull, but when all other mens hearts failed them to defend and keepe Italie, you failed neverthelesse hither over into Affricke: and after you had defeated heere two armies, forced and burnt in one houre two camps of your enemies, taken Syphax prisoner, a most mightie and puissant prince; wan so many cities both of his kingdom and of our dominion; you pulled me maugre my head out of Italie, whereof I had bene now sixteene yeeres possessed. Well may your hautive mind affect victorie rather than incline to peace. Full well I know of what spirit and stomack you are, more respective to grandeur and honor, than to your good and profit. And the time hath bene, when I also had the lightsome countenance of fortune lovingly smiling and shining upon me. And were we so blessed of God as to have our right wits and perfect senses in time of prosperitie, we would consider and thinke not of things only which have hapned, but of those also that might happen. But if you should

I should forget all other, I alone might serve as a sufficient example and mirror of all accidents of fortune whatsoever. For, whom not long since you either saw or might have seene encamped between the river Anio and your citie, and readie in manner to skale the walls of Rome; you see me now after the losse of my brethren, two right valiant warriours and most renowned Generals, even here before the walls of my countrey little better than besieged, making meanes in humble manner to avert and avoid those daungers from mine owne citie, with which erewhiles I terrified yours. Well, the greatest and happiest fortune is least to be trusted, and never is it worse relying on her, than when she is so free and bountifull. Now that you flourish and we fade, whiles you are afloat and we sinke; a peace, unto you that geveth it, is a glorious and goodly matter; to us that crave it, more necessarie than honorable. Better it is yet and safer of the twaine, to enjoy a certaine peace, than hope for a doubtfull victorie. The one lieth in your hand to effect, the other as it pleaseth the gods to dispose. Beware therefore, how in one houre you hazard the felicitie of so many yeeres. And as you consider your owne strength and forces; so thinke withall upon the power of fortune: set before your eyes the alternative course of Mars in warre. You shall see armour and the edge of the sword; you shall see the bodies of men as well of one side as the other: and no where lesse than in warre do events answer to our hope and expectation. And make full account of this, that you shall not gaine so much overplus of honor, (if haply you should win a field) above that which by granting a peace you may presently have in hand and be possessed of; as you shall forgo and loose of the principall, in case you should do amisse and take the foile. One houres misfortune is able to overturne all the honors and triumphant trophæes as well past and gotten already, as in future hope to be obtained. In knitting and concluding a peace, O P. Cornelius, all lieth in your power. Refuse that once and come to the triall of a battaile, you must take your hap as God shall appoint. If M. Atilius in times past being conquered, would have graunted peace unto our forefathers at their suite and earnest petition; a rare and singular example had he afforded of vertue and felicitie, and few comparable unto him: but not having the grace to see when he was well; not able to set a gage to his prosperitie in some measure and in due time; not willing to restraine and stop the pride and haughtinesse of his good fortune, the higher he was heaved, the fouler was his fall; and the more he mounted, the greater was his overthrow. It is for him (I confesse) that geveth peace, to capitulate and set downe the covenants and conditions, and not for him that craveth the same. And yet peradventure we might not be thought unworthie, to set upon our owne heads a fine and forfeiture. We refuse not therefore but are content, That all shall be yours, for which the quarrell and warre first began: Sicilie, Sardinia, Spaine, all the llands whatsoever lying in the sea betwene Affricke and Italie. And wee Carthaginians holding our selves enclosed within the bounds and coasts of Affricke (since the will and pleasure of God is so) can abide to see you to rule and governe in forein lands and strange seas. I can not denie, but that you have good cause to suspect the Carthaginians for their faith and truth, whose late desire of peace and attendance about the same, was not so plaine and simple as it should have bene: Yet Scipio, take this withall; That it importeth much to the assurance of keeping and observing peace once interteined, to consider who the persons be that seeke and crave the same. And even your owne Senators and LL. of the Counsell, as I heare say, were moved not a little to denie and reject the motion of peace, for this cause, that our embassie seemed unto them not so honourable as it ought to have bene. But now I, even I, no worse a man than Anniball, do sue for peace; which as I would not seeke, unlesse I thought it profitable; so I will interteine it in regard of that profit for which I sought it. And like as when I had once begun the warre, so long as the gods impeached & envied me not, I mainteined it so, as no man of ours had cause to be weerie thereof: so will I endeavour that none shall repent of the peace obtained by my means. When Anniball had thus said; the Roman Generall made answer againe in this sort. I knew full well, O Anniball, that the Carthaginians upon the hope of your coming, have both disturbed the assurance of the present truce, and also troubled the hope of the future peace. Neither doe you your selfe dissimule so much, in defalking all out of the former conditions and capitulations of peace, save onely those things which long since have bene in our power and possession. But as you have a great care, that your fellow citizens should know and perceive, what heavie burdens they are by your meanes discharged and eased of; even so must I endeavour and labour, that the points which then they covenanted and agreed upon, they deduct not this day out of the articles and conditions of peace, for the hire and reward of their falsehood and treacherie. For unworthie you are to have the ouerture and possibility of any peace at all, ye seeke also, that fraud and deceit may turne to your profit and commoditie. Neither began our predeceffours first to make warre for Sicilie, nor we since for Spaine. But as then the daunger wherein our allies the Mamertines stood; so now the ruine and destruction of Saguntum, mooved vs to take armes most iustly, even for pity and compassion. That you began the quarrell and provoked us first, your selfe confesse, and the gods doe witness: who, as in the former warre, they granted and gave the issue, according to right, equitie, and justice: so they doe in this, and so they ever will. For mine owne part, I remember well, and thinke upon the frailtie of mankind, and the ticklishnes of this world: I consider also the power of fortune, and what shee is able to doe: I know likewise, that all our actions whatsoever, are subject to a thousand hazards and inconveniences. But as I would acknowledge my selfe to haue dealt proudly and outrageously, if before I passed over into Affricke, when of your selfe well nigh you abandoned Italie, when you had imbarcked your armie, and came of your owne accord to seeke peace, I had then rejected you and cast you off: even so at this time, when I have haled and drawn you into Affricke by strong armes, as it were to trie an issue in law (all the hasting, all the shifting and resistance you could make to the contrary notwithstanding) I am not bound to have any respective regard at all of you. Wherefore, if besides those points and capitulations, under which the peace at that time was like to be concluded (and what those were you know as well as I can tell you) you bring with you any recompence & amends for our ships, which being charged with victuall and munition, you tooke perforce from us in time of the cessation of armes; as also for the outrage and violence committed upon the persons of our embassadors; there is some reason that I should consider thereupon, and be advised by my counsell. But if you thinke hardly thereof also, as being thereby too sore pressed; look for battell, you that could not like of repose; provide for war, since you would abide no peace. Thus without any conclusion of accord, they left parling; & being returned to their owne companies, they related unto them, how their conference came to nothing, and all their words were but wind, and did no good: and therefore the matter was to be determined and tried by dint of sword, and they to trust to that fortune which the gods had appointed for them. So soone as they were come into their campes, both of them made proclamation, that the soldiers should buckle themselves, make readie their armour, plucke up their spirits, and adresse themselves to a finall triall of the quarrell; where, if they sped well, they were to be victours not for one day, but for ever and aye. For before the morrow next at night, they should know, whether Rome or Carthage should give lawes unto all nations of the earth. And as neither Affricke nor Italie, but the whole world shall be the prize & guerdon of the conquerours; so they whose hap were to loose the field, must make account of daunger and damage, equall to the winnings and gaine of the other. For as the Romanes had no way to escape, nor place of safe retreat, being in a strange and unknown land; so Carthage (having laid all upon this one cast) if they now missed, made accompt that all was gone, and present destruction at hand. So the next day there advanced forward to this doubtfull and daungerous triall, two most noble and renowned capitaines, of two right mightie and puissant states: two most valiant and hardie armies came forth into the field, resolute that day either to winne the spurres or loose the saddle; to gaine more glorie to their former honour, or else to loose all that ever they had gotten. Thus therefore between hope and feare, their minds were perplexed and distracted; and beholding one while their own forces, & another while their enemies power; measuring rather by their eye, than weighing by reason their strength, they had at once presented unto them, objects of joy & content, as well as of sorow and heaviness. And look what the soldiers themselves could not thinke upon, those things their leaders put them in mind of; suggesting unto them by way of admonition and exhortation, whatsoever was thought expedient and good. Anniball rehearsed his noble acts achieved in Italie for the space of fixeene yeeres, he reckoned up how many Romane captains he had slaine, how many armies he had defeated and put to the sword: and ever as he met with any souldiers of note and make for some worthie and memorable battaile; he put them in remembrance of their honourable service and good deserts: Scipio related the conquest of Spaine, recounted the fresh foughten fields in Affricke, alledged the verie confession of the enemies; who neither for feare could doe other but seeke for peace, nor yet upon an inbred falsehood imprinted in their hearts, continue long in the same. Besides he inferred the communication & speech of Anniball had with him in secret and apart from others: which according as hee was disposed to devise, he might turn at his pleasure to fit his purpose. And forasmuch as the gods had shewed unto them as they went out into the field, the same signes and tokens of birds, by direction whereof their fathers before them fought in times past before the Ilands Ægates; hee offered and prefigured that the warre was come to an end, all daungers and troubles overblowne, that the spoile and pillage of Carthage was at their devotion, and they at the point to returne home unto their countrey, their parents, wives, children, and domesticall gods. And this hee spake with such a loslie gesture of his bodie, with so pleasant and lovely a countenance withall, that a man who had seene him, would have thought verily he had achieved the victorie already. Then he embattailed first his Hastati (or speares) in the vaward; behind them the Principes; and the rereward he guarded and fortified with the Triarii. Neither marshalled he whole cohorts thrust thick and close together, in the head of the battaile before their ensignes, but divided them into squadrons, distant a pretie way asunder one from the other: to the end there might be room & space to receive the elephants of the enemies, that they should not breake the arraies and ranks. As for Lelius (whom he had employed before as lieutenant, but that yeare in qualitie of a Questor by a speciall order and direction from the Senat, and not by choice of lot) him with the Italian Cavallerie he put in the left point; & Masaniissa with the Numidian horsemen in the right. The open waies and void spaces betweene the squadrons aforesaid, placed in the front before the ensignes, hee filled with the Velites or avelotiers, who at that time were light armed souldiers; with this commandement, that presently upon the violent charge given by the elephants, they should either retire behind the files, or els runne to a side, both on the right hand and the left, and joyne close to the foremost ranks, and make the elephants way to run upon their shot from the one side and the other. Anniball to strike a terrour into the enemies, first arraigned the elephants in the front, who were in number foure score, and more than ever he had before in any battaile. Then he embattailed the aid souldiers of the Ligurians and Frenchmen, with the Baleare slingers and the Mores intermingled amongst them. In the maine battaile he placed the Carthaginians and Africans, with the legion of the Macedonians: behind whome (leaving a little space betweene) he set in array the battailon of the Italian souldiers in the rereward for succour: & those were most part of them Brutij; who followed him more perforce and by constraint, than of any good will, when he departed out of Italie. The Cavallerie also he displayed and spread round like wings about the two points: whereof the Carthaginians kept the right, and the Numidians the left. Sundry and divers were the exhortations throughout the armie, amongst so many men; whose language was dissonant, whose complexions far unlike, whose manners and conditions were divers, who differed in lawes and customs, whose armours were not all one, whose raiment and apparell not futable, and finally, whose quarrell and cause of war was not one & the same. The auxiliaries & aid-souldiers fed themselves with the hope of ready and present payment and wages for the time past, yea and with a duple & triple augmentation thereof to boot, out of the spoile and pillage. The Frenchmen upon a speciall hatred of their own, and the same deeply fedled, were soone kindled and enflamed against the Romans. The Ligurians, who were brought out of the rough and craggie mountains, and whose teeth watered at the fruitfull and plenteous fields of Italie, were quickly by him mooved to hope after victorie. The Mores and Numidians he frightened with the proud and tyrannicall rule of Masaniissa, under which they should ever after live. Before the Carthaginians he presented the walles of their native citie, their houses and house gods, the sepulchres and tombes of their ancestors, their children and parents, yea and their timorous and fearefull wives: hee set before their eyes either finall destruction of all those things and slavery of their persons, or else the empire and soveraigne dominions of the whole world: and no meane betweene these extremities either of feare or hope.

When as the Generall was most busie thus in exhorting the Carthaginians and the captains of the strangers, amongst the souldiours of their owne nations, and that for the most part by means of interpreters, intermingled for the same purpose with them; the trumpets sounded, and the homes blew from the Romane hoast. And such a wonderfull shout arose from thence, in that the Elephants turned upon the Mores and Numidians of their owne side, especially in the left point of the battaile. Whome Masaniissa seeing once affrighted, hee soone redoubled their feare; and riding upon them with a hote charge, laid naked the battailon of footmen on that side, and cleane without the aid of their Cavallerie. Howbeit, some few of the Elephants driven driven without feare full upon the enemye, made foule worke among the ranks of the light armed Velites, and overthrew a number of them, not without many a wound and much hurt done to themselves. For the Velites leaping againe nimble to the Squadrons, after they had made way for the beasts, fearing they should bee troden underfoot by them, let flie their javelins at them from both sides, lying open as they did like butts to the shot on either hand. Neither lost they any time, who were in the vanguard before the ensignes, nor gave over flinging their darts at them, untill they were driven by a volley of shot lighting upon them from all parts, cleane out of the Romane battaile: and then they turned head also upon the very horsemen of the Carthaginians in their owne right point, and forced them to run away. Lelius for his part, seeing the enemies in disarray and sore troubled, charged upon them with his horses, & encreased their fright. So as now the Carthaginian battaillon was disurnished and stript of their horsemen on both wings. By which time the Cavallerie joined battaile, whose hope was now quailed and strength abated, and therefore not able to make their parts good. Besides another thing there was, a small matter to speake of, but yet in fighting-time and in the very medley, of great consequence and importance. The shout and crie from the Romans was ever alike and consonant in all parts, and therefore the greater and more terrible; but the enemies made dissonant noises, according as they differed in language, being as they were, of many and sundrie nations. The manner of the Romanes fight was sure and stedfast, by reason of the peise of their owne bodies, and the weight of their armour, bearing still, and preasing hard upon the enemies: but they on the other side, shewed more swiftnesse and agilitie, than force and violence. And therefore at the very first shooke the Romanes incontinently enforced their battaillon to recule and lose their ground. Afterward they fell to shoudering and knocking them with the pikes and bosses of their bucklers: which done, they set foot forward a good round pace, and gained some ground of them, marching on still, and no man seemed to make head against them; whiles they that were hindmost in the files, perceiving once that battaillon to goe on and win ground, still put forward the formost, which was the very thing that availed much, and was of great efficacy to put the enemies to flight. But the second battaillon which consisted of Africanes and Carthaginians, were so farre from seconding and upholding the auxiliarie strangers thus dismarching; that contrariwise, for feare lest the Romanes by killing them in the forefront (who stood to it lustily and made resistance) should come as farre as to them behind, they likewise reculed and gave backward. Whereupon the aid-fouldiours also suddainely shewed their hind-parts and turning their face upon their owne fellows: some of them retired for refuge into the second battaillon; others fell to killing of them that would not receive them within their ranks: & good reason they had, for as a while before they had no helpe at all of them, so then they were altogether excluded and shut out from them. So as now the Carthaginians had to deale at once in two medlies shuffled together, whiles they were compelled to close & come to handfight, both with their enemies, and also with their owne fellowes. Yet notwithstanding, for all they were either so affrighted, or so angrie with them, receive them they would not in no hand into their battaillon: but keeping their ranks and files close together, they cast them ato side to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all because they would not intermingle any fouldiours thus skared upon running away and many wounds, with that battaillon which stood still sure ynough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a little before the auxiliaries were raunged, was so full of slaine bodies, and weapons and armour thrumbled one upon another, that the Romanes had welneere more adoe to passe that way now, than they should have had through the preasse of the enemies standing thicke together. And therefore the formost of the Hastati following after the enemies, every one as well as he could over the heapes of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the slipperie filth of the bloud, made a pelmell of their own ensignes, and confusion of their ranks. Whereupon the ensignes also of the Principes began to wave, when they saw the battaile afore them so wandering and inconstant. Which Scipio when hee once perceived, commaunded in all hast to sound the retreat unto the Hastati: and when hee had withdrawn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and bestowed them in the rereward, hee brought the Principes and the Triarij to the out-wings and flanks thereof; to the end, that the middle battaillon of the Hastati should bee more sure and strong. By this meanes there began a new medley. For now were they come to their verie enemies indeed; such as for armour and weapons of all sorts, for practise and experience of warfare, for fame and renowne of

A worthie exploits, and last of all for greatnesse either of hope or perill, were equall and comparable unto them. But both in number and also in courage, the Romans were superiour, for that alreadie they had discomfited the Cavallerie, put to flight the elephants, beaten back the vaward, and were readie now to encounter with the maine battaile. Now Lelius and Masaniſſa having had the horsemen in chase a good way, whom they had compelled to flie as is before said, returned in good time, and charged hotely upon the taile of the enemies battaile. And this assault of theirs it was, that strucke the stroke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environned and killed in the place, many fled and were scattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horsemen who had taken up all the avenues, & raunged all about, were caught up here and there, and so slaine. Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thousand, and welneere as many taken prisoners: of militarie ensignes there were gotten a hundred thirtie three, and eleven Elephants besides, alive. Of the conquerours there died about two thousand. Anniball with some few horsemen made shift to escape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to * Adrumetum, having assaied and tried all meanes possible, both in the very conflict, and also before the battaile, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praise and commendation he woon even by the confession of Scipio himselfe, and all others that were expert warriours, that with singular skill that day he ordered the battell, and marshalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed in the forefront, whose adventurous force and intolerable violence in giving the onser, might empeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arraies; the onely thing wherein they reposed their greatest hope and confidence.

C Then, before the maine battaile of the Carthaginians, he set the auxiliaries and aid-fouldiours, of purpose, that being a confused rable and medley of all sorts of nations, such as were not bound by alleageance, but tied onely by gaine and wages, should have no libertie to retire themselves, and escape by running away: who also, as the forlorne hope, bearing the furious heat of the first brunt, might wearie the enemies with charging upon them, & if they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull & turne the edge of the enemies sword. After this, in the battell, where all his hope was, he placed the Carthaginian and Africane soldiours; that being otherwise in all things els equall to the enemies, they might in this regard have the ods, in that they were to fight with them wearied and wounded, when they themselves were in heart and lustie. As for the Italians, who also were devided from the rest by a good space betwene, he removed farre off into the rereward, as doubtfull whether they were freinds or enemies. Anniball having done this doubtie deed and worke, as it were for the last proove of his vertue and valour, fled to Adrumetum, and was from thence sent for to Carthage: whither hee returned in the fixe and thirtieth yeer, after that he first departed thence a very child. Where in the Counsell house he confessed and said, That overcome he was not only in a battell once, but also in the main war for ever hereafter: protesting in plain tearms, that now there was no other way but one to save themselves, and that was peace, if they could obtaine it.

Scipio immediately after this battaile, having forced by assault and rifled the enemies camp, returned with a huge bootie to the sea and his ships, being advertised afore by a messenger that P. Lentulus was arrived at Vtica with five ships of warre, and a hundred hulks laden with provision of all kinds of victuall. And supposing it good pollicie now that Carthage was troubled and thoroughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terrour on every side: so soone as he had dispatched Lelius away to Rome, with tidings of this victorie, hee commaunded Cn. Octavius to lead the legions by land against Carthage. Himselfe in proper person, after hee had joined this new fleet of Lentulus, unto the old Armada of his owne, weighed anchor and departed from Vtica, and sailed directly to the haven of Carthage. Hee was not farre from thence, when there met him a ship of the Carthaginians, garnished with insules, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and beset with branches of Olive; wherein were ten Oratours embarked, the best men of the citie, sent by the advice & motion of Anniball to crave peace. Who as they approached the hin-decke and poupe of the Admirall ship, but forth the vailles and tokens of suppliants, praying & beseeching the protection and mercie of Scipio. Who had no other answer made them, but that they should repaire to Tunes, whether hee intended to remove. Then himselfe after hee had well viewed the situation of Carthage, not so much to have the full knowledge thereof at this present, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Vtica, whether he had called backe Octavius also. As hee marched forward from thence toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Permina the sonne of Anniball defeated by Scipio.

* Or Adrumetum, now Masaniſſa, according to Merca

of Syphax was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more horsemen than footmen: whereupon, part of the armie together with the whole Cavallerie was sent: whereof the light horse and vancurriers charging the vaward in their march, after a light skirmish discomfited the Numidians: and having stopped all passages every way with the horsemen, so as they could not get out and flye, there were upon a fiftene thousand men of them slaine, 1200 taken prisoners, 1500 Numidian horses also were gotten from them alive, and 72 militarie ensignes. The young Prince himselfe in the mids of the tumult and conflict, with some few escaped. Then encamped Scipio neere Tunes, in the same place where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirtie ambassadors from Carthage. And they verily, as they were in harder case & greater distresse, made much more pitifull entreating than before; but in their audience found lesse favour and mercie by a great deale, for their late treacherie and falshood so fresh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were set in counsell, all of them had just cause to be angrie, and thereupon were provoked to destroy and rase Carthage: yet upon better advisement & consideration, how great and difficult an enterprize, and what a long peece of service it was to besiege a citie so strong and so well fortified: and for that Scipio himselfe was troubled in mind with the expectation of a successeur, who should come to win the credit and honor of finishing the war, which indeed was gotten by the travaile and hazard of another, all their hearts were turned and enclined to peace. The morrow after the Oratours were called againe before them; and after they had bene well checked, rebuked, and plainly told of their treacherie, and warned withall, that after so many losses and overthrowes which they had received, they should now learne to be wise, and at length beleve that there were gods in heaven, and that an oath was to be regarded, these conditions of peace were tendered and offered unto them. Imprimis, it was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the forme of their owne laws: Item, What cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held and were possessed of before the warre began, the same they might keepe still. Item, That Scipio and the Romanes from that day forward should nor waite and spoile the country. Item, That the Carthaginians should deliver all renegade traitours, all fugitive persons, all captives and prisoners, yea, and yeeld unto them all ships of warre with bralen heads, above ten tiremes or gales of three ranks of oares. Item, That they should put into their hands all those Elephants which they had already tamed and manned, and should breake and tame no more of them. Item, They should make warre neither in Affrick, nor without Affrick, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. Item, That they should make restitution and amends to Masinissa for all harmes, and enter into league with him. Item, That they should find come and money for the maintenance of the aid-souldiours, untill their ambassadors were returned from Rome: yea and tender payment of ten thousand talents of silver by even portions in fittie yeares. Item, That they should put in a hundred hostages at the pleasure of Scipio, and none of them to be either under fourteene yeeres of age, or above thirtie. Last of all, they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ships which were taken during the time of the former cessation of armes, should be restored back againe, with all things els that were therein: otherwise, no truce for the present, nor hope of peace hereafter. These articles and conditions the ambassadors were willed to returne home withall. Which after they had related in the generall assemblie of the people, Gisgo mounted up the pulpit to dissuade peace, and had audience given him with great applause of the multitude; who as they were heartlesse and unmeet for warre, so they were aspeevisch and unruly, and could not long continue in repose. Heereat, Annibal took great indignation, & was highly displeased, that in such a time, those things should either be delivered or heard; and he made no more ado, but stepped to Gisgo, laid hand upon him, and pulled him down from the pue out of which he spake: whereat the people were moved and grumbled in great discontent, to see so strange a sight and unusuall, in a free citie. Then Annibal, as he was a meere martiall man, and could not skill of civile affaires, nor well away with these citizens libertie. I went, quoth he, from you when I was but nine yeeres old, and now after 36 yeeres I am come againe. All militarie skill and knowledge, which fortune sometime in my private matters, and otherwhiles in publick affaires, hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I have learned sufficiently: may, for the rights and priviledges, for the lawes, customes, and fashions of the citie and the common hall, I must be informed and instructed by you. Thus having pleaded ignorance for his excuse, he discoursed at large of peace, arguing how reasonable and equall, yea and how necessarie it was. The greatest point of difficultie in all the capitulations lations ministred unto them was this, That touching the things above said which were taken during the abstinence of armes, there was nothing nowforth-coming and to be seene but the bare vessels; and no easie matter was it to seeke up the rest. Now when as they that gainesaid the peace were convinced and put downe by reason, agreed it was, that the ships should be redelivered, and the men likewise be sought out and found: as for all the rest that was wanting, there should an estimate be made according to the value, at the discretion of Scipio, and so the Carthaginians to make all good in money. Writers there be that have delivered, how Annibal presently from the field sped him to sea, and there finding a ship readie prepared for him, straightwayes embarke, and went directly to king Antiochus: Also, when Scipio demanded above all other things that Annibal should be yielded into his hands, answer was made, that Annibal was not in Affrick. After that the ambassadors were returned to Scipio, the Questours or Treasurers were commaunded to draw an extract according to their bookes upon record, of all such things as were in the ships, and appertained to the citie: and looke what belonged to private persons, the owners thereof were willed to declare and testifie. In consideration and recompense whereof, there was a summe of money set downe, amounting to 25000 pound weight of silver, and the same to be paid presently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was graunted to them for three moneths: with this clause annexed over and besides, That during the said terme they should send their embassadours to no other place but only to Rome: and what embassadours soever came to Carthage, they should not let them depart before they had certified the Roman General both who they were, and what their message and errand was. Then with the Carthaginian ambassadors were sent to Rome L. Veturius Philo, M. Martius Ralla, and L. Scipio, brother to the General. At that time there came such store of graine and victuals out of Sicilie and Sardinia, and thereby come was so cheape, that the merchant was faine to leave come behind him to satisfie the shipmen and mariners for the portage and carriage thereof.

Now there had ben much trouble and fear at Rome upon the first news and al'arme, that the Carthaginians had taken arms againe: and T. Claudius had commission to conduct a fleet with all speed into Sicilie, and from thence to passe over into Affrike: likewise the other Consull was commaunded to stay still at Rome, untill it were certainly knowne in what terms all matters stood in Affrike. But T. Claudius went but slowly to worke, either in preparing and rigging an armada, or in putting it to sea; because the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the disposition of Scipio than of the Consull. Moreover, there were certaine prodigious signs reported even presently before the very rumour of the foresaid rising and insurrection, which caused men to feare greatly. At Cumes, the circle and compasse of the sunne appeared lesse: and it rained a good shewe of stones. Also in the territorie of Velutre, the earth sciled and sunke, and made huge hollow chinks, in so much as trees were quite swallowed up under the ground. At Aricia the market-place and the shops all about, likewise at Frusino the wall of the citie in divers places, yea and the gate, were smitten with lightning from heaven: and in mount Palatine it rained stones. This wondrous sight last rehearsed, was expiat after the ancient custome, by keeping a Novendiall sacrifice and feast for nine daies; the rest by killing of greater sacrifices. Among all, there were unusual deluges and inundations of waters, which troubled the minds and consciences of men: for the Tyber so swelled and rose so high, that by reason that the shew-place of the Circus was overflowne, preparation was made for the setting forth of the games Apollinaires, without the gate Collina, neere the chappell of Veneris Ergina. But upon the very day when the plaies should be exhibited, it grew to be so fair weather of a sodain, that the pageant and pompous traine of the shew, which was a going to the gate Collina, was called backe and conveyed into the Circus; and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone cleane out from thence: so the people were more joious, and the pastimes celebrated with greater resort, for that the usuall and ordinarie place served againe for the solemnities to be performed.

F Claudius the Consull at last departed from the citie of Rome, and went to sea; where betwene the havens of Cossa and Lauretum, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearefull tempest that arose and put him in exceeding feare. From thence he came to the Populonij, and there stayed untill the tempest was overblowne and gone. Then hee fell with the yle * Ilua, and from Ilua hee sailed to Corsica, and from Corsica he passed over to Sardinia; where, as he doubled the point and and was passing the race of the mountaines called * Infani, there arose a farre more cruell ghust, and in places of more perill and hazard, which scattered the fleet. Many of the ships were watherbeaten & sore shaken, many lost their tackling quite, yea and some were crackt and split. Thus the Armada being much tossed and torne, arrived at length at Carales; where, whiles the ships were drawne up into the docke to drie land, and there a repairing, the winter came upon them, and the yeare turned about. And so T. Claudius (as a private person, by reason that no man renewed his commission for a farther time) brought the Armada backe to Rome. But M. Servilius because he should not be called home to the citie for the solemne election of magistrates, after he had declared Dictatour, Cn. Servilius Geminus, departed into his province. And the Dictatour chose P. Aelius Patus Generall of the horsemen. Oftentimes went the writs out for publishing of the election, but by reason of tempests it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old magistrates left their office after the Ides of March, and no new substituted in their roome, the citie was cleane without any magistrates of state to sit in the yvorie chaire. L. Manlius Torquatus a bishop that yeere died. In his place was invested C. Sulpitius Galba. The Romane games were thrice exhibited a new by L. Licinius Lucullus and Q. Fulvius, Ediles of the chaire. The clarks and scribes belonging to the Ediles, together with their beades and summoners, were detected for carrying forth certaine money out of the treasure and chamber of the citie: and being thereof convicted, were therefore condemned, not without some touch and discredit of Lucullus himself the Edile. P. Aelius Tubero and L. Lætorius Ediles of the commons, for that there was some error and default in their election, resigned up their places, after they had represented the playes, and in regard thereof solemnized the feast of Iupiter, and set up besides in the Capitoll three images made of the silver that was forfeited and raised upon the fines of the persons condemned aforesaid. The Dictatour and Generall over the horsemen, by order from the Senat exhibited the games called Cereales, to the honour of Ceres.

When the Romane ambassadors and Carthaginians together, were come out of Affricke to Rome, the Senate assembled to give them audience in the temple of Bellona: where L. Veturius Philo after he had declared (to the exceeding joy of the LL. of the Senate) that they had fought a battaile with Anniball, (the last that ever the Carthaginians were like to fight) and that this grievous and lamentable warre was now come to an end, he went on still and related, that Permina also the sonne of Syphax was vanquished and subdued; which was no small increase of the other exploits so happily atchieved. Then he was commanded to go forth from thence directly to the assembly of the people, there to impart these glad some newes unto the multitude. Whereupon (for exceeding joy and in token of thanksgiving) all the temples in the citie were fetopen, and solemne processions decreed for three daies. Now when as the embassadours of the Carthaginians and king Philip (for they also were arrived) required to have a day of audience in the Senate; the Dictatour by direction from the Senate, returned them this answer, That the new Consuls should satisfie their request. After this, was the solemne assembly holden for the election of magistrates; and Consuls were created Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Aelius Patus: for Pretours, first M. Junius Pennus, who was allotted to have the civill jurisdiction in the citie: then M. Valerius Falto, unto whom the Brutians country fell by lot to governe: next, M. Fabius Bute, whose hap was to rule Sardinia, and P. Aelius Tubero to be L. depute of Sardinia. Concerning the provinces wherein the Consuls were to be employed, it was not thought good to determine any thing, before the embassadours of king Philip and likewise of the Carthaginians, had delivered their embassages: for as they saw the end of one warre, so they foresaw the beginning of another. Cn. Lentulus the Consull was inflamed with an ardent desire of the province of Affricke: for if the warre continued, he aimed at an easie victorie: and if it were at the point of an end, he gaped at the honour of finishing the same, and hoped to have the name, That determined it was whiles he was Consull. And therefore he protested plainly, that he would suffer nothing to passe before that the province of Affricke were assigned to him. His colleague (a sober, temperate, and discrete man) gave his consent; for he saw full well, that as the contending for that glorie with Scipio, was unjust and unreasonable, so in it hee would be overmatched, and never able to import and carrie it away from him. Q. Minutius Thermus and M. Acilius Glabrio, two Tribunes of the commons, gave out and said, That Cn. Cornelius went about to compasse that, which was commenced and assayed in vaine the yeare before by T. Claudius the Consull. For when by warrant from the Senate a bill was propofed unto the people, whome their pleasure was to nominate

A nate for government of Affricke, all the 35 Tribes gave their voices and awarded that province to P. Scipio. Much contention there passed and many bickerments both in Senat-house and before the people, in the debating of this question: but in the end they grew to this point, to refer all to the judgement of the Senate. So the LL. of the Senate having taken their oath (for so it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order. First, that the two Consuls should either agree together betweene themselves, or else cast lots for their provinces; namely, which of them should have the rule of Italie, and who the charge of a fleet of fiftie saile. Item, to whether of them twaine besell the navie, he should saile over into Sicilie: and if peace might not be fully concluded with the Carthaginians, then to crosse over into Affricke; where the Consull should warre by sea, and Scipio by land, by vertue of the same commission and authoritie that he had alreadye. Moreover, if the conditions of peace were accepted of both parts, that then the Tribunes of the Commons should propound unto the people, as touching their wil and pleasure, whether the Consull or P. Scipio should conclude the peace; and which of them (if the victorious armie after conquest obtained, were to be brought backe out of Affricke) should have the conduct thereof home againe. Also, if they nominated Scipio for to make the peace, and bring away the armie likewise, then the Consull should not cut over from Sicilie to Affricke. As for the other Consull who had the government of Italie, he should receive of M. Sestius the Pretour, two legions. So P. Scipio had his commission sealed againe for to remaine in the province of Sicilie, with the same forces which he there had. M. Valerius Falco the Pretour in the Brutians country was allowed those legions whereof C. Livius had the commaund the yeare before. It was furthermore agreed, that P. Aelius the Pretour should take the two legions in Sicilie of Cn. Tremellus: and that one legion which P. Lentulus the Propretour had under his conduct, was appointed to M. Fabius for Sardinia. And M. Servilius the Consull of the former yeare, continued also in his government with his owne two legions for Hetruria. As concerning the provinces of Spaine, sith L. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Manlius Acidinus had bene there for certaine years, the said Consuls were to deale with the Tribunes, that if they thought it good, they should propound unto the Commons, for to know their minds whome they would appoint to govern Spaine: and that he whosoever it was, should out of two armies enroll one entire legion of Romane souldiers, and of the allies of the Latine nation make up fiftene cohorts or regiments, and with the strength of them joyntly, keepe in obedience and defend the province. Item, that L. Cornelius and L. Manlius should bring over the old souldiers into Italie. Unto Cornelius the Consull was assigned a fleet of fiftie ships, to be deducted and drawne out of two other Armadaes; the one of Cn. Octavius which was in Affricke, the other of P. Villius which guarded the coasts of Sicilie; and to choose thereout what ships he would: and that P. Scipio should keepe those fiftie ships of warre which he had alreadye. And in case his pleasure was that Cn. Octavius should be Admirall over them still, like as heretofore; then Octavius was to continue in government for that yeare as Viz-pretour: but if he made Lalios the admirall, then Octavius should depart and come home to Rome, and bring backe with him those ships that the Viz-consull had no use or need of. M. Fabius likewise had ten gallies of service allowed him into Sardinia. And the Consuls were appointed to muster and enroll two legions of citizens, that with the power of fourteene legions, and an hundred ships of warre, the affaires of Rome that yeare might be managed.

These things thus ordered, they began to debate in counsell about the embassadours of Philip and the Carthaginians: and thought good it was to admit the Macedonians into place for to have audience. Divers and sundrie speeches they made, whiles they laboured partly to cleere that point as touching the complaints that the embassadours sent from Rome made before the king, for the forraying and spoiling of their confederates: and partly complained themselves of the allies of the people of Rome, laying much to their charge: but farre more bitterly accusing M. Aurelius, for that he being one of the three embassadours sent unto them, staied behind and took musters of souldiers; yea and against the covenant comprised in the league, made warre upon them, and oftentimes gave battaile unto their captains and governors in open field: partly also they demanded, that the Macedonians and their captaine Sopater, who had served in the warres of Anniball for wages, and were taken prisoners and kept bound in prison, might be enlarged and set at libertie.

To these points M. Furius, sent of purpose from Aurelius out of Macedonia, made answer briefly briefely in this wise, That Aurelius who was left behind, for feare that the affociats of the people G of Rome, wearied with rodes and incursions into their territories & other injurious oppressions, might revolt unto the king; never departed out of the confines of the affociates aforesaid, and endeavoured onely, that those robbers and forraiers of the cuntry should not invade and overrun their lands, and goe cleare away without any harme. As for Sopater, hee was a state and peere of the realme, and one neerely allied unto the king, who lately was sent into Affricke with foure thousand Macedonians and with money, to aid & assist Anniball and the Carthaginians. When as the Macedonians being required what they could say to these challenges, framed but a doubtful and intricate defence, before they had well made an end they received this for their answer: That since the king fought warre, if he proceeded and went on still, hee should shortly have his hands full: but forasmuch as he had broken the league in two points, first in offering wrong to the allies of the people of Rome, and molesting them by way of warre and hostilitie; and secondly in helping their enemies with men and money, they deemed thus much of it, that not only P. Scipio both did and doth well and justly, in keeping them still in prison as enemies, who bare arms against the people of Rome, and were taken captive; but also M. Aurelius performed good service to the State, and a great pleasure to the Senate, in defending the Allies of the people of Rome by force of armes, when by right of league hee could not. VVhen the Macedonians had their dispatch, and were sent away with this heavey answer, then the Carthaginian embassadors were called in.

The Orations of Anniball, heard down the Senat
of Rome.

VVhen they beheld their reverent age, and the dignitie of their personage (for they were the best and principal men simply of their citie) then every man was fully perswaded for his own part and said, That now they dallied no longer, but meant in deed and good earnest to crave & have peace. But the cheefe and most portly person of them all was one Asdruball, in his cuntry and among his citizens surnamed Hedus, a man that ever perswaded peace, & opposed himself against the Barchine faction. And therefore he had the more credite and authoritie, when hee derived the blame from the Commonweale, and laid all the fault upon the wilfulness and greedieavarice of some few. Who after hee had used diverse and sundrie speeches, one while excusing and clearing the crimes, another while confessing some things objected, least if they had denied certain truths, they should with more difficultie have obtained pardon and peace: now and then also giving the LL. of the Senate an admonition and warning by the way, to use their prosperitie and good fortune modestly and with moderation, he added moreover and said, That if the Carthaginians would have been ruled by him and Hanno, and had been so wise as to have taken their time and the opportunitie when it was, they should themselves have given those conditions of peace, which now they are constrained to crave. But for men to bee fortunate and wise both at once, it is a rare and speciall gift, and sildome seene. And here it is that the people of Rome (qd. he) is invincible, because in prosperitie they can remember to bee wise, and to take the best way for themselves. And certes a wonder it were, if ever they should doe otherwise. For those commonly who happen to meet with some new good chevance, and have not beene used thereto before, overshoot and passe themselves too much in excessive joy, which they have not the grace to governe with sobrietie and discretion: whereas the people of Rome have ever beene accustomed to the continuall felicitie of joyous victories, inso much as they are growne into a disuse of taking pleasure and delight in them (so common they are) and have encreased their dominion and Empire, more (in manner) by sparing and pardoning those whom they have conquered, than by the very conquest of them indeed.

The speech that the other embassadors made, was more pittiful and lamentable, whiles they recounted before the Senat from what high estate, & to how base condition they were fallen: who but a while since held by force of arms, as it were the whole world, & had nothing left them now but the bare walls of the citie of Carthage, within which they were shut up, & could see nothing either by land or sea, which they might rightfully claime as their owne. Nay the very citie it selfe and their houses, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is unwilling, & forbearth to proceed by rigour and extremitie against the same, since there is nothing else behind to worke upon. Now when as the LL. of the Senate seemed to incline to mercie and compassion, one Senator there was amongst them (by report) who upon a deepe and inveterate hatred of the Carthaginians trecherie, spake out aloud and said, VVhat gods will they regard and swear by, in making of a new league, who have broken their oth, and taken their name in vaine whom they called

A called to witness in the former? Marrie (qd. Asdruball) even those and no other that are so sharpe revengers and heavey enemies to the breakers of league and covenant. So when all their minds were inclined to peace, Cn. Lentulus the Consull, who had the government of the navie, opposed himselfe against the decree of the Senate for to crosse the same. Then M. Atilius, & Q. Minutius, Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a solemne bill unto the people, in this forme: Pleaseth it you, and will you graunt, That the Senate shall resolve and determine, that peace may bee concluded with the Carthaginians: Pleaseth it you to chuse and appoint who shall be the man to make that peace, and who shall bring the armie out of Affricke? As concerning peace, the tribes every one as they were demanded their voices, graunted affirmatively (Vti rogatis) that Scipio should conclude it, and also bring away the armie. By vertue of this Act passed by the people, the Senate made a decree, that P. Scipio by the advise & counsell of ten Commissioners, should contract an accord with the people of Carthage, under what conditions he thought good. After this the Carthaginians rendered thanks to the LL. of the Senat, and requested that they might enter into the citie, and talke with their fellow citizens and countriemen, who had beene taken captives aforesime, and lay in the common gaole and prison. For there were amongst them some of their kinsfolke and friends, noblemen of birth & of good qualitie; others also, unto whom they were to deliver some message and credence from their kinsmen. VVhen they had spoken & communed with them, they came with a new petition and made earnest suite, to give them leave to raunsome and redeeme as many of them as they would: wherupon they were willed to give them their names; and when they had named fast upon two hundred, an order was graunted out of the Senate, that the Romane Commissioners should take over with them into Affricke unto Scipio two hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choise of; and declare unto him from the Senate, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he should deliver those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any raunsome. Now when the heralds of armes were appointed to goe into Affricke, for to confirme and establish the peace according to the solemne order, at their owne request there passed an act of the Senate framed in this forme and tenure. Imprimis, That they should carrie with them every one by himselfe, certaine flint stones of their owne, and likewise Vervens. Item, That the Roman Pretors should commaund them solemne to pronounce the league, and then they to aske of the Pretour sacred hearbes or Vervens. A kind of grasse or hearbe this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitoll hill, and given to the Heralds.

D Thus were the Carthaginians dismissed and sent from Rome: who being come into Affricke to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is above said. And so they delivered up their gallies and ships of warre, their Elephants, the renegade traitours, the vagrant fugitives, and foure thousand prisoners. Among whom was Q. Terentius Culleo, a Senator by his calling. As for the ships, so soone as they were launced forth into the deepe, Scipio caused them to bee set on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, one with another, of every sort, and all directed and guided by oares. Presently were they set a burning: a dolorous sight and heavey spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage it selfe had been on a light fire. The renegade traitours and rebels were punished more greevously than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latine nation lost their heads: all that were naturall Romanes, were crucified and roundly trussed up on the gallows. Fortie years before was the peace last made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Lucatius and A. Manlius were Consuls. The warre began three and twentie yeares after, whiles P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And the same ended in the eighteenth yeare after, P. Cornelius, and P. Aelius Pætus being Consuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would say, that the wilfull and covetous desire of T. Claudius first, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the onely stay and let, that this warre ended not with the small ruine and utter destruction of Carthage.

F When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continuall warres were growne bare and poor, thought the levie and contribution of money for to furnish out the first paiment, lay heavey and sore upon them, inso much as in their Senate house, there was great sorrow and heaviness, yea, and pittous weeping; it is said, that Anniball was seene to laugh agood. And when Asdruball rebuked him for laughing in that publick lamentation of the citie, considering that himselfe was the cause of those tears, If (qd. Anniball) as we see by our eie the outward disposition of the face and countenance, so wee could looke withinforth and behold the affection of the mind, we ye might soone perceive, that this laughter of mine, which ye so much blame, proceedeth not G from an heart that is glad and joyfull, but rather senselesse, stupified, and astonied with the exceeding greeces and calamities that have happened. Yet is not it so unseasonable and inperunent to our present condition, as these teares of yours, and weeping that you make, is absurd and nothing to the purpose. Then should yee have wept and shed teares, when our armour and weapons were taken from us, when our ships were set on fire, when wee were interdicted and forbidden to make warre with forraigne nations: for then had wee our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never thinke that the Romanes have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatred that ye bare one to another. No great citie & mightie State can long continue and rest in quiet. If it have no enemies abroad, it findeth some at home: much like unto strong and lustie bodies, which seeming sure ynough against all outward accidents and causes of sicknesse, are overcharged with their owne strength and fulnesse of humours, and thereby subject to most deadly maladies. So much, forsooth, and no more we feele of the publicke miseries and common calamities, as toucheth and concerneth our selves in particular: wherein nothing pincheth us more, nor goeth neerer to the quicke, than to forgo our monie, and part with our pence. And therefore when Carthage was conquered and despoiled of all her auncient honours, when yee saw her disarmed and stripped naked, when yee saw her forlorne of all the armed nations of Affricke; no man then sighed, no man grieved thereat: but now when the tribute imposed, is to be paid out of your private purses, yee keepe a weeping and wailing, as in some pub-licke funerall and mortuarie carried forth. But alas, I feare me greatly, that ere it be long, yee shall find and feele, That your weeping this day hath been for the least losse of all the rest. Thus spake Anniball to the Carthaginians.

Scipio having assembled his whole armie together, before them all, restored Masinissa to his fathers kingdom: and over and besides, endued him with the possession of the citie Cirtha, and other townes and territories which belonged to the realme of Syphax, and were now in subjection to the people of Rome. Vnto Cn. Octavius he gave order to conduct the fleet into Sicilie, and there to make it over to Cn. Cornelius the Consull. The Carthaginian embassadours he willed to goe to Rome, that those acts and capitulations which were concluded by him with the advise of the ten Commissioners, might likewise passe under the approbation of the Senat, & the consent of the people, and so be ratified and confirmed for ever.

Thus Scipio having obtained peace both by sea and land, and embarked his armie, sailed toward Sicilie, and arrived at Lilybaeum. From whence he sent away a great part of his armie by sea, and himselfe passed by land through Italie, which now was joyfull as well for the peace concluded, as the victorie achieved. Where all the way as hee went, not onely the people came forth in multitudes out of the cities to do him honor, but numbers also of the countie peafants out of the villages, filled all the high waies along, untill he came to Rome: where he entred the citie, riding in the most stately and magnificent triumph that ever had been. Hee brought into the citie chamber 100033 pound weight of silver. He devided among his souldiours out of the spoile *four hundred Asses apeece. Syphax by his death rather disappointed the people of a goodly shew & pageant in the triumph, than diminished any whit the glorie of the triumph: hee died at Tybur not long afore, to which place he had been removed from Alba: howbeit his death was not obscure, by reason that he was solemnly caried to his buriall, with the pompe of a publicke funerall at the charges of the citie. But Polybius a writer of good account, reporteth, That this K. was led in the very triumph. As Scipio rode triumphant Q. Terentius Culleo, followed after with a cap of libertie set upon his head; and ever after, so long as hee lived, hee honoured him (as becomming it was) and acknowledged him the author of his freedome. But as concerning his surname Africanus, I cannot for certaine learne, whether it were the favour of his souldiours first, or the affectionate love of the people afterwards that brought it up, or rather began upon some of his owne house and linage that courted and flattered him therewith: like as in our fathers daies Sulla was furnamed Felix*, and Pompeius, Magnus*. This is certaine that he was the first Generali that ever tooke his name of the countie and nation by himselfe subdued, and thereby was renowned. But by his example afterwards, others nothing comparable to him in victorie and conquest woon goodly titles and glorious inscriptions to their images, and honoured their houses with noble tiles and additions.

THE XXXI. BOOKE OF THE HISTORIES OF T. LIVIUS of Padoa, from the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and thirtieth Booke.

The causes of the warre begun againe with Philip king of Macedonia, which had discontinued, are set downe to be these. In the time of the holie feast of Ceres, two young men of Acarnania, who had not been professed in these sacred mysteries, came to Athens, and chanced among others of their countymen to goe into the chappel of Ceres. For which, as if they had committed some bas-inous fault in the highest degree, they were by the Athenians executed. The Acarnanians moved with indignation for the death of their neighbors, required aid of Philip to be revenged for them: Some few moneths after peace granted to the Carthaginians in the five hundred and fiftieth year from the foundation of the citie of Rome, when the Embassadours of the Athenians, who now were besieged by Philip, craved aid of the Senate, and they were of advise and resolved to helpe them, not withstanding the Commons gainesaid it (by reason that they thought the continuall troubles of so many wars were grievous and beavie unto them) yet so have prevailed the authoritie of the nobles, that the people also gave their consent to incomm their considerate citie. This warre was committed to the managing of P. Sulpitius the Consull: who led an armie into Macedonia, and fought certaine battailes fortunatly against Philip, which were performed by horse service. The Abydens being invested and beleaguered round about by Philip, following the example of the Saguntines, slew their wives and children, and their owne selves after them. L. Furius the Pretour overthrew in a pight field the Gauls called Insubres that rebelled, and likewise Amilcar the Carthaginian, who began to make war in those parts, where Amilcar was slaine, and with him five and thirtie thousand men. Moreover, this booke containeth the expeditions and voiajes of king Philip and Sulpitius the Consull, and the winning of certaine cities by them both. Sulpitius the Consull warred with the helpe of king Attalus and the Rhodians. L. Furius the Pretor triumphed over the Gauls.

Vill well apaied am I likewise, that I am now come to an end once of the Punicke warre, as if my selfe had been in person there, and borne my part in the toile and danger thereof. For albeit unfitting it is for mee (who have undertaken and professed so boldly to write a complete and full storie of the Romanes) to bee wearied in the severall parts of so great a worke: yet when I thinke and consider, how threescore yeares and three (for so many are reckoned from the first Punicke warre, to the end of the second) have taken up no fewer bookes of mine, than foure hundred eightie eight yeares before, even from the foundation of Rome, unto the Consul-ship of that Appius Clandius, who was the first that war-red upon the Carthaginians; mee thinkes I foresee a treadie, that like as they who being once entred into the shallowes neere the shore, are trained on still, and venture to wade into the F sea, even so I, the farther I goe forward, the deeper I step, and am carried away into a vast Ocean, and bottomlesse gulfe (as it were) which cannot be founded; and that my worke groweth still upon me in my hands, which as I went away apace, and rid matters at the first, I would have thought by this time should have decreased.

The Carthaginian peace was no sooner concluded, but the Macedonian warre straightwaies ensued:

ensued: nothing comparable to the Punicke, if ye regard the hazard and danger, the vertue of the captaines for direction, or prowess of the souldiours: but if a man consider the nobilitie and reputation of the auncient kings, the fame and antiquitie of the nation, the greatness of their seignorie and dominion, who in times past had conquered and held by the sword much in Europe and the better part of Asia, I dare well say, as noble and renowned, if not more. But the warre commenced against Philip ten yeeres almost before, had ere three yeeres end bene laid downe and discontinued by meanes of the Ætolians: who as they gave occasion to enter into armes, so they wrought a composition of peace. But afterwards in processe of time, when the Romanes by reason of peace with the Carthaginians, had nothing to doe and were at leisure; and yet bearing an inward grudge and owing a displeasure to Philip, as well for his faithlesse peace with the Ætolians and other allies and confederates of that countrey, as also for aid both of men and money lately sent into Affricke to Anniball and the Carthaginians: behold, the Athenians, whose territories hee had cleane wasted and spoiled, and whome he had driven within their citie walls, importuned them with their prayers, and perswaded them to take armes and renew the warre aforesaid. And much about the same time, there arrived embassadours from king Attalus, as also from the Rhodians, giving notice that divers cities and states of Asia were solicited likewise by Philip to band against the Romanes. These embassadours had their dispatch, and received this answer, That the Senate would have a carefull eye to the affaires of Asia. But the entier treatie and consultation concerning the Macedonian warre, was wholly reserved and referred unto the Consuls, who then were, employed in the warre with the Boij. In the meane season three embassadours were addressed unto Ptolomus the king of Egypt, to wit, C. Claudius Nero, M. Aemilius Lepidus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, with this commission: First, to signifie and let him understand, that Anniball & the Carthaginians were subdued: secondly, to give thanks unto the king for continuing so fast and faithfull unto the Romans in their distress and adversitie, when other of their allies, and even their next neighbours forsooke and abandoned them: last of all, to request him, that in case they should be forced by wrongs and injuries offered, to wage warre against Philip, hee would vouchsafe the same mind still and his wonted affectionate favour toward the people of Rome.

Neare about this time, P. Aelius the Consull being in Fraunce, advertised that the Boians before his coming had made rodes into the lands of the friends and allies of the Romanes, presently in all hast levied and enrolled two legions upon the rumour of this tumult and trouble; and joyning thereunto foure cohorts of footmen out of his own armie, sent C. Appius a colonell or captaine of the confederates, with this power so sodainly raised, and with commandement to march through that part of Vmbria which is called, the Tribe Sappinia, and to invade the territories of the Boij, whiles himselfe in person led his forces the open way traversing through the mountaines, and came thither. Appius being entred into the confines of the enemies, at the first had a good hand, and sped well in forraying the country with safetie of himselfe. But afterwards, having made choice of a meet place neere unto a castle called * Mutilum, for to cut downe and reape the corne, (for now the fields were ready for harvest) but yet, without espials sent out to discover the coasts about, without setting strong and sufficient guards, which being well appointed and armed, might defend the unarmed that were busie in their harvest worke; hee chaunced himselfe and all his forragers and reapers to be surprisid at unawares by the Frenchmen, and assailed on every side. Whereupon they also that were armed, fled in great fright; and 7000 men stragling here and there over the corne fields, were slaine; and among them, C. Appius himselfe their leader. The rest for feare were driven to put themselves within their campe: from whence without direction and guidance of any certaine captaine, and onely upon a generall consent of the souldiers, the night next following they abandoned their hold, lest much of their baggage behind them, and through blind Forrests, chafes, and wild mountaines (in manner unpassable) they came in the end to the Consull: who, after he had perfourmed in his province no memorable act, save only that hee wasted the borders and frontiers of the Boij, and made a league with the Ingauni (a nation of the Ligurians) returned to Rome. So soone as hee had assembled the Senate, all the whole house with one voice called upon him, to treat and consult upon no other matter before they had determined of king Philip, and the complaints made by their allies: so he proposed that out of hand to be debated in councill. And the Senate in a frequent number there met, passed a decree, that P. Aelius the Consull, should send whome he thought

A good with commission & authoritie, for to receive the Armada which Cn. Octavius was to bring out of Sicilie, and therewith to crosse over into Macedonia. So M. Valerius Levinus the Vicepretour was sent; and when hee had taken the charge of the fleet, consisting of eight and thirtie saile, at the hands of Cn. Octavius about Vibo, hee passed the seas to Macedonia. Now when M. Aurelius the lieutenant was come, and had enformed and advertised him, what puissant armies, what numbers of ships the king had prepared and gotten together; how partly himselfe in person by going about not onely to all the cities of the continent, but also the ylands in the sea; and partly by sending his embassadours every way, had solicited unto warre and raised much people to take armes: shewing moreover, that the Romanes were not to enterprife that war without preparation of greater forces; and that more speedily, for feare least if they made slow hast and lingered, Philip might enterprife that adventure, which Pyrrhus (apotentate & prince of a farre lesser dominion) had done before: it was thought meet that Aurelius should dispatch his letters to the same effect, unto the Consuls and the Senate.

In the end of this yeare, when a motion was propounded in the Senate-house, as concerning the setting out of lands unto the old souldiers for recompence of their good service, who, under the conduct and fortunate government of Scipio the Proconsull, had brought the warre in Affricke to an end: the LL. enacted a decree, that M. Iunius the Pretor of the citie, if he thought so good, should create ten Decemvirs as surveyours, for to measure out and divide among them the lands in Samnium and Apulia, so much as had bene forfeit and confiscate to the people of Rome. And these were they: namely, P. Servilius, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, Cneus and Marcus named Servilij, and both surnamed Gemini. Lucius and Aulus both Hæstiliij, and surnamed Catoes likewise, P. Villius Tappulus, M. Fulvius Flaccus, P. Aelius Pætus, and Q. Flaminius.

At the same time P. Aelius the Cof. called the assembly and high court of Parliament for election of magistrates: and for Cof. were created P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. After them were the Pretours chosen, to wit, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Fulvius Gilla, and C. Sergius Plancus. The Romane stage playes were that yeere exhibited with great state and magnificence most sumptuously, by L. Valerius Flaccus, and T. Quintius Flaminius, Ædiles of the chaire, and for two dayes together were represented anew. These Ædiles distributed and divided most faithfully among the people a mightie deale of corne, which Scipio the Proconsull had sent out of Affricke, at foure asses the Modius: whereby they wan great love and favour of all men. Also the Plebeian playes were thrice set forth all whole againe, by the Ædiles of the Commons, L. Apustius Fullo, and Q. Minutius Rufus. This man from his Ædileship stepped to the Pretours place. And by occasion of those playes, there was a solemne feast celebrated in the honour of Iupiter.

In the 544 yeere from the foundation of the citie, when P. Sulpitius Galba, & C. Aurelius were Cof. the warre with king Philip began, within foure moneths after peace granted to the Carthaginians. And before all other matters, this affaire was propounded in the Senate by P. Sulpitius the Cof. upon the Ides of March, the very day on which at that time they used to enter upon the Consulship. Where, by the Senate it was decreed, Imprimis, That the Consuls should sacrifice with greater beasts to what gods themselves thought good, with a solemne prayer in this forme: That whatsoever the Senate and people of Rome minded and intended to do, either concerning the affaires of Common-wealth, or the undertaking and enterprife of this new warre, the same might speed well and happily in the end, to the behoufe of the people of Rome, their allies, and namely the nation of the Latines. Item, That after sacrifice and divine prayer, they should consult with the Senate about the state of the citie, and the government of the provinces. At the same time, it fell out very fitly to provoke and stirre up their minds unto the warre, that not only letters were brought from M. Aurelius the lieutenant, and from M. Valerius Levinus the Viz-pretour: but also a new Embassie of the Atheniens arrived, the one importing, and the other reporting, that the king drew neere and approached their confines, and within a while would be not only lord of their lands and territories, but also maister of their citie, unless the Romanes set too their helping hand. After that the Consuls had openly pronounced and declared, that the sacrifices were performed rightly and according to order, and that the gods gave care unto their prayer, and accepted thereof: and the Soothsayers and bowell-priars likewise out of their learning made answer and shewed, that the inwards of the beasts were as they should be, and signified happinesse, namely, the enlarging of their confines and frontiers, with the atchieving of victorie and triumph. Then were the letters abovesaid of Valerius and G. Aurelius read, and the Athenien embassadours had a day of audience. After this, there passed an Act of the Senate, That thanks should be rendred unto their allies, for that they being long-tempted and sollicit for to revolt, yet notwithstanding had not failed in their allegiance, nor forsaken their fealtie, no nor for feare of a present siege. As touching sending aid unto them, it was thought good to geve answer when the Consuls had their provinces allotted unto them; and when that Consull whose hap it should be for to go into Macedonie, had proposed unto the people, That defiance should be geven to Philip king of Macedonie, and open warre proclaimed against him. Now it fell by lot unto P. Sulpitius to take that charge in Macedonie, who preferred and presented a bill unto the people in this manner: Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that warre be proclaimed and denounced against king Philip and the Macedonians within his realme and dominion, for the wrongs offered and the warre levied by them upon the friends and allies of the people of Rome? Vnto the other Consull Aurelius, befell the province of Italie. Then upon this the Pretours cast lots for their provinces. Cn. Sergius Plancus had the jurisdiction of the citie; Q. Fulvius Gillo was to governe the province of Sicilie, Q. Minutius Rufus of the Brutij, and L. Furius Purpurio of Fraunce. The foresaid bill as concerning the Macedonian warre, in the first parliament assembled about it, was in maner by all the centuries in the formost scrutinies nipped and flatly denied. Which thing, partly men of themselves were forward enough to do, as being overwreied with long and sore warres, and wome out for very yrkfomnesse of tedious travaile, and painfull perils: and partly Q. Fabius a Tribune of the Commons, failed not to set them on: who taking the old course and way of blaming and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they sowed the seeds of warre still, and ceased not to raise warre upon warre, to the end, that the commons might never be at rest, and enjoy the repose of peace. The LL. of the Senate tooke this to the heart, in such sort, that the Tribune was shaken up and all to reviled in the Senate houle with most opprobrious and reprochfull tearmes; and every man did his part to encourage the Consull to publish a new assembly and scrutinie, for the proposing of the same bill; to chastise and rebuke the sloth and idlenes of the people; yea, and to open and shew unto them, what great damage and losse, how much shame and dishonour they should incur by these delaies before the warre began. Then the Consull having assembled the people for this purpose in Mars field, before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them all together and made a speech unto them in this wise. It seemeth (quoth he) that you are ignorant, my masters and citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether ye would have warre or peace, (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure, who already prepareth mortall warre both by sea and land) but whether ye would rather choose to transport the legions into Macedonie, or receive your enemy here within Italie. And what difference there is betwene the one and the other, you have had sufficient proove and experience (if ever at any time before) even in this last warre, especially with the Carthaginians. For who is he that maketh doubtr, but if we had with speed relieved the Saguntines besieged, who fled unto us for helpe and earnestly craved for our protection, like as our ancestors and progenitors in due time assisted the Mamertines; we should have turned the whole violence and force of the warre into Spaine, which by our long driving off and lingering delaies we entertained in Italie, to our great losse and grievous calamitie. Neither need we to doubt of this, but that that we have hiderto staied Philip in Macedonie, (who without question had combined with Anniball by means of letters and intercourse of embassadours, for to have passed over into Italie before this time) only by sending of Levinus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and to make warre in his owne kingdome. Deserre we then to doe that now, when Anniball is chased out of Italie and the Carthaginians defeated; which then wee did, when wee had the same Anniball our enemy within Italie? Go we on still and suffer the king by winning the citie of Athens (like as wee permitted Anniball by forcing of Saguntum) to trie and see our slacknes and cowardise: we shall have him I warrant you arrived in Italie, not at five moneths end, as Anniball was after his departure from Saguntum; but within 5 daies, after he is disankered once & under saile from Corinth. Set case ye will not compare Philip with Anniball, no nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; yet I am sure ye will make them matches, & equall with king Pyrhus: so far forth I say, as one man excelleth another in valour, and one nation surpasseth another in power. Epirus hath never bene accounted, nor is at this day, but the smallest appendant to the kingdome of Macedonie,

And of least importance. But as for Philip, the whole and entier seignorie of Peloponnesus is under him, and lord he is of Argos it selfe, a citie enobled as well by the death of Pyrhus, as the auncient name and renowne that goeth of it. Compare now againe the times of our state. How much flourished Italie in those dayes more than now? Our affaires were then much more sound and unsoiled: our captaines safe, our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom he put us to trouble and sorrow enough, yea and came in traine of victorie to shake out Italie, which they call the greater Greece, banded with him in such sort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very language and those of their name: but the Lucanes also and the Brutians, yea and the Samnites revolted from us and rebelled. And are ye of beleeve that these will be quiet and remaine in loyaltie and obedience, if Philip once were passed over into Italie? Yes many will they, there is no question: for they stood fast afterwards, and continued true in the Punick warre. Nay, nay, never make reckning that these States will not revolt from us, so long as they know any one, unto whom they may turne and raunge themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and bene loth to passe over into Affricke; in good faith at this day ye should have had Anniball and the Carthaginians your enemies still in Italie. Let Macedonie therefore be the seate of warre, rather than Italie: let our enemies cities and lands be destroyed with fire and sword. We have found full well by good experience, that our fortune is better, and our forces more puissant abroad in forain parts, than at home in our owne countrey. Go to therefore in the name of God, to the Scrutinie and give your voices; and those things that the LL. of the Senate have devised to do, graunt ye the same, and yeeld your assent. Ye have not only the Consul author of this advise and counsell, but also the immortal gods (who as I offered sacrifice and prayed devoutly unto them, that this warre might redound to the good and benefit of my selfe, of the Senate, of you, of our allies, of the Latine nation, and finally of our armies and armadaes) have vouchsafed me all the signes and tokens of comfort and joy, and assured me that all shall be well, and according to our hearts desire. This Oration of his once ended, they went presently to deliver up their voyces, and gave affirmatively for the warre, and suffred it to passe, according as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat there was a solemne supplication for three dayes proclaimed: and in all churches and chappels, and before every shrine and altar the gods were prayed unto, that the warre (which the people had allowed of against king Philip, might be well atchieved, and have an happie end. Moreover, the Consull Sulpitius conferred with the heralds, and asked their advise, Whether they would ordeine, that the warre to be denounced against king Philip, should be intimated to himselfe in person: or thought it sufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier towne of all, where he kept a garison and guard: they pronounced againe, That it mattered not, but the Consull should please himselfe, and do full well in the one and the other. Then the Consull was permitted by the LL. of the Senate, to chuse whom he would, so he were not a Senatour, for to send as a messenger or pursevant of armes, to geve the king defiance, and to publish warre. After this it was debated in counsell, how the armies should be disposed as well of Consuls as Pretors. The Consuls were commaunded to enroll two legions, and to discharge and casse the old armies. Sulpitius who by a decree was to manage this new warre of so great name and consequence, was allowed to take with him out of that armie which Scipio the Viz-consull had brought out of Affricke, as many voluntaries as he could procure: but in no case to urge any old fouldiour against his will. Also it was decreed, that the Consull should allow unto the Pretours L. Furius Purpurio, and Quintus Minutius Rufus 5000 men apeece of the associates of the Latine nation: whom they should employ, the one in the province of Gallia, and the other in the Brutians countrey, to defend those parts & keepe them in obedience. Q. Fulvius Gillo was himselfe likewise commaunded to chuse out of that armie which P. Aelius the Consull commaunded, as many as had served fewest yeeres, untill he made up the number of 5000 also of allies & Latines; which should be a garison to keepe in order and safetie the province of Sicilie. M. Valerius Falto, Pretor the yeere before, and L. deputie of the province of Campanie, had his commission signed anew, to continue for the terme of one yeere longer, and as Viz-pretour to passe over into Sardinia, with direction to chuse out of the armie there five thousand of allies and Latines, such as had served least time. And the Consuls were commaunded to take up two legions of citizens, which might be sent to any any place, as need should require, considering that many nations in Italie tainted and infected G with the fellowship and companie of the Carthaginians during the warres and ever since, were swelled with anger and despite against the Romanes. Thus the Common-weale for that yeere was to use the employment of fixe Romane Legions.
